In light of these new rules for trials at Guantánamo, Graham thought that the habeas-corpus filings by the prisoners should stop. "My goal was to create some form of due process that was not as invasive as a habeas trial, because I do believe they impede the running of the jail," he said. Graham proposed that rulings against the detainees be appealed only to the United States Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. (His legislation thus avoided the district court for the D.C. Circuit, which has generally looked more favorably on detainee claims than has the court of appeals.) In Graham's view, the court of appeals is an adequate substitute for habeas corpus. "The way I read what the Supreme Court said was that, if there was no system in place to decide someone's confinement status, you had to let them file habeas petitions," Graham said. "But I think if you give them the D.C. Circuit, that's enough. That's a legitimate alternative. Arlen disagrees. He thinks it's a constitutional right to file a habeas case. I think our statute gives you enough. That's what Specter v. Graham is about."

"That's just ridiculous," Specter told me, referring to Graham's position. "Graham's legislation does not allow the D.C. Circuit to make any fact-finding at all about what happened to the detainees and whether they are, in fact, enemy combatants. It's not a 'streamline' review; it's no kind of review at all." The legislation will almost certainly come before the Supreme Court, but it's impossible to know whether the Court will uphold it. "The D.C. Circuit would have to be an adequate and effective judicial remedy for reviewing the lawfulness of any detention, because that's the basic definition of habeas corpus," Gerald L. Neuman, a professor at Harvard Law School, said. "The law itself isn't very clear about what the D.C. Circuit should do."

DOJ_NMG_0097968

The scene in the hearing room of the Dirksen Senate Office Building anticipated, in a small way, the spirit of rebellion that would animate the electorate seven weeks later. The session began with bipartisan expressions of outrage at the Administration's (and Graham's) plan. "It is inexplicable to me how someone can seek to divest the federal courts of jurisdiction on constitutional issues, just inexplicable to me," Specter said in his introductory remarks. "If the courts are not open to decide constitutional issues, how is constitutionality going to be tested?" Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat, spoke next. "Today we're addressing the single most consequential provision in this much discussed bill," he said. "This provision would perpetuate the indefinite detention of hundreds of individuals, against whom the government has brought no charges and presented no evidence and without any recourse to justice whatsoever. That is un-American. This is un-American." At that moment, a group of protesters wearing T-shirts saying "Shame," "End Torture," and "Save Habeas Corpus" rose from their seats and cheered.

Specter rebuked them gently. "There will be no demonstrations from the people in the room," he said. "We want you to be here. We want you to listen. But that's out of order."

Until this point, the debate over the Senate bill had focussed on the rules for the commissions, or trials. But Thomas Sullivan, a veteran Chicago lawyer and former United States Attorney, turned the senators' attention to a different subject. Sullivan, who represents several Saudi nationals held at Guantánamo, pointed out that the government planned to give about eighty of the four hundred and thirty detainees full trials. The rest would receive only an abbreviated hearing known as a Combatant Status Review Tribunal (C.S.R.T.). At these proceedings, detainees are not allowed to call witnesses (unless the witnesses are other detainees at Guantánamo), have no attorneys present, and are presumed guilty of being an enemy combatant based on evidence that they are not allowed to see.

With barely concealed rage, Sullivan lectured Senator John Cornyn, the Texas Republican who was defending the Administration's position at the hearing. "The question is whether they are enemy combatants. And when they started out in these hearings, these C.S.R.T.s, they were presumed guilty. There had already been a finding they were enemy combatants. The determination had been made. No witness or evidence was presented by the government. They would call in and they'd say, 'O.K., Mr. Cornyn, here's the charge against you. What have you got to say about it?' That was it. That was all that they did. And then they put in some classified evidence. I've been down to the secure facility. It's a joke. It's a sham."

The ban on habeas cases was likely to have a dramatic effect on the detainees at Guantánamo, but for a less than obvious reason. The procedure for military trials, brokered by Graham, Warner, and McCain, has won a measure of support from some of the human-rights advocates and lawyers who have been representing the prisoners. "If they were to charge them under the military commissions, it's a pretty good substitute for a criminal trial," Sullivan told me later. "They have to put evidence on the stand, right to a lawyer, subpoena power, and you can see and confront the evidence against you. But what most people don't understand is that the government has said they are not going to try more than about eighty of the prisoners who are there. The real question is what happens to the three hundred other detainees? All they got are those pathetic C.S.R.T.s."

In introducing the C.S.R.T.s, in 2004, the Department of Defense announced that, as part of the process, "detainees will also be notified of their right to seek a writ of habeas corpus in the courts of the United States." Because of the new bill, this will no longer be the case. "You're talking about people who have been in custody for four years, some of them haven't even been questioned in two years, and the C.S.R.T. is all they have got in terms of a hearing, and it's all they're likely ever to get," Sullivan said. "Their only hope was habeas, where the government would have to justify in some way why they're being held year after year."

Kyl asserted that "the consequences of the Specter amendment are unimaginable. We cannot allow enemy war prisoners to sue us in our own courts. Such a system would make it simply impossible for the United States to fight a war." But Specter had an answer. "Mr. President," he said, addressing the chair. "I only need one sentence to refute the arguments of the senator from Arizona, and it comes back to Justice O'Connor's opinion again: 'All agree that, absent suspension, the writ of habeas corpus remains available to every individual'—every individual—'detained within the United States.' Guantánamo was held to be within that concept. But she talks about 'every individual.' That includes citizens and noncitizens."

The outcome of the Specter amendment was in doubt until the day the vote was cast. The final tally was fifty-one to forty-eight against Specter. (Olympia Snowe was absent, attending a funeral.) When the result was announced, Specter, visibly angry, left the Senate chamber. He told reporters that he thought the habeas ban was "patently unconstitutional" and vowed to vote against the detainee bill.

In the chaotic few days before the vote, the Administration's allies in the Senate had toughened the habeas provision of the law. The bill had originally applied only to alleged enemy combatants who were held at Guantánamo. The final version stated that any alien (that is, non-American citizen) who had been seized anywhere and charged with being an enemy combatant would be denied the right to petition for habeas corpus. The definition of "enemy combatant" was also expanded, to include not just those who took up arms but financial supporters of the terrorist cause as well. Accordingly, the bill made clear that aliens arrested in the United States and charged with knowingly giving money to an alleged terrorist organization would be forbidden to sue for their freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0097969

Nevertheless, on September 28th, Specter joined all his Republican colleagues (except Lincoln Chafee) in voting for the Military Commissions Act, which passed by a vote of sixty-five to thirty-four. President Bush signed the law on October 17th, and the next day the government began filing court papers asking for the dismissal of all the petitions for habeas corpus filed by detainees at Guantánamo Bay.

It is hard to believe that the Arlen Specter of the nineteen-eighties—the maverick who defied his party on an issue of the magnitude of the Bork nomination—would have considered yielding on a question as fundamental as habeas corpus. "I was madder than hell when the habeas-corpus amendment went down and was a little hot and spoke prematurely on the vote," Specter told me. "If we had not passed the bill, we would be going on into next year without having a procedure to try these people." Thus, he said, he felt obligated to vote for the bill.

If Specter has accommodated his views to his party's, his leisure habits have not changed: he still plays squash seven days a week, a routine that he has maintained since the nineteen-seventies. "I think of playing squash as making deposits in the 'health bank,' " Specter told me shortly after dawn one recent morning in the locker room of the gym at the Federal Reserve bank, in Washington. "That's a good thing, because I've made a lot of withdrawals, too." In 1993, Specter was found to have a brain tumor and was told that he had three to six weeks to live. However, he recovered quickly after surgery. Then, just after his reëlection in 2004, he was given a diagnosis of Hodgkin's disease, and during the first several months of his tenure as chairman of the Judiciary Committee he received chemotherapy.

Specter completed his treatment in 2005, and never stopped playing squash. The therapy cost him his bushy curls, but his hair is full again, only straight this time. Wearing a ratty sweatshirt, a souvenir from the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles, he looked at least a decade younger than his age. He still bears the scars of his years as a bruiser on the squash court—Senator Robert Packwood once gave him a swat that took six stitches to close—but he now plays more of a finesse game, built around a deadly drop shot. I won our first game, 16–14, but Specter took the next three, to win the match. He plays the same old-school, hardball version of the game as the capital's other celebrated septuagenarian squash enthusiast, Donald Rumsfeld, but the two men have never met on the court.

Specter was about to head to Rhode Island, to campaign for Lincoln Chafee. "I'm going up there to say that Chafee could hold the balance of power in our caucus," Specter told me. "That's what those of us in the middle can do." But in the habeas debate, at the crucial moment, Specter tipped the balance of power toward those who, at the time, already had it. Some Democrats on Capitol Hill are calling the debate Specter's "John Kerry moment." (He was against the habeas bill before he was for it.)

Of course, Specter's vote on habeas, like his support of Roberts and Alito, forestalled another possible conservative revolt against his chairmanship (which, in the event, the election cost him). Specter is hoping the courts will restore the rights of the detainees to bring habeas cases. "The bill was severable. It has a severability clause. And I think the courts will invalidate it," he told me. "They're not going to give up authority to decide habeas-corpus cases, not a chance." Others are less sure.

"It's a pretty odd position for Specter to take," Amar, of Yale Law School, said. "He trusts the courts to take care of a problem when he's voting for something that strips them of their jurisdiction to do it. It's like saying, 'I shot at her, but I knew I was going to miss.' Still, he may be right. The Court might strike it down." According to Amar, the election that cost Specter so much of his clout makes it more likely that his legal position will ultimately be vindicated on habeas corpus.

"The Justices always want to protect their own power, and they hate the idea of any kind of jurisdiction-stripping," Amar said. "But if they can avoid it they also don't want to pick fights with the President and the Congress, especially about anything related to national security. But, with the Democrats in control of Congress, the Court will know that if they strike this down it'll never get passed again in anything like this form. The Republicans would just come back at them and pass the same thing again and again. The Democrats never will. The irony is, thanks to the election, the Court now has plenty of running room to do the right thing."

In the meantime, however, the Administration has moved swiftly to use the new powers granted by Congress in the Military Commissions Act. In acting to dismiss the pending habeas cases filed by Guantánamo detainees, the Justice Department has adopted Lindsey Graham's reasoning, that the bill does not amount to a "suspension" under the Constitution but merely substitutes the D.C. Circuit appeals court for the habeas cases. In a brief filed on November 13th in the D.C. Circuit, the government asserted that the new law "plainly affords an adequate and effective substitute for any applicable habeas right."

The Administration has sought to apply the new law outside Guantánamo. Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a forty-one-year-old citizen of Qatar, was studying at Bradley University, in Peoria, Illinois, when he was detained shortly after September 11, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0097970

He has been held in a Navy brig as an enemy combatant for more than three years, and had filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, asking to be freed. On November 13th, the government filed a brief saying that the new law bars Marri's lawsuit: the act "removes federal court jurisdiction over pending and future habeas corpus actions and any other actions filed by or on behalf of detained aliens determined by the United States to be enemy combatants." If this motion is granted, Marri could remain in custody on American soil indefinitely, without any further legal recourse.

Leahy, the incoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee, voted against the Military Commissions Act and denounced its habeas provisions in especially harsh terms. But there are no signs that the new Democratic majority will take on habeas corpus anytime soon. Few Democratic politicians seem enthusiastic about proposing legislation that will principally benefit accused Al Qaeda terrorists, and, in the unlikely event that Democrats passed such a bill, it would face a certain veto from President Bush. The Supreme Court—not Congress—is likely to be the only hope for a change in the law. "This is definitely not going to be the first thing out of the box for us," one Democratic Senate staffer said. "We make fun of Specter, but we're basically leaving it up to the Courts, too."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Works To Bridge Its Muslim Trust Gap (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, November 27, 2006

NEW YORK

It was an awkward moment for Martin Ficke, the special agent in charge of US Immigration and Customs Enforcement in New York.

He was seated next to a member of the British Parliament for a panel on the "War on Terror and the Clash of Civilizations." Why, the moderator asked Mr. Ficke, was this prominent British citizen with a diplomatic passport questioned for almost an hour when he landed at the airport?

To the audience, filled with Muslim-American students, the answer was obvious. His name is Shahid Malik, a Muslim name. "I've already talked to him about it privately and apologized," Ficke said. "It shouldn't have happened."

Across the country in conference rooms like this, as well as in local cafes and community meeting halls, officials of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and FBI are reaching out to Muslim-Americans in an attempt to bridge the huge gap of mistrust that developed on both sides after 9/11. It's sometimes an uncomfortable process, as Ficke found. It's also not being applied consistently across the country, working well in some places - like New York, where the Muslim Advisory Council meets regularly - and not so well in others. But homeland-security experts and Arab- and Muslim-American leaders believe such outreach is crucial to maintaining the nation's security and strengthening its social fabric.

"9/11 created a pretty big divide and we still have a ways to go, but there has been progress," says Arsalan Iftikhar, national legal director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations in Washington. "With five years of retrospect at our disposal now, we as a nation are able to see more accurately what are and what are not effective law-enforcement initiatives and how it is important to reach out to the Muslim-American community and make them feel as partners in our society."

There's no question the US Muslim community felt the brunt of the FBI's counterterrorism and law-enforcement initiatives after 9/11, say experts. More than 1,200 immigrants, mostly Arab and Muslim males, were detained and denied due process for months. The Justice Department's own inspector general concluded that their detentions were "indiscriminate and haphazard," with no clear distinction made between those held for immigration violations and those who were suspected terrorists. The report also found "a pattern of physical and verbal abuse" by correction officers. Ultimately, only a handful of those detained were charged with a terrorism-related offense, and 231 were deported. Registration requirements for males

The Justice Department also set up a special program that required male visitors from 24 Arab and Muslim countries to register with local immigration offices. More than 80,000 men did so. Immigration officials found an estimated 13,000 were "out of status," which means there were problems with their visas. They're now awaiting deportation hearings. But experts say many of the visa problems were caused by inaccurate data and long delays in processing applications for permanent status. The Justice Department eventually canceled the program.

"By singling out a large group of mostly Arabs and Muslims, [these programs] involved a massive investment of law-enforcement resources with negligible return," says James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute in Washington.

In the immediate aftermath of 9/11, discrimination against Muslim- and Arab-Americans also soared. In 2001, the FBI reported a 1,600 percent increase in anti-Muslim hate crimes and an almost 500 percent increase in ethnic-based hate crimes against persons of Arab descent, according to Mr. Zogby.

DOJ_NMG_0097971

Last week, six imams returning from a conference on religious tolerance were removed in handcuffs from a US Airways flight from Minneapolis to Phoenix after a passenger raised concerns about "suspicious behavior." Three of them were seen praying in the waiting area and a fourth reportedly asked for a seat-belt extension. DHS's Office of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties has opened an investigation. Efforts to bridge the gap

"One of the most disturbing things is that [polls show] more than half of the country views Islam as a violent or an extreme religion," says Faiza Ali, a student at Pace University, who spoke at the conference in New York.

The FBI found many such misperceptions about Islam among its agents as well, according to Andrew Arena, the special agent in charge of the New York FBI office. And so, as as the bureau began a concentrated effort to reach out to the Muslim community, education became one of its first priorities. At the FBI Academy and in ongoing field training, agents are now taught about the Muslim faith - its basic tenets and things like the difference between Shiites and Sunnis.

"It's helped to make our agents more culturally sensitive to the concerns of not only the Muslim community, but all of the communities that we deal with," says Mr. Arena.

Although the outreach and educational efforts have had some success in New York, they are inconsistent nationally: Quality is dependent on the priority that local federal offices give to such outreach. For instance in New York, members of the local Muslim Advisory Council are in weekly contact with FBI and DHS officials. They meet formally each quarter. But in other places, similar efforts are floundering. It's been two years since the Arab American Advisory Board has met with top officials at FBI headquarters in Washington, according Zogby, who is a member.

"I don't understand why it's dropped off, but I want better cooperation," he says.

Still, federal officials are trying to place emphasis on other concerns in the Muslim-American community. The FBI, for one, has stepped up its investigation of anti-Islamic hate crimes. In 2005, it probed 128 of them, compared with 28 in 2000.

And it's made recruiting a top priority in the Arab- and Muslim-American communities. In fact, outside the New York conference, both the FBI and DHS had tables staffed with recruiters. Arena made it a point to pitch the bureau when he spoke to the students.

"You could have a great career and really make a difference," he told them.

That was met with some skepticism. One student told Arena that she was interested in law enforcement, but because of her experiences since 9/11, she's afraid she'd face hostility at the FBI because she is a Muslim. Arena said she would not, noting the changes in FBI training as well as the importance it now places on having good relations with the Muslim-American community.

The process of reaching out can also be a two-way street. Suhail Muzaffar, chairman of Muslim Majlis of Staten Island, who organized the conference, is one who in the aftermath of 9/11 let the FBI know that some of its tactics were doing more harm than good in New York's Muslim community. He said that was particularly true on immigration matters.

"Before 9/11, the procedure was simple: You never saw an agent, you never talked to an agent, it was all paper," he says. "Suddenly, it became personal. People would visit you, they would call you. It created a lot of confusion and fear."

So agents at Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) created what they call "calling cards" in English and Arabic that explain their procedures and why they've come. They also started intensive cultural training of their agents in terms of Muslim customs, as well as others, according to Ficke. For instance, the traditional Sikh dress includes a ceremonial dagger. In the immediate aftermath of 9/11, Sikhs were routinely challenged for carrying them. But the blades are blunt, Ficke says, and officers have been trained to recognize them and let them go.

Editorial: Better Safe Than ... (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 27, 2006

US Airways Flight 300 from Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport to Phoenix one week ago tonight was a reassuring statement about America's commitment to Homeland Security and the civil rights of suspects.

Six passengers were Muslim religious leaders (Imams) whose demeanor and discussion were very suspicious. Other passengers -- including one who understands Arabic and another whose travels include Turkey -- were concerned about the loud chanting of "Allah" and the anti-American remarks about Iraq.

The Imams said they were traveling together, yet two were seated at the front, two in the middle and two at the back. Three had one-way tickets and did not check any luggage. One wanted a seat belt extension even though a flight attendant said he was not overweight.

The flight crew received a note from a passenger about the "6 Suspicious Arabic men on plane."

The six were taken off the plane and interviewed separately for five hours by airport police, air marshals and FBI and Secret Service agents before being released.

DOJ_NMG_0097972

US Airways refused to let them on another flight, but they found seats on Northwest Airlines and departed Tuesday morning.

Proactive passengers and crew and thorough investigations by government agencies suggest the system worked well. Yes, a few were inconvenienced. How does one say "better safe than sorry" in Arabic?

Mona Charen: What Happened Was A Shame, But Necessary (MINNST)

By Mona Charen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 27, 2006

Media were quick to call it a case of "flying while Muslim," but did they ask what was going through the minds of the other passengers?

Six imams got on a plane in Minneapolis. Accounts vary, but it seems that they were speaking in Arabic before boarding of their disgust with the U.S. war in Iraq and with American policy in general. One was heard to declare that he would do whatever was necessary to fulfill his obligations under the Qur'an.. Another repeated, "Allah, Allah." Once aboard, they aroused suspicion by requesting seat-belt extenders that they did not appear to require and took seats not together but scattered throughout the plane.

Several people contacted the flight attendants, and the men were asked to leave.

Now comes the nonsense. The Associated Press declares that this is a case of "flying while Muslim," and a TV anchor compares the imams to Rosa Parks. Nihad Awad of the Council on American-Islamic Relations denounced the incident as an example of "Islamophobia," adding, "We are concerned that crew members, passengers and security personnel may have succumbed to fear and prejudice based on stereotyping of Muslims and Islam."

The Department of Homeland Security has announced that its Office of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties is opening an inquiry into the incident. And talk radio is abuzz. "Would they have done the same to a group of priests?" asked one talk radio host. "Or rabbis?"

Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that the person who was overheard chanting "Allah, Allah" was actually saying something else. Let's go ahead and allow that there was nothing suspicious about the request for seat-belt extenders, as several of the imams were a bit rotund. Let's even agree that the six imams were "victims" of discrimination.

It's a shame. But it's absolutely necessary. It cannot have been pleasant to be denied the opportunity to fly, to be singled out, to be embarrassed in front of a plane full of strangers. But this knee-jerk reaction to the word "discrimination" is completely out of place in this discussion.

When passengers see six Arab men praying, talking animatedly in Arabic (a fellow passenger understood Arabic and was one of those who contacted a flight attendant), and then boarding an airplane and sitting in different places, I wonder what goes through their minds. Is it: "I sure don't like Muslims. Think I'll just harass and annoy them"? Or could it possibly be: "Oh dear God, this is what the 9/11 hijackers must have looked like"?

Is it discrimination? Well, of course it is. But that cannot be the end of the discussion. We are so robotic in America whenever the word "discrimination" is used that we shut down thought and genuflect in the direction of whoever is complaining. But the proper question is not whether it is discrimination but whether it is justified.

Of course passengers would not be nervous in the presence of six priests or six rabbis. Neither of these groups has any history of blowing up innocent people. Nor do Americans despise those who pray. In fact, uniquely among Western democracies, we are great fans of religion.

But Islam presents a problem. While we would love to think that Islam is as pacific as Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism or Hinduism, the facts suggest otherwise. Time and again, terrorists who have committed or attempted to commit murder on a large scale have done so after becoming serious Muslims.

This is a hijacking of a great faith, you say? Maybe so. I'm inclined to believe it since I do not think that a billion people would be drawn to a religion of hate. But that much having been said, the haters within Islam are certainly having a heck of a run at the moment. Maybe they are only 10 percent of the worldwide total, but that still leaves us with 100 million very religious fellows who believe they have divine sanction to blow us up.

One final note: If Robert Spencer, director of Jihad Watch, is correct, one of the imams ejected from that plane, Omar Shahin, was involved with the Islamic charity Kind Hearts, which has had its assets frozen by the U.S. Treasury Department because of its connections to the terrorist group Hamas.

Mona Charen's column is distributed by Creators Syndicate.

DOJ_NMG_0097973

WAR NEWS:

Jordan Fears Three Middle East Civil Wars (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

Jordan's King Abdullah, who will host President Bush this week during emergency talks on Iraq, said yesterday that the Middle East faces the prospect of three simultaneous civil wars erupting.

"We're juggling with the strong potential of three civil wars in the region, whether it's the Palestinians, that of Lebanon, or of Iraq," the Jordanian king said on ABC's "This Week."

He said that as a result, "something dramatic" had to come out of this week's Amman meetings between Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "I don't think we're in a position where we can come back and revisit the problem in early 2007," he told interviewer George Stephanopoulos.

However dire the situation in Iraq, Abdullah said he's more worried about the escalating violence in Lebanon and the battles between the Israelis and Palestinians.

"When it comes to things exploding out of control, I would put today, as we stand, Palestine and probably a close tie with Lebanon," he said. "Iraq, funny enough, although as concerned as I am with Iraq and the major problems that might bring to us, is in third position."

The United States, he said, needs to look at the "total picture" and be ready to talk with all parties in the area -- including Syria and Iran -- about a wide range of issues.

"We can possibly imagine going into 2007 and having three civil wars on our hands," Abdullah said. "And therefore, it is time that we really take a strong step forward as part of the international community and make sure we avert the Middle East from a tremendous crisis that I fear."

With parts of Iraq approaching, or already in, a state of anarchy or civil war, the Bush administration is reaching out to traditional Arab allies in an effort to help stem the violence. Vice President Cheney flew to Saudi Arabia this weekend for three hours of talks with its King Abdullah. Bush was briefed yesterday by Cheney about his trip to Saudi Arabia and by other administration officials about the status of their Iraq policy initiatives. Aides said the meeting was not intended to be a decision-making session. Bush is to leave today for a NATO summit before flying to Jordan to meet with Maliki for crisis talks Wednesday and Thursday.

Meanwhile, the 10-member Iraq Study Group will meet today and Tuesday in Washington. A discussion about regional diplomacy is expected to be on the agenda.

Saudi Arabia, Jordan and other Sunni Arab nations with close ties to the United States have voiced concern about Shiite Iran's growing influence and its involvement in the three regional conflicts. Many Iraqi leaders, as well as Shiite militants there, have close ties with Iran, which also provides funds and support for Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

The rising power of Iran has the governments especially concerned about any possible U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, a development that some think could lead to a regional war between Sunnis and Shiites.

Also on "This Week," Sens. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) voiced frustration with Iraq's leaders. Durbin said that the United States should tell Maliki to disband the largely Shiite militias and death squads, and to govern the country "in a responsible fashion" or face an eventual U.S. withdrawal. Brownback said that he opposes setting a timetable for withdrawing troops, but that "I think what we've got to do is go around the Maliki government in certain situations."

Jordan's Abdullah also said that the Maliki government has to improve immediately.

"There needs to be some very strong action taken on the ground there today," he said.

On CNN's "Late Edition," Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, yesterday cast the growing conflict as one against extremism. He said many Islamic movements in the region were already sending funds and fighters into Iraq to take on the government and the American forces.

"This is a fight, or this is a war, between the extremists and the moderates in the whole region," he said.

On the same show, Lebanese parliament member Saad Hariri said he thought Syria "had a hand" in last week's assassination of Lebanese cabinet member Pierre Gemayel. Syria has denied this, as it has denied any responsibility for the death of Hariri's father, former prime minister Rafik Hariri.

"They will keep on denying all these killings until they kill us all," Saad Hariri said.

King Of Jordan Warns Of 'Three Civil Wars' (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0097974

By Eoin Callan And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, November 27, 2006

The Middle East is on the verge of three civil wars - in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories - King Abdullah of Jordan warned Sunday ahead of crisis talks with US President George W. Bush and the Iraqi prime minister.

The Jordanian king said that "something dramatic" needed to come out of the meeting between President Bush and Nourial-Maliki, prime minister,at the tripartite summit being hosted in Amman this week.

The warning of impending civil war adds to the intensifying pressure on the Bush administration to map out a fresh strategy for ending the war in Iraq, which today enters its 1,347th day.

King Abdullah said the US needed to see the "big picture" and pursue a regional solution, indicating his support for American engagement with Iran and Syria in pursuit of an end to worsening violence.

"They need to do it now, because, obviously, as we are seeing, things are beginning to spiral out of control," he told CNN.

"We're juggling with the strong potential of three civil wars in the region."

Engagement with Iran and Syria is widely expected to be a key recommendation from the Iraq Study Group,a congress-mandated bipartisan commission led by former secretary of state James Baker and former Democrat congressman Lee Hamilton.

The commission is expected to meet today for two days of deliberations before delivering its report to the White House in December.

The president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Sunday offered to "help" America get out of Iraq,in an apparent response to overtures from interlocutors.

"The Iranian nation is ready to help you to get out of the quagmire - on condition that you resume behaving in a just manner and avoid bullying and invading," he reportedly said in a speech.

The diplomatic push fora co-ordinated regional approach to the conflict in Iraq is expected to gain momentum when Jalal Talabani, the Iraqi president, today makes a visit to Tehran for talks on easing sectarian tensions.

President Bush first indicated his administration was ready to consider a radical change in direction of its Iraq policy in the wake of Republican defeats in mid-term elections.

Democrats, emboldened by their sweep of Congress, Sunday stepped up pressure on the administration to announce a timetable for withdrawing troops.

Congressman Ike Skelton, the incoming chairman of the House armed services committee, called for troop withdrawals to begin within the next year.

Leaders Boost Efforts To Quell Iraq Violence (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, November 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — A week of unprecedented violence that claimed hundreds of Iraqi lives is prompting intensified efforts to develop a regional solution for the sectarian divisions rippling across the Middle East.

The violence also triggered more calls Sunday from U.S. lawmakers for a withdrawal of American troops, as the length of the U.S. engagement in Iraq surpassed that of World War II.

A key U.S. ally warned Sunday that conditions are deteriorating not only in Iraq but also throughout the Middle East. “Things are beginning to spiral out of control,” King Abdullah of Jordan said on ABC's This Week. He warned of “the strong potential of three civil wars in the region” and called for action to quell violence in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

High-level meetings on solving the crisis were in the works. President Bush will travel to the region Wednesday for a summit with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, hosted by Abdullah in Amman, Jordan. Vice President Cheney made a brief visit to Saudi Arabia over the weekend. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani flies to Tehran today to meet with officials of the Iranian government, suspected of aiding militias in Iraq.

The talks follow a series of bombings Thursday that killed more than 215 people in Baghdad's Sadr City slum, a Shiite area. It was the deadliest single attack since the Iraq war began in March 2003. Iraq's top politicians issued a joint statement vowing to end the bloodshed and the divisions among the country's religious and ethnic factions. Al-Maliki, a Shiite, appeared on national television with Talabani, a Kurd, and Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the speaker of the Iraqi parliament and a member of the Sunni minority.

In recent days, al-Maliki has been criticized by Sunni and Shiite leaders for not doing enough. Among the critics is anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army is one of Iraq's most powerful militias. Al-Sadr has vowed to withdraw his support for al-Maliki if the prime minister meets Bush this week.

DOJ_NMG_0097975

The political chaos is deepening the security crisis, said Col. Talib Abdul Razzaq, commander of the 2nd Battalion, 2nd Brigade, 6th Iraqi army. He said his unit is and beholden to orders based more on politics than military tactics. “Our orders are to kill or arrest anyone carrying illegal weapons, but these orders are just ink on paper,” he said. “If we attack anyone, they accuse us of sectarianism. And the weapons of the terrorists and militias are more powerful than ours.”

The U.S. military is trying to pick up the slack. Over the weekend, U.S. forces killed more than 23 terrorism suspects in several raids and destroyed a bombmaking factory. But some U.S. lawmakers insist it's time for the Iraqis to tackle the violence themselves.

“Unless they're willing to stand up and govern their country in a responsible fashion, America is not going to stay indefinitely,” said Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democratic leader in the Senate.

Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, who will be the deputy Republican leader in the Senate next year, questioned al-Maliki's ability to run Iraq. “I don't know whether the government is going to be able to survive,” Lott said on Fox News Sunday.

Bush Set For High-stakes Diplomatic Trip (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 27, 2006

President Bush reaches out to allies this week for help in quelling violence in Iraq and Afghanistan, in a burst of diplomacy from a Baltic summit of NATO partners to Mideast talks with Iraq's prime minister.

Just back from an eight-day trip to Asia, Bush was leaving on Monday on another overseas trip as pressure builds at home for a change in his administration's Iraq strategy amid deepening tensions and violence in that country.

The president stops first in Estonia en route to a NATO summit in neighboring Latvia where a debate over peacekeeping operations in Afghanistan is expected to dominate.

Estonia and Latvia have sent troops to both Iraq and Afghanistan and the U.S. considers the two former Soviet republics important allies.

From Latvia, the president heads to Amman, Jordan, for two days of talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Jordan was deemed a less dangerous setting for the meeting than Baghdad.

White House aides said the meeting, a late addition to Bush's itinerary, was part of the president's process of sounding out various parties as he ponders how to proceed in Iraq.

Iran and Syria are trying to assert influence in stabilizing Iraq without American involvement, and tensions in the region increased further last week with the assassination of a Cabinet member in the U.S.-backed democratic government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora — a killing some have blamed on Syria. Also, sectarian attacks in Iraq have surged in recent days.

Jordan's King Abdullah said Sunday that tensions in the Middle East go beyond the war in Iraq and that much of the region soon could become engulfed in violence unless the central issues are addressed quickly.

"We could possibly imagine going into 2007 and having three civil wars on our hands," he said on ABC's "This Week," citing conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the decades-long strife between the Palestinians and Israelis.

At the NATO gathering Tuesday and Wednesday in Riga, Latvia, Bush will press for a heavier financial and military commitment from many of the alliance's 26 members and urge an easing of restrictions by individual countries on what their troops can and cannot do, according to administration officials.

The president also will call for inviting major non-NATO members Australia, Japan and South Korea to play a larger role in the alliance's activities.

Widespread public dismay over the war in Iraq helped sweep control of Congress away from Bush's Republicans this month and put Democrats in power. Democrats and some Republicans want Bush to begin withdrawing U.S. troops.

Violence also has flared in Afghanistan as a result of a resurgent Taliban and difficulties by the central government to maintain control, especially in the turbulent south.

The NATO summit will focus heavily on Afghanistan "because NATO is now in charge of security throughout the country" and because the alliance has recently been challenged by the Taliban, said Judy Ansley, director of European affairs at the White House National Security Council.

"The main thing now is to make sure that the alliance remains committed to this mission, which is important not only to Afghanistan but to our security in the West," she said.

Retired Air Force Gen. Joseph Ralston, a former NATO Supreme Allied Commander, said that "events in Afghanistan are reaching a critical juncture, and European politics and perceptions, as well as U.S. commitments in Iraq may prevent NATO from getting the assets necessary to ensure victory."

"A military failure in Afghanistan would be catastrophic for the alliance," Ralston said.

There are currently just over 30,000 NATO troops in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0097976

Bush's meeting with the Iraqi prime minister will be the first time the two have met since al-Maliki's visit to Washington in late July. They also met during Bush's unannounced visit to Baghdad in June.

Conditions have deteriorated since those meetings, and Bush is pondering whether to decrease or increase the 140,000 U.S. troops now in Iraq. The president is awaiting recommendations from a top-to-bottom Pentagon review and from a blue-ribbon bipartisan study group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana.

The assassination in Lebanon last week will make it even harder for Bush to solicit the help of Syria and Iran in stabilizing Iraq, as many political figures in the U.S. and abroad have recommended.

The Bush-al-Maliki meeting was widely seen as an attempt by Bush to signal that the U.S. still was engaged in an effort to find a solution to the spiraling violence in Iraq after more than three years and eight months — longer than the U.S. involvement in World War II, as of Sunday.

"Sometimes, in the Middle East, you do diplomacy just to keep things from getting worse," said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy analyst at the Brookings Institution.

Bush decided to go ahead with the meeting despite the opposition of some prominent Shiites in Iraq. Ahead of Bush's visit, Vice President Dick Cheney went to Saudi Arabia over the weekend in hopes of enlisting that government's help in involving more Arab countries in a regional solution.

The president was under pressure at home both from Democrats and some Republicans to take a new direction in Iraq.

"Changes are going to have to occur," Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., the incoming No. 2 GOP leader in the Senate, told "Fox News Sunday."

Shaping Post-Bush Policy (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

The reopened debate on Iraq will now rage for months or years, consuming most of the oxygen for foreign policy in Washington. Even if the result is a better strategy for rescuing (or ending) that beleaguered mission, larger questions about President Bush's post-Sept. 11 foreign policy will remain to be sorted out -- ideally by the time the next president takes office.

For example: Is the fight against "Islamofacism," as Bush has taken to calling it, really the defining struggle of the 21st century, comparable to the Cold War against communism? Is the president's "freedom agenda" of pressing for democratic change around the world, and especially in Muslim countries, still worth pursuing, given the failures (so far) of U.S.-backed democratic experiments in Iraq and the Palestinian Authority? Can the United Nations be salvaged as a forum for addressing threats such as Iran and North Korea, despite Bush's failure (so far) to make it work?

Right now the most audible discussion of such issues, by candidates in the midterm elections, suggests that many Republicans and Democrats would like to jettison any foreign policy connected to the Bush administration as quickly as possible. "Realists" such as James A. Baker III and Henry Kissinger are suddenly back in fashion, their own manifold failings in past administrations obscured by the panic over Iraq.

Encouragingly, however, there is also some fresh thinking going on -- strategizing that tries to rewrite the Bush administration's first cut at a 21st-century foreign policy without returning to the 20th-century nostrums that preceded it. The most impressive example of this that I've seen is something called the Princeton Project, a massive 2 1/2 year effort to formulate a bipartisan approach to the post-Cold War, post-9/11 world conducted by Princeton's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs.

The Wilson school's dean, Anne-Marie Slaughter, and politics professor G. John Ikenberry, who jointly directed the project, convened hundreds of experts from across the political spectrum in nine separate conferences; they consulted Kissinger and Madeleine Albright, George Shultz and Zbigniew Brzezinski, among many others. They then wrote a report that, refreshingly, would confound both Bush and many of their fellow Democrats -- but contains ideas that ought to have broad appeal across both parties.

So: Bush's "defining" war against Islamic extremism? "Absolutely wrong," says Slaughter, a rising star in the foreign policy world who would be a likely candidate for a top position in a future Democratic administration. "It's an attempt to simplify a world that won't be so simplified." The Princeton Project argues that the coming century will offer not one overriding threat but a "Rubik's cube" of diverse yet sometimes interlocking challenges, such as the spread of nuclear weapons, global warming, and the rise of India and China as great powers. Also, pandemics: Slaughter says she's more worried about the risk that a strain of avian flu will kill millions of Americans than about another terrorist attack.

DOJ_NMG_0097977

As for the problem of terrorism, Slaughter says "it shouldn't be called Islamo-anything," because that merely invites a civilizational conflict and gives al-Qaeda and other criminal networks more credit than they deserve. They should be hunted down through an aggressive global counterterrorism campaign, she says, but not placed at the center of global politics.

What about democracy? Here Slaughter and Ikenberry refuse to buckle under the anti-Bush backlash. At the center of their strategy is the goal of "a world of liberty under law" -- a phrase that first appeared in Ronald Reagan's platform. They argue that the United States should "develop a much more sophisticated strategy of creating the deeper preconditions for successful liberal democracy" extending "far beyond the simple holding of elections."

One of the most intriguing Princeton ideas is the creation of a treaty-based "Concert of Democracies" that, like the European Union or NATO, would admit members only if they met strict requirements. The new institution would allow the democracies to work together as a concerted force within such institutions as the United Nations -- as mostly undemocratic groups such as the Organization of the Islamic Conference already do -- and could eventually replace the United Nations as a forum for legitimizing international security actions if the United Nations itself proved resistant to reform. Ideally, emerging powers such as India and Brazil would seek membership and influence in the democracy alliance, rather than allying with "nonaligned" dictatorships.

There is much more: an overhaul of every major global institution, from the International Monetary Fund to NATO; construction of a better "protective infrastructure" in the United States; a national gasoline tax and a new U.S. international initiative on climate change. Yes, it's far-reaching and none of it will happen while Bush is president. It could, however, be a start at what comes afterward.

Right War, Botched Occupation (USAT)

By Michael Rubin

USA Today, November 27, 2006

As U.S. troops entered Iraq, President Bush promised freedom and democracy. But rather than establish a stable democracy, today terrorists and militias tear the country apart. After billions spent and the sacrifice of almost 3,000 U.S. troops, it is right to ask whether democracy in Iraq was not a fool's dream.

It was not. President Truman faced similar questions about Korea. Critics accused him of embroiling America in open-ended war, ignoring his generals and losing touch with reality. They said democracy was alien to Korean culture. Time proved them wrong. Any juxtaposition of nuclear North Korea with democratic South Korea shows the value of Truman's policy.

Bush was right to liberate Iraq. Saddam Hussein had started two wars, used chemical weapons and subsidized suicide bombers. He claimed to have weapons of mass destruction. Sanctions had collapsed; containment failed.

With military action inevitable, the White House was right to pursue democracy. Cynical realism created Saddam. Iraqis who fled their country, meanwhile, had no problem accepting democracy; Iraq's problem was both its rule of law and its dictator's unaccountability.

What went wrong? Iraq's transformation was undercut by naive faith, not in democracy but rather in diplomacy. Instead of securing Iraq's borders, the Bush administration accepted Syrian and Iranian pledges of non-interference. They believed the canard that Iraq's neighbors sought a stable, secure Iraq. Both countries exploited U.S. trust.

Then, to win United Nations support, the White House defined itself as an occupying power. Overnight, liberation became occupation, and Iraqi democrats became collaborators. To appease Paris and Berlin, the Bush administration justified insurgent rhetoric.

Iraqis embraced democracy, but the wrong kind. U.N. experts sold the White House an election system based on party slates rather than on districts. Any system in which politicians are more accountable to party leaders than constituents, though, encourages ethnic nationalism and sectarian populism. Add militias to the mix, and the result is explosive.

Iraqis greeted U.S. troops as liberators, but the Bush administration fumbled the occupation. Blaming democracy does not address the cause of strife; rather, it absolves policymakers for poor decisions and implementation. Too much is at stake, not only for Iraq but also for U.S. national security, if policymakers learn the wrong lessons.

Michael Rubin is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

'Neocons' Abandon Iraq War At White House Front Door (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

President John F. Kennedy's famous remark that victory has a thousand fathers and that defeat is an orphan couldn't be more apt these days. The intellectual godfathers of the ruinous Iraq war — "neoconservatives" who insisted it would be a breeze to invade Iraq and transform it into a beacon of democracy in the Middle East — are jumping ship and pointing fingers.

DOJ_NMG_0097978

Their scurrying defection is a telling measure of how poorly the war is going and how bleak the outlook is. As of today, U.S. involvement in Iraq will have lasted longer than American participation in World War II. The price in American lives is approaching 3,000; the cost in dollars exceeds $300 billion. The Thanksgiving Day massacre in Baghdad, in which bombings killed and wounded hundreds in a Shiite neighborhood, only underscored Iraq's descent into chaos.

The neoconservative version of history is that the Iraq war was good idea undone by Bush administration incompetence after Saddam Hussein fell. Influential adviser Kenneth Adelman, who famously predicted Iraq would be a "cakewalk," now says, "This didn't have to be managed this bad; it's just awful." Another prime mover behind the war, former assistantDefense secretary Richard Perle, told Vanity Fair: "The decisions did not get made that should have been. … At the end of the day, you have to hold the president responsible."

To blame administration bungling exclusively for the Iraq debacle, however, is to learn the wrong lesson. It's true that the occupation of Iraq was mismanaged from the outset. By failing to guard massive munitions stockpiles, the administration helped arm the insurgency. And by disbanding the Iraqi army, it gave the insurgency men to use those arms. But the mistakes began with the decision to go war itself, a naive and arrogant exercise in wishful thinking that the nation can't afford to repeat.

The pretext, of course, was that Saddam had weapons of mass destruction that represented an imminent threat to U.S. security. In large part, however, the motivation was the neocons' belief — adopted by the administration — that ousting Saddam would create a beachhead for democracy in the Middle East. The effects, the neocons argued, would ripple through the region. The Arab public, inspired by U.S. ideals, would marginalize extremists and dictators alike, bringing peace.

U.S. policymakers would have benefited from more time reading history and less concocting rosy scenarios. In the 1920s, the British similarly believed that democracy could be imposed on a tribal culture accustomed to rule by strongmen. After a few massacres, the British learned their lesson, installed a king and retreated.

Now a bipartisan Iraq Study Group, the Bush administration and Congress are all scrambling to find a way out of the Iraq quagmire. None of the options is appealing or offers the sort of outcome the war's architects envisioned.

It's important not to buy the new self-serving line from the neoconservatives, some of whom are already beating the drums for a pre-emptive attack on Iran's nuclear program. Recovering the international goodwill squandered in Iraq, and dealing wisely with the threats from Iran and North Korea, requires facing the mistakes squarely.

Although, on Sunday, the 1,347-day-old Iraq war was being compared in duration to WWII, the lessons are better drawn from Vietnam. Gen. Colin Powell, secretary of State in President Bush's first term, said his Vietnam generation learned from that experience to go into conflicts only with a defined mission, an overwhelming force and a clear exit strategy — and to reassess quickly if the mission changes. Unfortunately, in Iraq, the Powell Doctrine took a back seat to neoconservative fantasies.

Lawmakers Lose Patience With Iraq Gov't (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, November 27, 2006

Congressional leaders displayed eroding patience in the Iraqi government on Sunday, adding pressure on President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to find a faster path to peace when they meet this week.

"It is not too late. The United States can still extricate itself honorably from an impending disaster in Iraq," Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a potential presidential contender in 2008, said in urging for a planned withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"If the president fails to build a bipartisan foundation for an exit strategy, America will pay a high price for this blunder — one that we will have difficulty recovering from in the years ahead," Hagel wrote in Sunday's Washington Post.

As the U.S. involvement in Iraq surpassed the length of America's participation in World War II, lawmakers have dwindling confidence in the U.S.-supported Iraqi government. It was the deadliest week of sectarian fighting in Baghdad since the war began in March 2003.

"I think what we've got to do is go around the Maliki government in certain situations," said Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, another possible presidential candidate. "Let's work with other groups, and let's get regional buy-in into this."

Bush, after a NATO summit in Europe, plans to meet with al-Maliki on Wednesday and Thursday in Jordan. That summit, coupled with Vice President Dick Cheney's trip to Saudi Arabia on Saturday, is evidence of the administration's stepped-up effort to bring stability to the region.

The host of the meeting, Jordan's King Abdullah, said Sunday the problems in the Middle East go beyond the war in Iraq. He said much of the region soon could become engulfed in violence unless the central issues are addressed quickly.

The king said he was hopeful the leaders will find a way to reduce the level of violence.

"We hope there will be something dramatic. The challenges, obviously, in front of both of them are immense," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0097979

Iraq's leaders promised Sunday to track down those responsible for the recent attacks, and al-Maliki urged his national unity government of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to curb the violence by stopping their public disputes.

The Iraqi prime minister is under pressure from Shiite politicians loyal to the radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr who have threatened to boycott parliament and the Cabinet if al-Maliki meets with Bush.

"This is all political posturing. It's all red herring. It's an anti-threat. This is a very stable government," responded Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie. He said he had no doubt the prime minister would meet with Bush in Jordan.

As for Bush, some of the toughest criticism is coming from within his own party.

"We have misunderstood, misread, misplanned and mismanaged our honorable intentions in Iraq with an arrogant self-delusion reminiscent of Vietnam," said Hagel, a combat veteran of that war. "Honorable intentions are not policies and plans."

Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Senate Democrat, called Iraq the worst U.S. foreign policy decision since Vietnam. He said Democrats do not have a quick answer and any solution must be bipartisan.

"It is time to tell the Iraqis that unless they're willing to disband the militias and the death squads, unless they're willing to stand up and govern their country in a responsible fashion, America is not going to stay there indefinitely," Durbin said.

That theme — pressuring al-Maliki and his government — seemed to unify Republicans and Democrats.

"I think we're going to have to be very aggressive and specific with him," said Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., the incoming No. 2 GOP leader. "And if he doesn't show real leadership, doesn't try to bring the situation under control — if, in fact, he becomes a part of the problem — we're going to have to make some tough decisions."

Yet Rep. Duncan Hunter, the outgoing chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said the United States will win the conflict in the long run by supporting a free government in Iraq. Before any decisions are made on reducing U.S. troop levels, he said, more U.S.-trained Iraqi battalions should be moved into the heavy-fighting areas of Baghdad.

"Saddle those guys up," Hunter said. "Move them into the fight."

Durbin, Brownback and King Abdullah were on "This Week" on ABC. Lott appeared on "Fox News Sunday" and Hunter on "Meet the Press" on NBC. Al-Rubaie was on CNN's "Late Edition."

Lawmakers Criticize Training And Deployment Of Iraqi Forces (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

Two senior members of the House Armed Services Committee and several former Defense Department officials yesterday criticized poor U.S. training and deployment of the Iraqi army and police as a major reason the Baghdad government cannot provide security to its people.

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), chairman of the panel, said that 33 trained Iraqi army battalions, now serving in provinces that are relatively peaceful, should be moved into Baghdad or other areas where there is fighting. "Saddle those guys up, move them into the fight," Hunter said on NBC's "Meet the Press." He added, "Nothing trains a combat unit better than actually being in military operations."

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who next year will take over as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, focused on the Army training of Iraqi units. He said that in many instances "the wrong types" of trainers were given the job.

"I would hope we could stand up their brigades, their battalions, and that they would be effective, and the way to do this is for us to train them better, to have advisers that understand them," Skelton said on NBC.

"What's really fallen down . . . has been the police," said retired Gen. Wayne A. Downing, who headed the Army's Special Operations Command and briefly served after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the Bush White House handling counterterrorism.

"We reconstituted the Iraqi police pretty much in their old image," he told NBC's Tim Russert. "They are corrupt, they are feared by the people, and we recognize this." Downing said that once a Baghdad neighborhood is cleaned up, "we turn it over to the Iraqi police, Tim, and within weeks it's right back to the way it was before."

"We've got to get the Iraqi army and police better equipped, better trained, and into the fight. And I think we've got 24 months," said retired Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey, also on "Meet the Press." He said the Iraqis, now armed with light trucks and small arms, need armored vehicles and air force and support helicopters "to sustain a major internal battle."

Yesterday's criticisms were expanded upon in the latest study by Anthony H. Cordesman, who holds the Arleigh A. Burke Chair in Strategy at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. A Pentagon official in the Reagan administration and a specialist in Middle East intelligence and military matters, Cordesman just returned from Iraq, where he received briefings from military and civilian officials.

One of Cordesman's central issues is that public statements by the Defense Department "severely distorted the true nature of Iraqi force development in ways that grossly exaggerate Iraqi readiness and capability to assume security tasks and replace

DOJ_NMG_0097980

U.S. forces." He also writes that "U.S. official reporting is so misleading that there is no way to determine just how serious the problem is and what resources will be required."

Cordesman says the Pentagon's Aug. 31 status report, which was sent to Congress, lists 312,400 men "trained and equipped" among the Iraqi army and national and regular police. But it adds that "no one knows how many . . . are actually still in service." At the same time, he writes, "all unclassified reporting on unit effectiveness has been cancelled."

Criticizing statements about how many Iraqi army units are "in the lead," Cordesman notes that the Iraqi army "lacks armor, heavy firepower, tactical mobility and an Iraqi Air Force capable of providing combat support" -- the same points McCaffrey made yesterday.

"No administration official has presented any plan to properly equip the Iraqi forces to stand on their own or give them the necessary funding to phase out U.S. combat and air support in 12 to 18 months," Cordesman says. He writes that the Iraqi army could need U.S. support through 2010.

The August Pentagon report says that the Iraqi Ministry of Interior (MOI), which controls the National Police, does not have "an effective management system" and therefore "it is unknown how many of the forces . . . are still employed by the MOI."

Cordesman says attrition is put at "at least 20 percent per year." The Pentagon report also notes problems with the police having ties to militias and warns about "unprofessional and at times criminal behavior" by some units.

Cordesman described the situation as "far worse" with the regular police, where "desertion rates are far higher than with the regular [Army] forces and National Police. He cites the Pentagon report as saying "there is currently no screening process to ascertain militia allegiance" and "no method exists to track the success rate of these or other police officers."

As with the army, Cordesman says he believes it will take three to five years to adequately train Iraqi police officers. He notes, though, that the Pentagon report "makes clear there is no meaningful database on where the maintained and equipped for the regular police actually are, or on the effectiveness of individual units."

Freshman Lawmakers Vow Iraq Visits (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

Capitol Hill freshmen considering changes to Iraq policy next year are scrambling to take trips to the region in order to understand better the consequences of the promise of troop withdrawal, which many of them used to win their elections.

Most freshman Democrats, who appealed to voters frustrated with the war, said they are trying to get onto congressional delegations to Iraq, known as "codels." All the freshman lawmakers interviewed by The Washington Times -- seven personally and several more via spokesmen -- said that the trips are a priority, though none have been scheduled in advance of the 110th Congress' January swearing-in.

"I am anxious to get over there as soon as I can," said Rep.-elect Jerry McNerney, California Democrat. "Iraq is a critical issue that really needs to be resolved, and the more I know about it the more I'll be able to contribute to the solution."

Rep.-elect Tim Walz, Minnesota Democrat, said he knows what it is like to leave a family and life behind when serving in the military.

"I would love to go tomorrow if they would send me," he said. "I need to get there. For me it's very, very personal."

Mr. Walz, a National Guardsman, provided base security for the troops during Operation Enduring Freedom in Afghanistan.

In addition to visiting Iraq, he promises to be a voice for troops, having worked for years to train Guard members and watch over their families. He will support legislation helping veterans and their families with health care and dealing with payday lenders.

Rep. Christopher Shays, who has been to Iraq 14 times, said a more-regular presence of U.S. politicians in the war zone would have prevented many of the worst blunders, including the Abu Ghraib prison scandal.

"All members should go to Iraq, and they should go with an open mind," the Connecticut Republican said. "They should be willing to reevaluate their basic conclusions."

Mr. Shays won re-election despite a tough political environment, in part because he reevaluated his own positions on the war. He said he "saw a lot of mistakes," when visiting, including troops without enough body armor and a lack of money in the field.

"You should go, and not just once," said Mr. Shays, who is making another trip to Iraq in the next few days. "Whether you support it, oppose it or are ambivalent, you absolutely need to go."

Rep.-elect Ed Perlmutter, Colorado Democrat, agreed that a firsthand observation will help incoming freshmen. "Being there would give me a more complete picture," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0097981

"I'd like to go right away," said Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, a Minnesota Democrat who will become the first Muslim congressman in the U.S. "It is up to politicians to make sure that soldiers are in the right place, and to withdraw soldiers when it's clear there is a military operation that has not been successful."

But freshmen must wait for their January swearings-in before congressional offices can arrange a codel.

"I'm not prepared to tell people what they ought to do," said Rep. Frank R. Wolf of Virginia, a Republican who suggested the formation of the Iraq Study Group.

"It isn't like going to see a field if you are surveying agriculture policy," he said, while adding that "you learn a lot. There's nothing like actually seeing, listening, hearing and experiencing."

Mr. Wolf, who has been to Iraq three times, said he always worries about placing others in the delegation in danger. On his first trip, he traveled privately outside of military escort and remembers riding in a beat-up car with a broken windshield and "blood all over the place."

Democrat Rep.-elect Steve Cohen of Tennessee said of visiting Iraq: "I suspect it's something that I should do as part of my duty. I don't look forward to it, but it's a duty probably one should do."

It's unlikely all the freshmen will get to go to Iraq, especially if they are assigned to committees that do not handle war policy or defense issues. Still, even though the freshmen haven't yet seen Iraq with their own eyes, they have strong opinions about what the U.S. should do with the troops.

"Our soldiers are sitting ducks," Mr. Cohen said. "I cannot comprehend a successful resolution, no matter how much money, no matter how many troops we amass. We have created a mess."

"I'd like to see a complete redeployment," Mr. McNerney said.

The freshmen said they are eager to vote on such domestic matters as embryonic stem-cell research and the minimum wage, but said no issue is more pressing than the war.

"It's the big elephant in the room," said Rep.-elect Hank Johnson, Georgia Democrat. "People are ready for the war to come to an end as quickly as it is prudent."

Iraq Study Group Weighs Overture To Iran And Syria (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 26 — A draft report on strategies for Iraq, which will be debated here by a bipartisan commission beginning Monday, urges an aggressive regional diplomatic initiative that includes direct talks with Iran and Syria but sets no timetables for a military withdrawal, according to officials who have seen all or parts of the document.

While the diplomatic strategy appears likely to be accepted, with some amendments, by the 10-member Iraq Study Group, members of the commission and outsiders involved in its work said they expected a potentially divisive debate about timetables for beginning an American withdrawal.

In interviews, several officials said announcing a major withdrawal was the only way to persuade the government of Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, to focus on creating an effective Iraqi military force.

Several commission members, including some Democrats, are discussing proposals that call for a declaration that within a specified period of time, perhaps as short as a year, a significant number of American troops should be withdrawn, regardless of whether the Iraqi government's forces are declared ready to defend the country.

One proposal would involve embedding far more American training teams into Iraqi military units in a last-ditch improvement effort, coupled with a withdrawal that in a year would leave 70,000 to 80,000 American troops in the country, compared with about 150,000 now.

"It's not at all clear that we can reach consensus on the military questions," one member of the commission said late last week.

The draft report, according to those who have seen it, seems to link American withdrawal to the performance of the Iraqi military, as President Bush has done. But details of the performance benchmarks, which were described as not specific, could not be obtained, and it is this section of the report that is most likely to be revised.

While the commission is scheduled to meet here for two days this week, officials say the session may be extended if members have trouble reaching consensus.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush will be visiting Latvia and Estonia, then will head to Amman, Jordan, on Wednesday for two days of meetings with Mr. Maliki and King Abdullah II of Jordan.

The recommendations of the commission, an independent advisory group created at the suggestion of several members of Congress, are expected to carry unusual weight because its members, drawn from both political parties, have deep experience in foreign policy. They include its co-chairmen, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a Republican, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman.

DOJ_NMG_0097982

Though the commission has met many times, interviewing administration officials, policy experts, military officers and others, the meeting here on Monday will be the first time that members have gathered to hash out the most difficult issues.

The basis for their discussion will be a draft report that Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton directed the commission staff to prepare, based on informal conversations among the members.

The group is expected to present its final report to President Bush and to Congress in December.

The commission's co-chairmen have urged members and staff not to discuss their deliberations. As a result, those who were willing to talk about the commission's work and the draft reports did so on the condition of anonymity.

President Bush is not bound by the commission's recommendations, and during a trip to Southeast Asia that ended just before Thanksgiving, he made it clear that he would also give considerable weight to studies under way by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and his own National Security Council.

Last Monday in Bogor, Indonesia, he said he planned to make no decisions on troop increases or decreases "until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military."

But privately, administration officials seem deeply concerned about the weight of the findings of the Baker-Hamilton commission.

"I think there is fear that anything they say will seem like they are etched in stone tablets," said a senior American diplomat. "It's going to be hard for the president to argue that a group this distinguished, and this bipartisan, has got it wrong."

Mr. Bush's nominee for secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, resigned from the commission after his nomination this month, and was replaced by Lawrence S. Eagleburger, another Republican who once was secretary of state. Mr. Gates has said little about his thoughts on military strategy, other than to express amazement when he visited Iraq with the study group over Labor Day that the administration had let the situation spin so far out of control.

Mr. Bush spent 90 minutes with commission members in a closed session at the White House two weeks ago "essentially arguing why we should embrace what amounts to a 'stay the course' strategy," said one commission official who was present.

Officials said that the draft of the section on diplomatic strategy, which was heavily influenced by Mr. Baker, seemed to reflect his public criticism of the administration for its unwillingness to talk with nations like Iran and Syria.

But senior administration officials, including Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, have expressed skepticism that either of those nations would go along, especially while Iran is locked in a confrontation with the United States over its nuclear program. "Talking isn't a strategy," he said in an interview in October.

"The issue is how can we condition the environment so that Iran and Syria will make a 180-degree turn, so that rather than undermining the Iraqi government, they will support it."

Administration officials appear to be taking steps that will enable them to declare that they are already implementing parts of the Baker-Hamilton report, even before its release. On Saturday, Vice President Dick Cheney flew to Saudi Arabia for a meeting with King Abdullah, whom he has known for 17 years.

An official who was briefed on the vice president's trip, and who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about it with reporters, said discussion at the two-hour meeting had covered all the crises in the Middle East.

"The best way to describe it is as a consultation, on a number of issues," that official said. "But because Iraq is such a big issue, it obviously took up a major part of the conversation."

The official said Mr. Cheney had not gone to Riyadh to enlist Saudi help for any specific proposals on Iraq.

During an interview on the ABC News program "This Week" on Sunday, King Abdullah said that his agenda with the president extended beyond Iraq, and that his top concern in the region was the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians — which he called the "core issue" in the Middle East — along with tensions in Lebanon.

But, he said, he was hoping that Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. Maliki would bring about "something dramatic" to stop the violence in Iraq.

Last week, administration officials played down expectations for the meeting with Mr. Maliki. But they are clearly hoping that Mr. Maliki will show a greater willingness to crack down on the Shiite militias, including the militia run by the powerful cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

While it is unclear what private messages Mr. Bush was preparing for Mr. Maliki, the public message will be an eagerness to turn more operational control over to the Iraqis, as soon as they are prepared to handle it.

"Any disarming of the militias — in large part because there is such a political element to that — is most effectively carried out by the Iraqi security forces," said Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor.

Iran Says It's Set To Help U.S. On Iraq (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0097983

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 27, 2006

Iran said Sunday it is willing to help Washington calm Iraq's escalating sectarian violence if the U.S. drops its "bullying" policy toward Tehran, but denied organizing a summit with the leaders of Iraq and Syria to discuss the troubles in its neighbor.

Hardline President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran is "ready to help" the United States, saying the Americans are "trapped in a quagmire" in Iraq.

"The Iranian nation is ready to help you to get out of the quagmire — on condition that you resume behaving in a just manner and avoid bullying and invading," he said while addressing members of the Basij paramilitary group, which is affiliated with Iran's Revolutionary Guard.

The White House, which is under pressure at home and abroad to approach Iran and Syria for help with Iraq, played down Ahmadinejad's offer.

"The Iranians have made comments similar to this in the past. There's nothing new there," State Department spokeswoman Julie Reside said in Washington.

Engaging with Iraq's neighbors is believed to be one of the recommendations by a panel on Iraq led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III.

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini, meanwhile, denied reports of a summit involving Iraq and Syria, saying it was never on Iran's agenda.

"Such a summit needs certain preliminaries," he said, but did not give details.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was scheduled to visit Tehran on Saturday, but had to postpone his trip because Baghdad's airport was closed in a security clampdown after an upsurge in violence. Syria never said whether President Bashar Assad had intended to go.

Hosseini confirmed Iran had invited Assad for an official visit and said Talabani would visit at some point.

Iran is believed to back Iraqi Shiite militias blamed for sectarian attacks that have killed thousands this year. Iran has repeatedly denied the charges.

Had the summit been held, it would have preceded President Bush's scheduled meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan on Wednesday and Thursday.

Vice President Dick Cheney was in Saudi Arabia, a U.S. ally and another one of Iraq's neighbors, over the weekend.

The unusual succession of trips appeared to reflect U.S. determination to rally allies at a time when Washington is considering changing its Iraq policy.

But one of the major sources of tension between Tehran and Washington — Iran's nuclear program — appears at a standstill. The U.S. alleges Iran is secretly developing atomic weapons, while Tehran claims its program is for peaceful purposes including generating electricity.

Iran has repeatedly refused to suspend uranium enrichment, defying an Aug. 31 deadline set by the U.N. Security Council, and has said it will not halt the process as a precondition to negotiations over its nuclear program.

Hosseini on Sunday promised improved cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency if the U.N. nuclear watchdog, rather than the Security Council, takes charge of Iran's nuclear dossier. Iran has made similar promises in the past.

"If the case is returned to the agency itself, it would be possible to review current ambiguities better than before," Hosseini said. "The agency is the best and the most qualified body for the case."

The IAEA officially turned over Iran's dossier to the Security Council last February after Iran failed to answer key questions about its nuclear activities.

Last week, the IAEA rejected Iran's request for assistance building a heavy-water nuclear reactor because of the dispute.

"It is part of the agency's duties to help member countries. None of our activities have been illegal. Inspectors can inspect them," Hosseini said.

The Security Council, meanwhile, is deadlocked over how to sanction Iran for ignoring demands to stop uranium enrichment. Russia and China, both trade partners with Iran, have called for a diplomatic resolution rather than punitive measures, which Washington is urging.

Talks Aim To Counter Tehran (WT)

By Harry De Quetteville

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

JERUSALEM -- A weeklong, high-stakes diplomatic offensive for control of the Middle East is gathering steam as the Bush administration rallies allies against Iran's growing influence in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0097984

The diplomatic push, which began with Vice President Dick Cheney's visit to Saudi Arabia on Saturday, will climax with President Bush's meeting later this week with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan.

The goal is to marshal a force of friendly Sunni regimes against the radical leadership of Shi'ite Iran, which Washington thinks is trying to develop a nuclear bomb.

Leaders from two crucial members of that Sunni bloc -- Jordan and Turkey -- met for emergency talks Saturday to discuss the implications of the diplomatic drive. After the meetings, held in Amman, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said the Bush and al-Maliki summit was crucial for the fate of the region.

Jordan's King Abdullah II said yesterday on ABC's "This Week" that something "dramatic" must come out of the summit. He said the two leaders must find ways to reconcile Iraq's various factions "and they need to do it now, because, obviously, as we're seeing, things are beginning to spiral out of control."

The U.S.-led alliance is attempting to mobilize a "Sunni crescent" of friendly countries, running from Oman in the east of the Persian Gulf, through Yemen and Saudi Arabia westward to Jordan, Turkey and Egypt.

It is designed to counter what many Sunni states fear is a rapidly emerging "Shi'ite crescent" of influence, that runs from Iran to Lebanon and could spread by inciting revolt among Shi'ite elements of their own populations.

The rivalry and mistrust between Sunnis and Shi'ites was exemplified in elections Saturday in Bahrain, which -- like Iraq before the U.S. invasion -- is a majority-Shi'ite country led by a Sunni minority.

In a sign of increasing Shi'ite self-confidence, parliamentary elections under way there have been racked by vocal opposition from the Shi'ites, who say the election was rigged to favor Sunnis.

But it is mixed-faith Iraq that lies at the heart of the weeklong diplomatic drive.

Caught between the jaws of the two sectarian crescents, Iraq was torn apart last week by bombs and tit-for-tat killings that threaten to devolve into an all-out civil war between its Sunni and Shi'ite communities.

In a signal of Iran's own diplomatic ambitions for the region, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani had been scheduled to meet his Iranian counterpart, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, at a summit in Tehran on Saturday, possibly with Syria attending.

But while the summit was postponed because of a curfew that means even Mr. Talabani cannot fly out of Baghdad, Iranian sources say Tehran feels it is holding all the cards as it squares up to the United States in the battle for regional influence.

"Iran is able to end the bombing campaign in Iraq and is willing to use its force to call it off -- if the world gives it the future role that it expects in Iraq," said one seasoned observer in the Iranian capital, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

"It's a big give-and-take situation, in which no matter where you look, Iran ends up with much more in her basket than the USA."

Despite Iranian boasts that it can control Shi'ite violence in Iraq, the dominant militia force on the streets of Baghdad remains the Mahdi's Army militia of the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

While Sheik al-Sadr is Shi'ite, he is not directly loyal to Tehran, and it remains unlikely that he will cheaply call off the force that has made him, both militarily and politically, one of the most powerful voices in Iraq.

He has threatened to exert that authority by withdrawing his support from the Iraqi government, effectively bringing it down, if the Bush and al-Maliki summit is held as planned. But the White House has insisted that the summit will go ahead.

The '39 Parallel? (WT)

By Dan Burton

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

On Aug. 23, 1939, Soviet Foreign Minister Vyacheslav Molotov stunned the world by signing the Nazi-Soviet Non-aggression Pact under the watchful eyes of German Foreign Minister Joachim Von Ribbentrop and Soviet leader Josef Stalin. With the sweep of a pen Soviet Russia paved the way for the beginning of World War II by assuring Hitler he would not have to fight a war on two fronts. That error in judgment cost roughly 62 million people across the globe their lives; including 6 million Jews and 23 million Russians.

Sixty-seven years later it seems that once again Russia has yielded to the destructive ambitions of a tyrant and an anti-Semite. By refusing to support tough sanctions on Iran over its dangerous nuclear enrichment program, Russia is once again exposing the world to unimaginable carnage, certainly much worse than that of World War II. While Russia's failure to learn from history is particularly shocking, and has made it the chief stumbling block to the U.N. confronting Iran, it is not alone in averting its gaze from the pending disaster, as detailed below.

Tehran claims its nuclear program is a peaceful one, designed to generate electricity, but many outside experts and leaders acknowledge that Iran is attempting to achieve a nuclear weapons capability. Even the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) says it cannot verify that Iran's program -- concealed from U.N. inspectors for many years -- is purely peaceful. In fact, the IAEA stated in its Jan. 31 and Feb. 27 reports that documents found by IAEA inspectors show a possible "military nuclear dimension" to Iran's program.

DOJ_NMG_0097985

But is the world acting to end this threat? Clearly not. Instead, the United Nations, Russia, China, the European Union, many in Congress and some high-ranking officials in the State Department all believe that we can negotiate with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Of greater concern, the Iraq Study Group, chaired by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, is expected to make similar recommendations as the centerpiece of its broadly anticipated blueprint for turning the course in Iraq. All of these people seem to believe that Mr. Ahmadinejad can be persuaded to give up his nuclear ambitions. Similarly, in September 1938, the great European powers and the League of Nations believed that Hitler could be persuaded to give up his ambition of conquest by simply giving him Czechoslovakia's Sudetenland. However, almost exactly a year later Hitler derided the agreement as just a "scrap of paper" and invaded Poland igniting World War II.

The proponents of appeasement failed the world in 1939 and they will also fail today. Namely, those political leaders here at home and abroad who preach "dialogue" with Iran and rapid redeployment from Iraq -- based on an artificial timetable, and regardless of the situation left behind -- are risking the same big mistake. Such a move will undoubtedly be viewed as a victory in Tehran, just as Hitler viewed the Munich Agreement as a major victory that confirmed his impression of a world unwilling to stop his march. Unfortunately for the world, this is the nuclear age and the consequences of failure this time around could literally bring the end of civilization.

To Hitler, the process of diplomacy was only a farce to prevent sanctions that would constrain Germany's rearmament and preparations for war. Every withdrawal by the allies simply served to strengthen Hitler's determination to conquer. Similarly, to Mr. Ahmadinejad, the process of diplomacy is simply a facade meant to prevent sanctions that would constrain Iran's nuclear weapons development and its preparations for war. Make no mistake, Iran is not only preparing for war, but preparing to carry out a new holocaust, perhaps more destructive than the last one (which Mr. Ahmadinejad despicably denies, even while the last of its survivors still walk the Earth).

The proof can be found in Mr. Ahmadinejad's own words. On Oct. 26, 2005, he stated at a Tehran conference titled "A World Without Zionism" that "Israel should be wiped off the map" and that "anybody who recognizes Israel will burn in the fire of the Islamic nations' fury." On Dec. 9 and Dec. 14, 2005, and again on May 28, he questioned the veracity of the Holocaust. In the Dec. 14 case, he called it a "myth" -- and stated that Europe should create a Jewish state in Europe, not in the Middle East.

To mark "Quds" day on Oct. 20 -- an Iranian "holiday" calling for war against Israel under the premise of "liberating" Jerusalem -- Iranian newspapers Kehyan and Resalat, both controlled by the government, published editorials urging Muslims around the world to prepare for a "great war" to destroy Israel.

I agree with Israeli Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who said recently that Tehran's nuclear and missile program "goes way beyond the destruction of Israel -- it is directed to achieve world-wide range. It's a global program in the service of a mad ideology." He went on to say: "Israel would certainly be the first stop on Iran's tour of destruction, but at the planned production rate of 25 nuclear bombs a year ... [the arsenal] will be directed against 'the big Satan,' the U.S., and the 'moderate Satan,' Europe."

No one cared to imagine the worst in 1939, and many seem unprepared to imagine the worst now. Once again, millions of innocent people could pay the price for our folly. History has looked back upon 1938 and 1939 as one of the great "ifs" of the 20th century: If only the Allies had stood up to Hitler; if only the Soviet Union hadn't signed the non-aggression pact with Hitler. I do not want history to look back upon 2006 and 2007 -- assuming there is a civilization capable of looking back -- as the great "if" of the 21st century. Have we not learned from so recent a history with so many parallels?

There is still time for the world to wake up and realize that no conceivable carrot will persuade the leadership in Tehran not to acquire nuclear weapons. If allowed to, it will surely use them as leverage to impose its will and, in the end, deploy them to unleash an apocalypse. We must summon the political will and vision to do whatever it takes to eliminate Tehran's nuclear program now. If we wait additional years, our capability to stop these nuclear madmen will simply cease to exist.

The New Middle East (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

Last week's murder in Beirut of Lebanese cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel was followed by demonstrations by Sunnis and Christians denouncing the likeliest culprits: Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah and Syrian President Bashar Assad. This week, Hezbollah is expected to hold mass rallies of its own against the anti-Syrian government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora. The stage is now set for a showdown between the two sides, and perhaps civil war.

It's worth recalling how we got to this point, and the role that Bush Administration policies have played since the Cedar Revolution evicted Mr. Assad's army from Lebanon in the spring of 2005. President Bush withdrew his ambassador to Damascus following the February 2005 assassination of former Lebanese premier Rafik Hariri and later gave diplomatic support to the anti-

DOJ_NMG_0097986

Syrian coalition that came to power three months later. The Administration has also backed the U.N. investigation into the Hariri murder that implicates Syria and which, if Mr. Siniora's government can survive, will lead to a trial sometime next year.

Those were the successes. The mistakes include a decision not to respond to Hariri's murder by seeking regime change in Syria, as none other than the French were urging at the time. Mr. Assad has repaid this restraint by maneuvering for nearly two years to overturn the results of the Cedar Revolution, and somehow his opponents in Lebanon keep being murdered.

Nor were matters helped by the U.N. ceasefire resolution arranged by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that ended the war Hezbollah started against Israel last summer. The war was incompetently prosecuted by the Israelis, but a few more weeks of fighting might have destroyed the Shiite group as a military organization and thus spared Lebanon its current predicament. Instead, Ms. Rice intervened with a resolution that allowed Hezbollah to emerge claiming victory while offering no real guarantees that it will ever be disarmed.

Worse, the Administration acquiesced in a deal arranged between Mr. Assad and U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan whereby Syria -- hitherto the principal conduit of arms to Hezbollah -- is supposed to prevent the flow of weapons to the group. The Jerusalem Post recently reported that arms are moving across the Syria-Lebanon border "by the truckload."

But the greatest failure is that the Administration has never really settled on a policy toward Syria. Mr. Bush signed the Syria Accountability and Lebanese Sovereignty Restoration Act in 2003 but opted to impose only the two weakest sanctions on the list provided by Congress. The U.S. has repeatedly accused Damascus of providing material support for the insurgency in Iraq, but it has never acted in a way that would show Mr. Assad it is serious about stopping him. Predator strikes against terrorist bases in Syria were ruled out.

The Administration has also failed to lend any meaningful support to the National Salvation Front, the leading Syrian opposition group, apparently because it includes members of the Muslim Brotherhood as well as former regime elements. But as Ammar Abdulhamid, a leading member of the NSF who is also a secular democrat, points out, "controversial figures will always be involved in opposition work. You can't look at [the NSF] as a change to the most wonderful democratic system in the world. But you do need to break the stalemate and introduce a new dynamic."

Now the U.S. foreign-policy establishment is talking about the need to "engage" Damascus, and a weakened Bush Administration might be tempted to appease the Assad clan. The result is likely to be more of "the new Middle East" now on display in Lebanon.

Angry Shiites Hurl Stones At Maliki's Motorcade (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, November 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Angry Shiite Muslims pelted Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's motorcade with stones today after the Iraqi leader pleaded for national reconciliation at a memorial in Sadr City held for victims of a large-scale bombing attack last week.

Maliki, who is also a Shiite, left the scene after he tried without success to calm a crowd of mourners calling for revenge against Sunni Arabs. His pleas were met with shouts of "coward" and "collaborator."

Thursday's series of suicide and car bombings killed at least 215 people inside the Shiite neighborhood on the eastern edge of Baghdad, worsening the country's civil war.

Iraqi political leaders have sought to rein in the violence. Baghdad's international airport was closed on Thursday and a general curfew imposed, and the measures continued today.

The heckling by Maliki's fellow Shiites came after a Baghdad meeting at which he appealed for peace, standing alongside Iraq's Kurdish president, Jalal Talabani, as well as the speaker of parliament and a vice president, both Sunnis. However, even state television on today substituted its usual placid rhetoric with footage of the Shiite deputy health minister lashed out at residents of various Sunni neighborhoods, accusing them of fostering violence.

Mortars fired from the southern edge of Sadr City today hit an American military base, starting a fire. Others were directed at the predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Amariyah, a U.S. military spokesman said.

"I can confirm there was a strike, but I'm not going to give out any assessment," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, the spokesman for U.S. forces in Baghdad.

When asked about what the U.S. military is doing to counter the violence in the capital, he said he would not comment for "operational reasons." He added that American forces are "working hand-in-hand with the Iraqi security forces [to create] the most secure environment."

But Sunnis in several Baghdad neighborhoods say they have seen few American patrols and that Iraqi security forces are either not doing anything to protect the Sunnis or are even complicit in the killing of Sunnis.

DOJ_NMG_0097987

In Hurriya, one neighborhood where Shiite militias have driven out most of the Sunni residents, Iraqi police and soldiers stood by Friday as other uniformed men in police vehicles launched rocket-propelled grenades into houses and fired their guns at Sunni mosques, according to a policeman who was present.

The head of the Sunni bloc, Adnan Dulaimi, came under attack in Baghdad's Adel neighborhood today. For an hour, his guards held off armed men who had already lobbed mortar shells toward his house but missed. Eventually, Iraqi and American forces arrived and the gunmen fled, Dulaimi said in an interview later.

Mortar shells continued to slam down on other Baghdad neighborhoods today, inflicting death and injury on both sides of the sectarian divide, Iraqi authorities reported. In the mainly Shiite neighborhood of Karada, two shells killed four civilians and injured five, including the imam of the Zuwiya Mosque. The wounded were taken to Ibn Nafis Hospital, where armed men later tried to break in. Police guarding the hospital fought the attackers, eventually repelling them as reinforcements arrived.

In Mashtal, a mixed area in eastern Baghdad, a mortar shell injured four. Another hit the Sunni enclave of Ghazaliya, west of the Tigris River, but there were no reports of injuries.

In fighting elsewhere, Iraqi authorities reported that a car bomb in Haswah, about 40 miles south of Baghdad, killed seven civilians. Two local council members were gunned down by drive by assassins in Hillah, about 55 miles south of the capital.

The continued fighting also took a bloody toll in Diyala province, just north of Baghdad.

Twelve police officers were kidnapped after they ran out of ammunition during a shootout at a checkpoint near the Shiite village of Dujayl.

In a raid near Kanan on Saturday night, men wearing Iraqi military uniforms seized 25 Shiite men. In the Sunni city of Baqubah, seven teenagers were found handcuffed, blindfolded and executed with bullets to their forehead. Gangs also looted the city's library, stealing computers, books and furniture.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military announced that American forces had killed four suspected insurgents and detained eleven others. One insurgent was found hiding in a house, dressed as a woman and pretending to nurse a baby.

On Saturday, a soldier assigned to the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division was killed by a roadside bomb in the province. Two U.S. Marines were killed in separate attacks in Al Anbar province on Saturday, according to a U.S. military statement.

The American military also announced the discovery of 11 bodies in Al Anbar last week. "The 10 men and one youth died from apparent gunshots," the statement said. A burned-out van was found nearby.

Police in Ramadi reported bloody clashes between local tribes and groups affiliated with Al Qaeda. It was unclear how many, if any, were killed.

When Will Iraqi Troops Be Ready? (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 27, 2006

FALLUJAH AND BAGHDAD, IRAQ

After the most lethal string of attacks on Shiites since 2003 over the weekend, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki blasted politicians Sunday for divisions that encourage carnage and called for unity in the face of deepening civil war. "The ones who can stop further deterioration and bloodshed are the politicians," he said, adding that all must first realize there "are no winners and losers in this battle."

When he meets with President Bush in Jordan this week, both leaders will be looking for signs that the Iraqi forces are closer to being able to ensure calm, without leaning on the US military.

While the Iraqi police and army are dominated by Shiites, Iraq's forces may be the last, imperfect hope of preventing all-out civil war. But if the difficulties the US military faces in training Iraqi soldiers in Fallujah is any indication, future stability is uncertain.

Despite three days of blanket curfew that has tempered revenge violence, expectations are growing among Iraqis that the death toll of more than 200 last Thursday will prompt an irreversible slide. Even under the curfew, scores of Iraqis have turned up dead, in clear Shiite vs. Sunni murders. Mortars continued to slam into parts of Baghdad on Sunday.

In a reflection of the popular anger over the killings, Mr. Maliki's motorcade was stoned and the premier jostled by fellow Shiites during a visit to the scene of the carnage in Baghdad's Sadr City Sunday. US 'transition teams'

To better prepare Iraqi forces to deal with the escalating security situation, more than 400 US military "transition teams" are living with and advising Iraqi units across the country, including in Fallujah, the former insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad.

"I've seen progress go from OK to somewhat better, [but] we're nowhere near done," says US Army Capt. Jonathan Stewart, a member of the team advising the Iraqi Army's 1st Battalion, 2nd Brigade, 1st Division, deployed in Fallujah.

DOJ_NMG_0097988

"These guys can fight, but in terms of logistics they need us," says Captain Stewart, from Rogersville, Ala. "They are not capable of taking control of the fight."

US efforts to build Iraqi forces from scratch have been plagued by problems in the 3-1/2 years since US occupation authorities decreed the disbanding of Iraq's 400,000-strong military forces. Fledgling units have been targeted repeatedly by insurgents, resulting in the deaths of several thousand recruits. Sectarianism in the forces

Sectarianism has defined some forces, too, as Shiite militiamen and Sunni insurgents infiltrated the ranks. During times of unrest, entire units have simply melted away, rather than face down Shiite gunmen during a 2004 uprising in Najaf, south of Baghdad, and Baghdad's Sadr City slum, or Sunni militants during fighting that year in Fallujah.

"They could have very good military and police forces, but if the population is not behind you, it won't work," says US Army Major Patrick Semon, a Fallujah-training team member from Pittsburgh, Pa. His team has worked with the Iraqi battalion for five months. Other US advisers began with the unit some 18 months before that.

In some areas of Fallujah, such as Jolan, where insurgents are making a comeback, "they hate us all, Americans and Iraqi Army alike, [and] will cut your throat just as soon as look at you," says US Army Maj. Michael Mundell, from Radcliff, Ky. Other areas of Fallujah, he says, range from "indifference to grudging acceptance, to 'Hi, how are you?' "

But in Fallujah, the Iraqi Army is made up largely of Shiites, and deeply distrusts the police - which are all local Sunnis. The first boot camp earlier this year, aimed at ushering Sunnis into the Iraqi Army and staged in Al-Anbar Province which includes Fallujah, was "disastrous," says one senior US marine officer.

Of nearly 800 recruits in the five-week course, up to 500 decided to leave when they learned they could be deployed anywhere in Iraq, and not just Sunni areas, says the officer. The two or three subsequent classes have had higher rates of retention, but US advisers say many more troops are needed.

"They don't have enough soldiers," says Major Mundell, noting that the 2,500 Iraqi soldiers in Fallujah - at least, that is the number deployed on paper - should have double the strength to be effective. "We need another brigade in this city; another two brigades to clean it out [of insurgents]."

But those numbers are not likely to change before US forces pull out of Fallujah in coming months. Except for the 11-man US training teams, less than 300 US marines now work in Fallujah. And already, for months, insurgents have targeted policemen - many of which have been slain - and Army units.

The army positions are routinely mortared. A popular company commander was killed by a roadside bomb a few weeks ago, which shook up some units. One captain did not return to duty last week, after his family was threatened. A battalion surgeon was recently murdered, and when an officer went to identify the body, he, too, was shot.

"These guys are never going to be a US infantry battalion, but they've got to be good enough," says Mundell.

"It can be successful, but they need more resources," says Major Semon.

The challenge is growing. Insurgent attacks have spiked in Fallujah, as they have taken an increasing toll on Iraqis. The United Nations puts the number at more than 3,700 dead nationwide in October alone. The New York Times reported Sunday that a secret US government report found that the insurgency has become self-sustaining, with an income from oil smuggling, kidnapping, and other criminal activity estimated between $70 million to $200 million.

Aware of the battles ahead, the government on Sunday appealed for calm in a joint statement from Shiite, Sunni, and ethnic Kurdish leaders: "Do not let those who are depriving you of security impinge on your unity," the statement read. "They want to drag you all into angry reactions."

Leaders also made a vow: "We promise the great martyrs that we will chase the killers and criminals, the terrorists, Saddamists and Takfiri (Sunni extremists) for viciously trying to divide you."

Iraqi Premier Blames Politicians For Violence (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 26 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Sunday that Iraq's politicians were largely responsible for the surge in violence that engulfed the country over the past week, a departure from his previous assertions blaming militants for inciting the mayhem.

"These actions are at most the reflection of political backgrounds and wills and sometimes the reflection of dogmatic, perverted backgrounds and wills," Mr. Maliki said. "The crisis is political, and the ones who can stop the cycle of aggravation and bloodletting of innocents are the politicians." He said politicians must work harder to stop the violence.

Mr. Maliki spoke at a news conference just a few days before he was to meet with President Bush to discuss the deteriorating security situation in Iraq. The remarks were an acknowledgment of the political nature of the war here and placed responsibility on political leaders for achieving peace.

DOJ_NMG_0097989

The war is being driven by leaders of Sunni and Shiite militias vying for dominance and has spiraled into a pattern of revenge killings and rival sects driving each other out of neighborhoods.

Mr. Maliki spoke after a meeting of an advisory security council of Iraq's top politicians, including himself, the president and the speaker of Parliament. The council has met in recent days in an attempt to quell the tensions after the killings of more than 200 people by bombings in a Shiite district of Baghdad on Thursday, the deadliest single attack since the American invasion. The next day, vengeful Shiite militiamen attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and in the nearby city of Baquba.

Mr. Maliki said the members of the security council would work to bring together clashing political groups in Iraq. He did not identify the specific groups. In a show of unity, Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, appeared at the news conference alongside President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, and Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a conservative Sunni Arab.

Mr. Maliki is scheduled to meet with President Bush in Amman, Jordan, on Wednesday and Thursday. The two are expected to talk about the widening sectarian war in Iraq and to try to reach agreement on ways to stop it. Tension has been rising between their governments, as officials from each have debated pursuing different policies in the face of continuing violence.

In the afternoon, Mr. Maliki attended a funeral in Sadr City, the district bombed Thursday and a base of support for Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric who lends political support to Mr. Maliki. The funeral was for four brothers killed in the bombings, a Sadr official said. Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, is believed responsible for many of the directed killings here.

Despite a curfew in Baghdad in effect since the Thursday bombings, deadly violence continued. Mortar rounds landed near a Shiite mosque downtown, killing two and wounding at least two others, an Interior Ministry official said. An American military spokesman said indirect fire — meaning mortar shells or rockets — landed near an American base, but he gave no report of casualties. The projectiles came from an area near Sadr City, the military said.

Violence erupted in other parts of the country. A suicide car bomb exploded at a police checkpoint in the town of Iskandariya, killing at least eight people and wounding at least 26 others, a police official said. In Diyala Province, east of Baghdad, the police found at least eight bodies, while gunmen kidnapped at least 25 people from Hadaf village. On a highway south of Tikrit, Saddam Hussein's hometown, gunmen abducted eight policemen from a checkpoint.

The American military announced Sunday that a patrol found 11 bodies on Wednesday about 18 miles west of Haqlaniya, in Anbar Province. There were 10 men and one child or teenager, and all had apparently died from gunfire, the military said. A burned-out van was found nearby.

An American soldier was killed and two were wounded by a roadside bomb explosion in Diyala Province on Saturday, the military said. Two marines died in separate attacks in Anbar Province on Saturday.

The military also said a detainee died Saturday at Camp Bucca, an American-run detention center in southern Iraq, from what appeared to be natural causes.

In Basra, gunmen killed at least three people on Sunday, police officials said, and a roadside bomb south of the city killed one person.

A Day When Mahdi Army Showed Its Other Side (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov 26 -- In the chaos, Ayad al-Fartoosi thrived.

Against a backdrop of death and panic in Sadr City last Thursday, he strode confidently through streets littered with burning cars and charred bodies. At one moment, he was guiding an ambulance carrying bomb victims through traffic. At another, he was searching cars at a checkpoint. By evening, he had helped to seize a would-be car bomber and to retrieve corpses. By nightfall, he was patrolling the streets of his neighborhood.

Since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, Fartoosi has been a militiaman with the Shiite Muslim Mahdi Army of firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Last week, he also served as a relief worker, a policeman, a traffic controller and a guard.

So did thousands of his militia comrades who mobilized to assist victims of the deadliest attack on Iraqis since the invasion, highlighting the power associated with the Mahdi Army's less-publicized roles in Iraqi society.

"We do even more than what the government should do," said Fartoosi, 21, as he recalled the eight grueling hours after a barrage of car bombs, mortars and missiles killed more than 200 people in Baghdad's Shiite heartland.

For U.S. officials, dismantling the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias that have fomented sectarian strife in Iraq is a cornerstone of their calculus to stabilize Iraq and bring U.S. troops home. They view it as a crucial step toward isolating the Sunni Arab insurgency and reconciling the nation.

DOJ_NMG_0097990

But the attacks Thursday illustrated the immense difficulties involved in tackling the Mahdi Army, the country's largest and most violent militia, in today 's Iraq. The militiamen were heroes that day, Sadr City residents said in interviews. They did everything that Iraq's fragile unity government did not, or could not, do. In the days since, their actions have boosted Sadr's popularity and emboldened him.

"The Mahdi Army are the people who helped us after the explosion," said Shihab Ahmed, 24, a salesman who was wounded by flying shrapnel. "They saved us."

Against this backdrop, President Bush is scheduled to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday in Amman, Jordan. U.S. officials have grown increasingly impatient with Maliki for his inability, or lack of will, to confront the Mahdi Army and other militias, who operate unchallenged. Some U.S. lawmakers on Sunday television talk shows called for Sadr's arrest and for Bush to urge Maliki to take stronger measures against the militias.

But Maliki, faced with his own domestic pressures, has opted for a softer approach, preferring political discussions over military muscle. The support of Sadr, whose party controls four ministries and 30 parliamentary seats, is vital to his remaining in power. Other powerful political blocs, capable of staging his downfall, also operate militias.

Maliki and other Shiite leaders have said they will not go after the Shiite militias as long as the Sunni insurgency remains a threat. In recent months, Maliki has publicly chastised U.S. forces for conducting raids in Sadr City, arguing that they disrupt his efforts at national reconciliation. Many Shiites view the militias as their last bastion of protection against Sunni extremists and loyalists of Saddam Hussein.

Thursday's attacks, which Maliki blamed on Sunni insurgents, has bolstered this view and ratcheted up pressure on the prime minister. The next day, Sadr politicians vowed to walk out of the government if Maliki did not back out of a meeting with Bush.

On Sunday, Maliki was met with small protests when he visited Sadr City to offer his condolences to the families of those killed in Thursday's bombings. As he drove off, several youths threw stones at his motorcade, according to local newscasts.

"Maliki, we know, is under pressure from the Americans," said Kareem Hendul, a Sadr official. "But he should realize who brought him to the chair of government. We brought him to power."

The Mahdi Army's response to the bombings suggests that diplomatic pressure alone will not be enough to dismantle the militias. As long as Iraq's security forces are ineffective and the government and its U.S. patrons are unable to provide basic services and jobs, Sadr and his army are vital to Shiites.

Sadr is widely believed to be modeling his movement after Lebanon's Shiite Muslim Hezbollah, which has both an armed and a political wing and provides social services to its followers.

"It has proved there is no need to disarm the Mahdi Army," Salim Faisal Abid, 36, a Sadr City resident, said Friday. "If they were not there yesterday, it would have been a disaster."

On Thursday afternoon, bombs in six parked cars began detonating at 15-minute intervals in three sections of Sadr City, including the crowded Jamila Market. Mahdi Army militiamen quickly spread out around the vast slum, residents said.

They helped the injured into cars and carted the dead to funeral homes, where the corpses would be cleansed according to Muslim rituals. Some donated blood and helped fire fighters douse flames. Other militiamen, some clutching AK-47 assault rifles or rocket-propelled grenades, searched for the perpetrators of the bombings. They found one more car, filled with explosives, and took the driver into custody.

At Khadisiya Hospital, militiamen assisted doctors and nurses, carrying patients into emergency rooms, Abid said. With hospital supplies thin, Sadr officials sent over syringes, medicines and other equipment donated by merchants. And with only four ambulances in circulation, most of the wounded were being brought in cars.

"Most of the cars were Mahdi Army, or Mahdi Army men were inside to carry in the wounded," Abid said.

Others fanned out to protect their neighborhoods. On nearly every street, heavily armed militiamen stood guard, residents said. Concrete barriers and barbed wire were quickly erected, closing off streets to unfamiliar cars to prevent further attacks.

Entry and exit into Sadr City were controlled. When he learned of the bombings, Hendul said, he rushed to Sadr City. But the militiamen at the checkpoints refused to let him enter. He showed his Sadr identification cards, but they wouldn't budge.

"They prevented me from coming inside until they made phone calls to check who I was," Hendul recalled Friday. "Yesterday was a good example of how we can handle security. Our city can protect itself better than the government."

In interviews, residents said they did not see Iraqi army units entering Sadr City after the bombings. Nor were there any American soldiers, they said. Members of Iraq's majority Shiite police force were working hand in hand with the militiamen, residents said. "Eighty percent of them are the people who fight the Americans when they come," Abid said. "I haven't seen any Iraqi troops. I heard Iraqi troops were in other areas, but only setting up checkpoints and not helping move the wounded and the dead."

DOJ_NMG_0097991

On Friday morning, Mahdi Army and Sadr officials arranged a massive funeral procession to the southern holy city of Najaf, the burial ground for Shiites. The militiamen secured the highway from Baghdad to Najaf, a road on which criminal gangs often prey on travelers. Most of the funeral expenses were paid by Sadr's office.

The Mahdi Army "had a very respectful position, and they were with us throughout the whole thing," said Ali Abu Karar, who came to Najaf to bury his 16-year-old cousin, Ammar. "We arrived here, and we found every thing ready and the graves already dug."

More than 100 people helped dig graves, said one of the volunteers, Abu Mustafa, adding that Sadr had given the order. "Now the coffins are arriving, and whatever the people need we have orders to provide it to them," he said.

Over the weekend, groups of Sadr officials and Mahdi Army militiamen visited the relatives of victims in large funeral tents erected in front of their houses, a tradition across Iraq. They brought food and envelopes of money, Fartoosi said.

They promised the families of the dead and wounded that Sadr's office would give them financial support, food and clothing in the coming months. "And because of the bad conditions of the hospitals in the city, the Sadr office will be providing medicines, medical equipment like needles, syringes, to those who cannot afford it," Fartoosi said. "We give them respect so they feel someone is taking care of them."

Now, like many militiamen, Fartoosi is certain the Mahdi Army cannot be dismantled.

"It is not possible to disarm the Mahdi Army because these weapons we are using are to defend the innocent people and not to kill the innocent, to help the persecuted people against the persecutors," he said. "I would not hand over my gun to Maliki, or to that damned Bush, even if they ask me to."

Dozens Killed In Iraq Attacks (WP)

By Nancy Trejos And Saad Al-Izzi

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 26 -- Gunfights broke out and mortar shells came crashing down on parts of the capital Sunday despite a three-day-old curfew and appeals for calm from Iraq's top Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish political leaders.

"Don't give those who are depriving you of security a chance to impinge on your unity," the leaders said in a joint statement broadcast on national television, vowing to find out who was responsible for car bombings Thursday that killed more than 200 residents in Sadr City, a Shiite Muslim stronghold in Baghdad. "They want to drag you to angry reactions."

Tit-for-tat violence continued Sunday, as a gun battle erupted following afternoon prayers in the Sunni Arab neighborhood of Ghazaliya in west Baghdad. Shiite militiamen have attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq since the Sadr City bombings.

Residents in Ghazaliya described a harrowing scene in which Shiite militiamen opened fire with machine guns and lobbed mortars and grenades at the al-Hadithi and al-Muhajirin Sunni mosques and at a nearby market. They said the militiamen were aided in the attack by Iraqi security forces. As many as 45 people were killed and several houses destroyed, residents said.

In Baqubah, north of Baghdad, Iraqi security forces battled Sunni insurgents for a second day. Southwest of Baqubah, armed men took over a police station and burned six vehicles as police fled. They then replaced the Iraqi flag with that of a Sunni Arab insurgent group.

In Baghdad, two mortar shells hit a U.S. military post in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Baladiyat. Two shells fell on a house across the street from a Shiite mosque in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, not far from the Green Zone, where the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi government are located. Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said four people were injured in the attack.

The government planned to lift the curfew Monday. But fear ran high that the fighting would not end, as clashes in Ghazaliya and elsewhere illustrated the inability of Iraqi security forces to rein in the violence that has propelled the country closer to full-blown civil war. U.S. leaders are hoping that the Iraqi government can soon take over responsibility for securing its own land, considered a key to any U.S. troop withdrawal.

The problem with security forces goes beyond ineffectiveness, as many are widely believed to be operating in collusion with the militias and death squads.

The battle in Ghazaliya illustrated the challenges U.S. and Iraqi leaders face. Residents, speaking by telephone with the sound of gunfire audible in the background, said that hundreds of militiamen arrived in Toyotas at about 4 p.m., then marched through the streets accompanied by Iraqi policemen and National Guardsmen. The residents fought to keep them out of their mosques, witnesses said.

Abu Ahmed al-Duleimi, 55, a former Iraqi army officer, said he was helping a 16-year-old boy with cuts on his thighs, abdomen and face after a mortar shell fell near the boy's house. Unable to get him to a hospital, Duleimi took him to his home and called a neighbor who is a doctor.

DOJ_NMG_0097992

"The government should be neutral and should eliminate these militias, and not give them the opportunity to inflame the situation," he said as he waited for the doctor to arrive.

Abu Ghazwan, 63, said ambulances were unable to get into the neighborhood because they, too, were being attacked. Many of the injured were taken to a nearby mosque, he said.

Ghazwan had armed himself with an AK-47 assault rifle and an ammunition belt, but Iraqi forces confiscated weapons from residents, he said.

"We do not know how we will defend our area if they keep doing this," he said.

Residents said they took back the mosques after a few hours, after U.S. forces arrived.

A U.S. military spokesman said he could not confirm U.S. involvement in the battle. An Iraqi government spokesman denied that any such fight took place.

As fighting on the ground continued, so did a flurry of diplomatic activity that started even before last week's attacks. On Monday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani is scheduled to leave for Tehran to discuss with Iranian leaders a regional solution to his country's problems. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, meanwhile, reiterated his plans to meet Wednesday with President Bush in Amman, Jordan, despite threats from powerful politicians linked to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr to pull out of Iraq's coalition government if he goes through with it.

Maliki, a Shiite, called on his government to stop the infighting that has paralyzed it.

"The whole crisis is political, and it is the politicians who must stop the cycle of violence and bloodletting," he said at a news conference. "The terrorist acts are a reflection of the lack of political consensus."

U.S. forces also suffered casualties over the weekend. Two Marines were killed and one was wounded in action in Anbar province Saturday, the U.S. military said. One soldier was killed and two were wounded in Diyala province when a roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle.

While Iraq Burns (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

Americans are shopping while Iraq burns.

The competing television news images on the morning after Thanksgiving were of the unspeakable carnage in Sadr City — where more than 200 Iraqi civilians were killed by a series of coordinated car bombs — and the long lines of cars filled with holiday shopping zealots that jammed the highway approaches to American malls that had opened for business at midnight.

A Wal-Mart in Union, N.J., was besieged by customers even before it opened its doors at 5 a.m. on Friday. “All I can tell you,” said a Wal-Mart employee, “is that they were fired up and ready to spend money.”

There is something terribly wrong with this juxtaposition of gleeful Americans with fistfuls of dollars storming the department store barricades and the slaughter by the thousands of innocent Iraqi civilians, including old people, children and babies. The war was started by the U.S., but most Americans feel absolutely no sense of personal responsibility for it.

Representative Charles Rangel recently proposed that the draft be reinstated, suggesting that politicians would be more reluctant to take the country to war if they understood that their constituents might be called up to fight. What struck me was not the uniform opposition to the congressman’s proposal — it has long been clear that there is zero sentiment in favor of a draft in the U.S. — but the fact that it never provoked even the briefest discussion of the responsibilities and obligations of ordinary Americans in a time of war.

With no obvious personal stake in the war in Iraq, most Americans are indifferent to its consequences. In an interview last week, Alex Racheotes, a 19-year-old history major at Wesleyan University in Connecticut, said: “I definitely don’t know anyone who would want to fight in Iraq. But beyond that, I get the feeling that most people at school don’t even think about the war. They’re more concerned with what grade they got on yesterday’s test.”

His thoughts were echoed by other students, including John Cafarelli, a 19-year-old sophomore at the University of New Hampshire, who was asked if he had any friends who would be willing to join the Army. “No, definitely not,” he said. “None of my friends even really care about what’s going on in Iraq.”

This indifference is widespread. It enables most Americans to go about their daily lives completely unconcerned about the atrocities resulting from a war being waged in their name. While shoppers here are scrambling to put the perfect touch to their holidays with the purchase of a giant flat-screen TV or a PlayStation 3, the news out of Baghdad is of a society in the midst of a meltdown.

According to the United Nations, more than 7,000 Iraqi civilians were killed in September and October. Nearly 5,000 of those killings occurred in Baghdad, a staggering figure.

DOJ_NMG_0097993

In a demoralizing reprise of life in Afghanistan under Taliban rule, the U.N. reported that in Iraq: “The situation of women has continued to deteriorate. Increasing numbers of women were recorded to be either victims of religious extremists or ‘honor killings.’ Some non-Muslim women are forced to wear a headscarf and to be accompanied by spouses or male relatives.”

Journalists in Iraq are being “assassinated with utmost impunity,” the U.N. report said, with 18 murdered in the last two months.

Iraq burns. We shop. The Americans dying in Iraq are barely mentioned in the press anymore. They warrant maybe one sentence in a long roundup article out of Baghdad, or a passing reference — no longer than a few seconds — in a television news account of the latest political ditherings.

Since the vast majority of Americans do not want anything to do with the military or the war, the burden of fighting has fallen on a small cadre of volunteers who are being sent into the war zone again and again. Nearly 3,000 have been killed, and many thousands more have been maimed.

The war has now lasted as long as the American involvement in World War II. But there is no sense of collective sacrifice in this war, no shared burden of responsibility. The soldiers in Iraq are fighting, suffering and dying in a war in which there are no clear objectives and no end in sight, and which a majority of Americans do not support.

They are dying anonymously and pointlessly, while the rest of us are free to buckle ourselves into the family vehicle and head off to the malls and shop.

How Moqtada Al-Sadr Controls U.S. Fate In Iraq (NSWK)

By Jeffrey Bartholet

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - One way to understand Moqtada al-Sadr is to think of him as a young Mafia don. He aims for respectability, and is willing to kill for it. Yet the extent of his power isn't obvious to the untrained eye. He has no standing army or police force, and the Mahdi Army gunmen he employs have no tanks or aircraft. You could mistake him—at your peril—for a common thug or gang leader. And if he or his people were to kill you for your ignorance, he wouldn't claim credit. But the message would be clear to those who understand the brutal language of the Iraqi Street.

American soldiers who patrol Sadr's turf in Baghdad understand. They can spot his men. "They look like they're pulling security," says First Lt. Robert Hartley, a 25-year-old who plays cat and mouse with the Mahdi Army in the Iraqi capital. The Sadrists use children and young men as lookouts. When GIs get out of their Humvees to patrol on foot, one of the watchers will fly a kite, or release a flock of pigeons. Some of Sadr's people have even infiltrated top ranks of the Iraqi police. Capt. Tom Kapla, 29, says he knows who they are: "They look at you, and you can tell they want to kill you."

Sadr is a unique force in Iraq: a leader from the majority Shiites who has resisted American occupation from the start. He's a populist, a nationalist and an Islamic radical rolled into one. Part of his power is simply that he's powerful. Large numbers of impoverished Shiites view Sadr as their guardian—the one leader who is willing not just to stand up for them but to strike back on their behalf. "People count on the militias," says Lieutenant Hartley, who deals with Sadr's thugs on a regular basis. "It's like the mob—they keep people safe."

The longer Sadr has survived, the greater his prestige has grown. Iraqis and foreigners who meet him are impressed by the transformation. He's more diplomatic and commands more respect. He used to greet visitors at his Najaf office sitting on pillows on the floor. Now he has a couch set. His concerns are high-minded: he speaks of fuel shortages and cabinet politics. In the past, Sadr was shrugged off as a rabble-rouser and a nuisance. Now he is undeniably one of the most popular leaders in the country. He is also its most dangerous, for he has the means to wage political or actual war against any solution that is not precisely to his liking. He is driven by forces America has long misread in Iraq: religious sentiment, economic resentment and enduring sectarian passions.

And he is now a primary target of Sunni insurgents bent on provoking all-out civil war. Last Thursday, Sunni militants carried out their deadliest attack since 2003. Multiple car bombs, accompanied by mortars, killed more than 200 people in Sadr City, a Shiite slum of 2 million people in Baghdad that is dominated by the Mahdi Army. Shiite forces responded immediately by firing mortars at a revered Sunni mosque in Baghdad, and by torching other holy places. Only the presence of U.S. troops—and a wide curfew over the city—prevented far bloodier revenge attacks.

More than anyone, Sadr personifies the dilemma Washington faces: If American troops leave Iraq quickly, militia leaders like Sadr will be unleashed as never before, and full-scale civil war could follow. But the longer the American occupation lasts, the less popular America gets—and the more popular Sadr and his ilk become.

To many, Sadr's brand of Shiite politics—homegrown, populist and ruthless—seems a natural outgrowth of the ruin left in Saddam Hussein's wake, and a powerful part of what Iraq has become. The United Nations calculates that an unprecedented 3,709 Iraqi civilians were killed in October. Death squads connected to the Mahdi Army, as well as to other Shia and Sunni groups, capture and execute civilians in cold blood, sometimes dragging them out of hospitals or government ministries. Corpses turn up on the street with acid burns on their backs, or electric-drill holes in their knees, stomachs and heads. Among ordinary Iraqis, the United States bears much of the blame for the bloodshed—just for being there. As Sadr put it to NEWSWEEK earlier this year, "The occupation is the decision maker ... any attack is [America's] responsibility."

DOJ_NMG_0097994

The story of the U.S. confrontation with Moqtada al-Sadr is, in many ways, the story of American folly in Iraq. It's a story of ignorance and poor planning, missteps and confusion. Key policymakers often disagreed about the importance of Sadr and about how to deal with him. The result was half-measures and hesitation. But the story isn't just about past failures. It also contains lessons—and warnings—about the future.

Little More Than 'Mullah Atari'

Moqtada al-Sadr did not appearon anyone's radar screen ahead of the 2003 invasion. Even among Iraqis, although he came from an important clerical family he was seen as a weak figure. Moqtada's father, Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr, had been a leading ayatollah, a rival to Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani and other top clerics. But gunmen—assumed to be working for Saddam—murdered the elder Sadr along with two of his sons in 1999. Moqtada was 25 at the time.

On the evening after his father's funeral, Moqtada presided over a memorial service at the Safi al-Safa Mosque in Najaf. A storm was raging outside. At about 8 p.m., three men wearing suits and ties swaggered into the mosque. Their jackets bulged where handguns were holstered. They were smirking, recalls Fatah al-Sheikh, a family friend who was present. Everyone in the mosque knew they were Saddam's men. One of the visitors offered Moqtada a package: a brick of bank notes wrapped in crisp white paper. "It was a message from Saddam Hussein," Sheikh recalls. "They wanted to tell Sayyid Moqtada, 'We killed your father.' They wanted to see if Sayyid Moqtada could be bought."

Moqtada declined the money, refused to shake hands and told the men to leave the mosque. A cleric followed the men out, apologized on Moqtada's behalf and accepted the money—knowing that to refuse it would mean a death sentence. Fearing immediate retribution anyway, Moqtada cut short the memorial and canceled two days of official mourning.

Sheikh says that for the next four years, Saddam's secret police followed Sadr wherever he went. One hot summer day, Sheikh recalls seeing Sadr leave the Imam Ali Shrine in Najaf. Sheikh walked up and said hello. Sadr squeezed Sheikh's hand tight and opened his eyes wide. "He was trying to give me a signal." Then Sheikh saw why: two men dressed in dishdashas, standing behind Sadr and near a Toyota with tinted windows, were watching.

Saddam kept a close eye on Sadr because the young man inherited a wide network of mosques, schools and social centers built up by his father. The network was focused on the impoverished masses of Iraqi Shiites—the sort of people other religious and secular leaders didn't have much time for. Even some educated Shiites dismissed Moqtada as a zatut, or ignorant child. Some called him "Mullah Atari," because he apparently enjoyed videogames as a kid. He certainly lacked his father's stature: in his theological studies, Moqtada never reached beyond the level of bahth al-kharij (pregraduation research), according to a study by the International Crisis Group. But it's clear now that most everybody underestimated him.

The Time Bomb Starts to Tick

Top American officials may have been misled, as in so many other things, by depending heavily on well-heeled Iraqi exiles for advice. The outsiders, who had lived for many years in London or Washington or Tehran, disagreed vehemently with each other on what an invasion would mean. But some told Americans what they wanted to hear: you will be greeted as liberators, especially by the Shiites and Kurds long oppressed by Saddam.

American officials listened to Ahmad Chalabi, the well-known scion of a secular Shiite banking family. Another prominent exile was Abdul Majid al-Khoei, who was supposed to be a key guide to the Shia religious community. Both had been away from Iraq for many years, and were strangers to the place they had left behind.

Al-Khoei paid with his life. The London-based exile returned to the holy city of Najaf, where he was born and raised, under U.S. military protection. He quickly organized a local council to get electricity and water flowing again, apparently with CIA money. (The CIA declined to comment.) But al-Khoei's father had been Iraq's top ayatollah—and a bitter rival of Sadr's father—during Saddam's rule. Now the sons were competing for power and influence. Sadr castigated al-Khoei as a U.S. agent, and demanded that he turn over the keys to the tomb of Imam Ali, the Prophet Muhammad's son-in-law. A gilded cage surrounding the tomb contains a box for pilgrims' donations, a huge and vital source of income for religious leaders.

As al-Khoei and a colleague visited the shrine on the morning of April 10, 2003, an angry mob attacked them with grenades, guns and swords. "Long live Moqtada al-Sadr!" the mob cried out. Al-Khoei was stabbed repeatedly, then tied up and dragged to the doorstep of Sadr's headquarters in Najaf, where he was still alive. A subsequent investigation by an Iraqi judge found that Sadr himself gave the order to finish him off: "Take him away and kill him in your own special way."

Yet it wasn't clear at the time of the killing what Sadr's personal role was, and "we didn't want one of our first acts in country to be taking out one of the most popular leaders," says a U.S. military officer familiar with Army intelligence on Sadr. The officer, who did not want to be named discussing intelligence matters, says the Army was worried about provoking riots. When Sadr's father was killed in 1999, Saddam violently crushed protests by angry Shia mobs. "We thought that tens of thousands would take to the streets in Nasiriya, Karbala and Baghdad. It always comes back to that—not enough guys on the ground."

DOJ_NMG_0097995

One courageous Iraqi judge, Raid Juhi, doggedly investigated the case. He exhumed the bodies of al-Khoei and his colleague, and wrote up a confidential arrest warrant for Sadr in August 2003. "From that moment through April 2004, the issue was whether we were going to enforce the arrest warrant," says Dan Senor, a senior official in the Coalition Provisional Authority at the time.

The CPA, the Pentagon and the military on the ground were in disagreement. The Marines in southern Iraq were particularly wary of stirring up trouble. As it was, the United States was preparing to hand off the area around Najaf to a multinational force with troops from Spain and Central America. Still, the Coalition had a secret arrest plan, and momentum toward nabbing Sadr was building. "The pivotal moment was Aug. 19, 2003," says Senor. "We were down to figuring out the mechanisms of ensuring that the operation was seen as Iraqi, executed on an Iraqi arrest warrant. I remember it was late afternoon and we had just received a snowflake from [U.S. Defense Secretary Donald] Rumsfeld ... with nine different questions, rehashing how we were going to do this, to make sure it was not seen as an American operation." (A "snowflake" was a Rumsfeld memo.)

Suddenly word came that insurgents had detonated a massive truck bomb at the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad. Senor recalls rushing to the scene with Hume Horan, a top U.S. diplomat and Arabist. Horan leaned over to Senor and said, "We should take down Sadr now, when no one's looking." But there was enough chaos to deal with already. The U.N. bombing was "a huge distraction," says Senor, "and the Sadr operation was forgotten."

Taking On Iraq's New Taliban

The U.S. invasion had destroyed an economy already crippled by years of international sanctions. Countless young men were unemployed, invigorated by the atmosphere of violent change but also poor and fearful. They wanted to be part of the new order—whatever it would be. The country was also awash in guns and other weapons, including those looted from Saddam's vast and unsecured arms depots. The Sadrist network was perfectly positioned to capitalize on the situation. Sadr himself wasdetermined to lead a national movement—using a potent mixture of anti-occupation militancy and millennial preaching about the coming of the mysterious 12th imam, who Shiites believe will save mankind. "Moqtada is absolutely hooked on the concept of the reappearance of the Mahdi," says Amatzia Baram, the director of the Ezri Center at Haifa University.

The first sighting of black-clad militiamen identifying themselves as part of Mahdi Army seems to have come in September 2003 in the southern town of Kufah. "I do not care what the Americans have to say about this, and I never did," said Sadr when asked about the new militia by reporters later that month. "Only the Iraqi people can choose who they want to protect their country." The U.S. military, fighting an ever-growing insurgency by the minority Sunnis, who had lost power with Saddam's downfall, didn't want to instigate a two-front war. But that left the United States without a strategy. If American forces weren't going to fight Sadr, it made sense to try to entice him into a political process. But other Iraqi leaders, including prominent Shiites, may have opposed that idea.

In the winter of 2004, a senior adviser to Ambassador Paul Bremer, the American proconsul in Iraq, was traveling in the south, meeting with friendly clerics and community leaders. "I could see how frightened they were of [Sadr] and his Mahdi Army," recalls the aide, Larry Diamond. "I was driven past an area, a kind of compound where his black-clad army was training for the upcoming revolution to seize power and take over. It just dawned on me that these people were going to make this place an authoritarian hell of a new sort, Taliban style, and would murder a lot of our allies in the process."

Diamond went to Bremer and gave him his assessment: the United States urgently needed to act against Sadr. Bremer responded that he was waiting for a new plan from Coalition forces. "I first wanted to go after him when he had probably fewer than 200 followers," Bremer recalled in an interview with NEWSWEEK last week. "I couldn't make it happen ... the Marines were resisting doing anything." But in the meantime, on March 28, 2004, Bremer suspended publication of Sadr's newspaper after it ran an editorial praising the 9/11 attacks on America as a "blessing from God."

The response was swift: mass demonstrations, which led to the first of two Sadr uprisings in 2004. In a final meeting between Diamond and Bremer on April 1, Diamond pressed the point that the United States needed more troops in Iraq. It was around 8 p.m., and Bremer's dinner was sitting on a tray uneaten. He looked exhausted. "And he just didn't want to hear it," says Diamond. "In retrospect, I think he had gone to the well on this issue of more troops during 2003, had gotten nowhere ... and had just resigned himself to the fact that these troops just weren't going to come. I think the tragedy is that everyone just gave up."

When fighting did break out, American forces hammered the Mahdi Army in Baghdad and Najaf—first in the spring and then again, after a broken ceasefire, in the late summer. Some of the worst fighting came in August, as Sadr's militiamen made their stand around the Imam Ali Shrine in Najaf. They turned the area into a no-go zone, sniping at any sign of movement. U.S. forces retaliated by laying waste to large swaths of central Najaf. In the end, Ayatollah Sistani brought his influence to bear on the renegade cleric and encouraged a ceasefire. Attempts to enforce the arrest warrant against Sadr and several aides were dropped, and Sadr's forces disarmed in Najaf or headed out of town. They were badly bloodied, and some militants were shellshocked. Others bragged about how they had fought back tanks with AK-47s, or disabled Humvees with a single grenade. Scores of militiamen were dead, but Sadr's prestige was, if anything, enhanced: he had fought the mighty United States to a stalemate.

DOJ_NMG_0097996

Getting Sadr Inside The Tent

Sadr needed a new strategy, however. He wasn't strong enough to defeat the occupier head-on, nor could he eliminate his Iraqi rivals. So he took up what he calls "political resistance"—working from within the system. Chalabi played an important role here. Washington's favorite Iraqi had found that he had little popularity in his homeland, so he was seeking alliances. Chalabi also felt, as did many other Iraqis and Americans, that it was better to bring Sadr inside the process than to have him trying to destroy it. "Sadr is respected because of his lineage and because he speaks for the disenfranchised, the scared and the angry," says a Chalabi aide, who did not want to be named because of the sensitivity of the subject. "In that sort of situation, it makes absolute sense to try to get him inside the system."

Sadr made the most of the opening. Politicians in his Sadr bloc won 23 of 275 seats in the January 2005 elections and, after fresh voting nearly a year later, now hold 30 seats. In both cases, because of divisions between other large Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni parties, Sadr was able to play kingmaker. Two prime ministers since 2005—Ibrahim Jaafari and the current Iraqi leader, Nuri al-Maliki—have depended on his swing votes for their majority. But Sadr himself stayed out of government, and kept his distance. That way he could pursue a dual strategy—rebuilding his militia even as he capitalized on his control of key ministries, like Health and Transportation, to provide services to the poor and jobs to his followers.

The Sunni insurgents were pursuing a new strategy, too. In early 2004, U.S. forces had intercepted a worried letter from the Qaeda leader in Iraq, Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, to Osama bin Laden. Zarqawi fretted that his fight against American forces was going poorly. But he had a plan: "If we succeed in dragging [the Shiites] into the arena of sectarian war, it will become possible to awaken the inattentive Sunnis as they feel imminent danger," he wrote.

Throughout 2005, Sunni insurgents launched increasingly vicious attacks on Shiite civilians and holy places. Sistani regularly called on his followers to exercise restraint, which they did with remarkable forbearance. But Sadr, who had long positioned himself as an Iraqi nationalist—and who had cooperated with Sunni fighters in the early stages of the insurgency—now publicly called for Sunnis to disavow Zarqawi. New battle lines were being drawn.

The turning point came on Feb. 22, 2006, when assailants bombed the golden-domed Askariya Shrine in Samarra. This was the burial place of the 10th and 11th imams, and one of the holiest sites of the Shia faith. After the Samarra bombing, many Shiites felt compelled to lash back. Caught in a vicious street fight against Sunnis, they decided that they'd rather have a dirty brawler in their corner (like Sadr) than a gray-bearded holy man (like Sistani). "We have courage, large amounts of ammunition, good leaders, and it is a religious duty," says Ali Mijbil, a 26-year-old mechanic who serves in the Mahdi Army. "So why don't we fight them? We've been kept under Sunni rule for more than 14 centuries. It is the proper time to rule ourselves now."

Sadr still insists his main fight is with foreign invaders. He's the one Shia leader who has opposed the U.S. occupation from the beginning, and who has continued to call for a strict timetable for American withdrawal. An overwhelming majority of Iraqis now agree with him. A September poll by WorldPublicOpinion.org found that 63 percent of 501 Iraqi Shiites surveyed supported attacks against Americans. Even in Baghdad, where ethnic tensions are worst, Shiites agree with Sunnis on one thing: the poll found that 80 percent of the capital's Shiites wanted U.S. forces to leave within a year. That number has changed dramatically in a matter of months. A January poll found that most Shiites wanted U.S.-led troops to be reduced only "as the security situation improves."

In Washington, some politicians still talk about "victory," while others aim only to stabilize the country and leave with some semblance of dignity. Many in the U.S. capital are dusting off yesterday's proposals for tomorrow's problems—more training, more troops, disarming the militias, more stability in Baghdad. The GOP presidential front runner for 2008, John McCain, would prefer to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by 20,000, at least temporarily. He has also called for Sadr to be "taken out." But it may be too late.

The movement may now be more important than the man. Sadr "is faced with a common problem," says Toby Dodge of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. "He can't control the use of his brand name, the use of his legitimacy." Some elder followers of Sadr's father have broken away, disillusioned with the son. And some young toughs seem to be freelancing where they can. Renegade factions could eventually threaten Sadr's power. If he were to fall, "you'll end up with 30 different movements," says Vali Nasr, a scholar and author who has briefed the Bush administration on Iraq. "There are 30 chieftains who have a tremendous amount of local power. If you remove him, there will be a scramble for who will inherit this movement ... It's a great danger doing that. You may actually make your life much more difficult."

How the Mahdi Army Works

DOJ_NMG_0097997

For now, Sadr and his Mahdi Army have the initiative. They can stir up trouble without much fear of retribution. A case in point: When kidnappers grabbed an Iraqi-American translator in Baghdad last month, U.S. soldiers sealed off the Sadr City neighborhood where they believed he was being held. But Prime Minister Maliki—who depends on Sadr for political support—quickly ordered the Americans to remove their roadblocks. Maliki has also forced the U.S. military to release men picked up during raids in Sadr City on suspicion of belonging to Shiite death squads.

When the U.S. fails to respond to provocation, it loses credibility. And when it does respond, it can also lose. Last week, before the massive car-bomb attacks, U.S. and Iraqi forces carried out a pinprick raid in Sadr City to get intelligence on the kidnapped military translator, Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie. Like so many other U.S. military strikes in Iraq, however, it came at a price. American forces captured seven militiamen, including one who might have information on al-Taayie. But police said a young boy was among three people killed in the raid. A member of Parliament from Sadr's movement promptly showed up at the morgue, and held the corpse of the boy in his arms as he railed against the American occupation.

U.S. forces have tried hard to win hearts and minds. They've spent $120.9 million on completed construction projects in Sadr City, for instance—building new sewers and power lines—and projects worth an additional $197 million are underway. But the United States doesn't always get credit for the good works. When the Americans doled out cash to construct four health clinics in Sadr City during the past year, Sadr's men quickly removed any hint of U.S. involvement. They also put up signs giving all credit to their boss, according to Lt. Zeroy Lawson, an Army intelligence officer who works in the area.

The Mahdi Army has other sources of cash. It's taken control of gas stations throughout large parts of Baghdad, and dominates the Shia trade in propane-gas canisters, which Iraqis use for cooking. Sometimes the militiamen sell the propane at a premium, earning healthy profits; at other times they sell it at well below market rates, earning gratitude from the poor and unemployed.

A key source of Sadr's income is Muslim tithes—or khoms—collected at mosques. But his militiamen also run extortion and protection rackets—demanding money to keep certain businesses and individuals "safe." One Iraqi in a tough neighborhood, who did not want to reveal his name out of fear, says he pays the local Mahdi Army the equivalent of $13 a month for protection.

Analysts believe that Iran has also provided support to Sadr, but not much. Tehran began supplying Shia insurgents, including the Mahdi Army, with a special type of roadside bomb, using a shaped charge, in May 2005. These are often disguised as rocks and are easy to manufacture locally. But diplomats say they are made to the exact design perfected by Iranian intelligence and supplied to Lebanese Hizbullah in the 1980s.

Yet Tehran's main Shiite clients in Iraq are rivals of Sadr, who is often critical of Persian influence. Sadr worries that Iran may be trying to infiltrate his movement, and he's almost surely right. Fatah al-Sheikh, who is close to Sadr, says the boss sent a private letter to loyal imams around Baghdad in the past two weeks identifying 10 followers he believed were suspect. They had been using the Mahdi Army name, but Sadr believes they're really tools of Iranian intelligence, says Sheikh.

Sadr has tried to distance himself from atrocities, insisting that they're carried out by renegades or impostors. Many Sunnis, to whom Sadr has become a dark symbol of Shiite perfidy, don't buy it. "If he says, 'Kill Alusi,' I will be killed," says Mithal al-Alusi, a moderate Sunni member of Parliament. "If he says, 'Don't kill Alusi,' I will not be killed ... Nobody can go against his orders or wishes." The Association of Muslim Scholars, which is loosely linked with Sunni insurgents, says the Mahdi Army has attacked some 200 Sunni mosques, and killed more than 260 imams and mosque workers.

All the killings will be remembered, and it will be a miracle if they go unanswered. Memories of martyrdom—and the desire for revenge—can last forever. Last Friday marked the anniversary, on the Islamic calendar, of the killing of Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr and his two eldest sons. After the previous day's bombings, Moqtada told government officials that he was out of the country. But that seems to have been a feint—to keep possible enemiesoff balance. In fact, heappeared at the Kufah Mosque, where his father used to lead worshipers in chants of "No, no to America; no, no to Israel; no, no to the Devil!"

As word spread that Moqtada would lead prayers, people crowded into the mosque, most of them clad in black as a sign of mourning. Sadr asked worshipers to pray for his dead relatives, and also for those who had been killed in Sadr City. He again called for the United States to set a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq. He urged a top Sunni sheik to issue three fatwas: one against the killing of Shiites, another against joining Al Qaeda and the third to rebuild the shrine in Samarra. He compared his father's followers to those of the Prophet Muhammad. "After the prophet died," he intoned, "some of his followers deviated from his teachings, and the same has happened with followers of my father." The "cursed trio"—Americans, British and Israelis—were trying to divide Iraq. "We Iraqis—Sunnis and Shia—will always be brothers."

No one in Iraq talks about arresting Sadr for the murder of al-Khoei anymore. That seems like ages ago—back when Sadr's armed supporters were estimated in the hundreds, compared with many thousands today. Now diplomats speak of trying to keep Sadr inside the political system, hoping he can tame his followers. He's a militant Islamist and anti-occupation, they say, but he's also a nationalist, and not as close to Iran as some of his rivals. Nobody knows whether Sadr is dissembling when he speaks about Iraqi unity, or preparing for all-out war. What is clear—more today than ever before—is that it's time to stop underestimating him.

DOJ_NMG_0097998

This story was written by Jeffrey Bartholet with reporting from Kevin Peraino and Sarah Childress in Baghdad; Michael Hastings in Amman; Dan Ephron, Michael Hirsh and John Barry in Washington; Christopher Dickey in Paris; Melinda Liu in Beijing; Rod Nordland, Stryker McGuire, Mark Hosenball and Rebecca Hall in London; Babak Dehghanpisheh in Beirut; Scott Johnson in Cape Town; Christian Carylin Tokyo, and Malcolm Beith and Karen Fragala Smith in New York

The Face Of Brutality (TIME)

By Aparisim Ghosh

Time, November 27, 2006

It was one of the most audaciousÂ operations, although not a single shot was fired. On the morning of Nov. 14, dozens of men wearing police commando uniforms pulled up in a fleet of pickup trucks at a building belonging to Iraq's Ministry of Higher Education. They fanned out across the four floors and herded everybody--staff and visitors--into a single room. All of them were ordered to hand over their cell phones. Then the women were taken into another room and locked in. About 150 men were marched outside, bundled into the pickup trucks and driven away. The whole operation took just 15 minutes.

When word of the kidnappings reached the control room of the Ministry of the Interior, an officer on duty there suspected immediately that the perps were acting on the orders of a fearsome Shi'ite militia warlord whose deeds the officer had been tracking for three years. "A ministry of mainly Sunni staff, 150 people taken captive--it can only be one thing," he says. "It had to be the work of Abu Deraa."

Few Americans have ever heard of him, and most Iraqis don't know what he looks like. But such is the reputation of Abu Deraa, 48, that all of Baghdad's biggest, most brazen attacks against Sunni targets are almost automatically assumed to be his handiwork. Iraqi and U.S. officials say Abu Deraa is the mastermind behind the killing of thousands of Sunnis this year. Loosely affiliated with the Mahdi Army of the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, Abu Deraa's death squad is suspected of involvement in some of the most daring kidnappings in the capital--including the Oct. 23 snatch of the U.S. soldier Ahmed Qusai al-Taie and the Nov. 14 raid on the Ministry of Higher Education. (Although more than half of the 150 abductees were released, many remain unaccounted for.) Abu Deraa has a personal fondness for gruesome torture. One of his signature techniques is running a drill into the skull of his live victim. His appetite for mayhem is so vast that Iraqis call him the "Shi'ite Zarqawi"; and like the al-Qaeda-in-Iraq leader, who was killed by a U.S. air strike last June, Abu Deraa has largely operated in the shadows, avoiding public appearances and almost never giving interviews.

But now he has. Abu Deraa agreed last week to provide written responses to TIME's questions, which were passed to him by intermediaries. He says he is "honored" by comparisons to al-Zarqawi and claimed, implausibly, to have no ill will toward ordinary Sunnis. He says his fight is against "occupiers, their supporters and takfiris"--a reference to Sunni insurgents linked to al-Qaeda. He denied that he had kidnapped al-Taie, the missing U.S. soldier, but added, "I would be very proud if it was me who kidnapped that soldier, and I am very proud of any kind of accusation against me, especially related to [acts against] the occupiers and those who serve the occupation." He said he was motivated by a "sense of holy duty toward my faith [to fight] against any hostile enemy of my faith."

Abu Deraa was born Ismail al-Zarjawi to a poor family in Sadr City. After a career in petty crime during the Saddam Hussein years, he became one of the first recruits of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army after the dictator's fall. "When the Americans entered the country and kicked Saddam out, we were very happy," Abu Deraa says. "But then we discovered their bad intentions against Iraq, so we started attacking the occupation forces." In the spring of 2004 he participated in the Shi'ite uprising against U.S. forces in Sadr City. That was also when he earned his nom de guerre Abu Deraa, or "Father of the Shield," a reference to his penchant for attacking U.S. armored vehicles.

He saw more action that summer in Najaf and that fall in Fallujah, when a small detachment of Shi'ites fought alongside Sunni insurgents against U.S. forces. Back then, he says, "it was a real resistance, and there was no sectarian affiliation." Abu Deraa spent the next year consolidating his position as a Mahdi Army leader, first among equals of three commanders in Sadr City. Iraqi officials say this was when he turned to kidnapping for cash, which he used to buy weapons and lure recruits.

It is the atrocities he is suspected of perpetrating against Sunnis that have earned him notoriety and helped plunge Iraq into civil war. Sunni leaders and some government officials blame him for the June 21 murder of one of Saddam's lawyers, the July 9 daylight slaughter of up to 50 Sunnis and the July 15 kidnapping of 30 officials from the Iraqi Olympic Committee. Unlike al-Zarqawi, Abu Deraa issued no statements and released no videos, except for a semicomic webcast, available on YouTube, that shows him offering a Pepsi to a camel. Still, his renown has spread beyond Iraq. On Internet bulletin boards he is hailed as a Shi'ite hero. A typical message reads, "Abu Deraa is a hero to all oppressed people on earth, fighting international tyranny of U.S. forces and fighting domestic tyranny."

DOJ_NMG_0097999

The ruthlessness of Abu Deraa--and perhaps his growing fame on the Shi'ite street--has caused even al-Sadr to distance himself from his former protÃ©gÃ©. Last month al-Sadr put Abu Deraa on a list of people no longer part of the Mahdi Army. U.S. officials began to describe Abu Deraa as a "rogue militia leader" and a "free agent" no longer in al-Sadr's control. But some of al-Sadr's associates continue to praise Abu Deraa. Falah Shansal, a member of parliament from the al-Sadr bloc, told TIME last week that Abu Deraa was still "a fighter in the Mahdi Army."

As long as Abu Deraa enjoys al-Sadr's tacit protection, he won't be easy to run down. U.S. forces believed they had him surrounded in Sadr City last month, but the militia leader narrowly escaped. A U.S. air strike is believed to have killed several of his closest fighters and severed an arm of one of his sons. "This is an honor for him, me and the family," Abu Deraa told TIME. The victims of Abu Deraa's brutality can only hope there are more such honors in store.

Zakaria: The Next Step? Think Vietnam (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - If you want to understand the futility of America's current situation in Iraq, last week provided a vivid microcosm. On Thursday, just hours before a series of car bombs killed more than 200 people in the Shia stronghold of Sadr City, Sunni militants attacked the Ministry of Health, which is run by one of Moqtada al-Sadr's followers. Within a couple of hours, American units arrived at the scene and chased off the attackers. The next day, Sadr's men began reprisals against Sunnis, firing RPGs at several mosques. When U.S. forces tried to stop the carnage and restore order, goons from Sadr's Mahdi Army began firing on American helicopters. In other words, one day the U.S. Army was defending Sadr's militia and, the next day, was attacked by it. We're in the middle of a civil war and are being shot at by both sides.

There can be no more doubt that Iraq is in a civil war, in which leaders of both its main communities, Sunnis and Shiites, are fomenting violence. The assault on Sadr's Ministry of Health was likely retaliation for a recent mass kidnapping at the Ministry of Education, which still retains some Sunnis. The Ministry of the Interior houses the deadliest killers from the Badr Brigades, the other large Shiite militia. Badr's Bayan Jabr built the death squads when he ran the ministry; he's now Iraq's Finance minister, in charge of its resources. This is the Iraqi government we are protecting, funding and attempting to strengthen. To speak, as the White House deputy press secretary did last week, of "terrorists ... targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government" totally misses the reality of Iraq today. Who are the terrorists and who are the innocents? Among the most pro-American voices to emerge from the new Iraq have been two young Baghdadis, Omar and Mohammed Fadhlil, whose three-year-old blog, Iraq the Model, has promoted a relentlessly upbeat and hopeful message. Last week they threw in the towel. "I believe that America would like to see Iraq emerge as a model for the region," Mohammed wrote. "But that cannot be done without having a cooperative Iraqi partner on the ground who shares similar views for Iraq and the Middle East. And that's the point—that partner does not exist, at least not in the government."

The American Army has more than enough troops to confront the Mahdi Army. The problem is political, not military. U.S. forces have been repeatedly blocked from going after Mahdi leaders. This month they were forced by the Iraqi government to abandon raids into Sadr City in search of a kidnapped American soldier. They were not even allowed to stop traffic in the neighborhood. Will more troops change that?

To the contrary, both sides now see American troops as the problem. The Shiite ruling coalition and the Sunni insurgency both believe that if only the United States were to get out of the way, they could defeat their enemies outright. That's why, in the most recent poll of Iraqis, taken in September, 91 percent of Sunnis and 74 percent of Shiites said they wanted American forces to leave within a year.

While these are not conditions that suggest a political deal is likely, there is nothing to be lost in trying. When President Bush meets with Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki in Jordan this week, he should make clear that Iraq's leaders need to come to an agreement that meets both sides' key demands on such issues as autonomy, oil revenues and amnesty. But he needs to deliver an ultimatum: either the government begins implementing such a deal by January or American troops will begin a drawdown, leaving the core tasks of security to Iraqi forces.

There is much moaning in Washington about the return of the "realists," like James Baker, who are allegedly pushing to surrender America's ideals as the price of bringing stability to the situation in Iraq. In fact, even stability in Iraq is unattainable. What we will soon need is a supreme act of realism, dictated not by the ascendancy of a school of thought in Washington but by events on the ground in Iraq. We will need a Kissingerian effort to extricate the United States from the catastrophe that Iraq has become.

Iraq is not Vietnam. But America's predicament in Iraq is becoming increasingly similar to the one it faced in Southeast Asia more than 30 years ago. Henry Kissinger's negotiations to end the Vietnam War have been criticized from both the left and right. One side thought he moved too slowly to get us out, the other that he gave up too much. But looking at our circumstances in Iraq should give us some appreciation for the difficulty of his task. With a losing hand and deteriorating conditions on the ground, Kissinger maneuvered to extricate the United States from a situation in which it could not achieve its objectives, while at the same time limiting the damage, shoring up regional allies and maintaining some measure of American credibility. A version of such a strategy is the only one that has any chance of success in Iraq today.

DOJ_NMG_0098000

The Scariest Guy In Town (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, November 27, 2006

In the altered landscape that is Washington, there's a new contender for the title of Scariest Guy in Town. He stands 5 ft. 5, speaks softly and has all the panache of your parents' dentist. But when it comes to putting powerful people on the hot seat, there's no one tougher and more tenacious than veteran California Congressman Henry Waxman. In the Democrats' wilderness years, Waxman fashioned himself as his party's chief inquisitor. Working with one of the most highly regarded staffs on Capitol Hill, he has spent the past eight years churning out some 2,000 headline-grabbing reports, blasting the Bush Administration and the Republican Congress on everything from faulty prewar intelligence and flaws in missile defense to the flu-vaccine shortage and arsenic in drinking water.

Come January, however, the man that the liberal Nation magazine once called the "Eliot Ness of the Democrats" can do even more, thanks to the two words that strike fear in the heart of every government official: subpoena power. As the new chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, Waxman will have free rein to investigate, as he puts it, "everything that the government is involved with." And the funny thing is, Waxman can thank the Republicans for the unique set of levers he will hold. Under a rules change they put through in the days when they used the panel to make Bill Clinton's life miserable, the leader of Government Reform is the only chairman who can issue subpoenas without a committee vote. Then Chairman Dan Burton--who famously re-enacted the suicide of Clinton deputy White House counsel Vince Foster by shooting at what he called a "head-like thing" (later widely reported to be a melon) in his backyard--issued 1,089 such unilateral subpoenas in six years. Since a Republican entered the White House, the G.O.P. Congress has been far less enthusiastic in its oversight. Waxman likes to point out that the House took 140 hours of sworn testimony to get to the bottom of whether Clinton had misused the White House Christmas-card list for political purposes, but only 12 hours on prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib.

Iraq will get new attention with Waxman in power. This week he plans to send a letter to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld demanding information on Halliburton's $16 billion contract to provide services to troops there. Waxman's staff has been poring over the fine print of that deal for more than two years, and is convinced that much of the money is slipping between layer upon layer of subcontractors.

Waxman, 67, is a most unlikely character to represent the glitzy congressional district that includes Beverly Hills. Nearly every profile of him points out that the hometown Congressman for the Chateau Marmont on Sunset Boulevard has never attended the Academy Awards. "It's such a long night," he says. "When I watch it on TV, I can get a snack." Waxman grew up over his family's grocery store near Watts, got his political start in the state assembly and came to Washington among the storied post-Watergate reformers known as the Class of 1974. Asked to name a hobby, he draws a blank.

What Waxman does love to do is write laws, and he has been extraordinarily good at it. The walls of his Washington office are covered with framed pens that Presidents from Ronald Reagan to Bill Clinton used to sign the laws that Waxman helped make a reality: the Clean Air Act, generic-drug legislation, food- and toy-safety laws, and Medicare catastrophic coverage, to name a few. In 1994, as chairman of the health and environment subcommittee, he lined up the chief executives of the nation's biggest tobacco companies, had them raise their right hands and then shredded them as finely as their own products. His hearings helped pave the way for the lawsuits that followed, which led to a landmark $246 billion legal settlement with the industry.

Opponents have noted that Waxman is hardly an equal-opportunity muckraker. Republicans and industry groups say his investigatory zeal is limited to conservative targets: he spent the Clinton years trying to fend off congressional investigations, including the ones into the White House's questionable campaign fund-raising practices, and once led a Democratic walkout when Republicans released a report on the firing of White House travel-office workers. While Waxman promises what he calls oversight, the Republicans say it'll be more like a witch hunt, and the Administration is promising to fight him all the way to the Supreme Court to protect itself against what it expects to be a frontal assault on Executive power. Waxman says the G.O.P. should take comfort in the fact that he has historical perspective. "I've seen a good example of overreaching," he says, referring to the committee's treatment of Clinton. "It's not the way to behave."

Suicide Bomber Kills 15 People In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

DOJ_NMG_0098001

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Nov. 26 — A suicide bomber walked into a packed restaurant in southeastern Afghanistan on Sunday morning and set off his explosives, killing 15 other people and wounding 25, Afghan officials said.

The attack, after a few weeks of relative quiet, raised fears that insurgents were resuming their campaign of suicide bombings.

Most of those killed were civilians inside the restaurant, which was in the central bazaar of Urgun, a small town in the mountainous Paktika Province, which borders Pakistan. The explosion destroyed the building and damaged adjoining shops, said the provincial chief of police security, Gen. Shah Alam Spand. He said that militia members were often seen in the area.

He said he suspected that the bomber's intended targets had been a local official and the chief of a militia that works with American forces in the province, who were having breakfast together. Both men were wounded, but survived, said an Interior Ministry spokesman, Dad Muhammad Rasa. Three bodyguards with the militia chief were also among the wounded, he said.

The attack was the deadliest since 16 people were killed in a suicide car bombing in Kabul on Sept. 8.

President Hamid Karzai denounced the attack. "The enemies of Afghanistan revealed their non-Islamic and inhuman face by killing the innocent civilians who were working hard to support their families," he said in a statement.

A NATO soldier was also killed in fighting in the southern province of Oruzgan, when his unit came under fire from insurgents, according to a statement from NATO released in Kabul. The statement did not reveal his nationality, but most of the troops stationed in Oruzgan are Dutch or Australian.

NATO estimated that as many as 50 insurgents were killed when its forces called for an airstrike on insurgent positions. There was no independent confirmation of the toll.

In another clash, in Kandahar Province, three NATO soldiers were wounded. Local residents said 10 civilians were killed by subsequent NATO bombing, [a news service] reported.

The violence in Afghanistan this year has been the heaviest since the fall of the Taliban, in late 2001, with especially heavy fighting in the southern part of the country, and suicide attacks and roadside bombs. The bombing on Sunday ended a comparative lull in fighting in recent weeks, with the onset of wintry weather, which makes the mountainous terrain that is home to the insurgents difficult.

Suicide Bomber Kills 15 In Afghanistan (AP)

By Alisa Tang

AP, November 27, 2006

A Pakistani suicide bomber detonated himself in a crowded restaurant Sunday, killing 15 people and wounding 24, including an Afghan special forces commander and a district chief, the provincial governor said.

The restaurant, located in the southeastern province of Paktika, was destroyed, said Gov. Mohammad Akram Akhpelwak. The attacker was believed to be targeting the military commander and the district chief, he said.

The suicide strike was the 102nd in Afghanistan this year, attacks that have killed 241 people, said Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force

Akhpelwak said the suicide bomber was from Pakistan, but he gave no further details. Afghan officials say the majority of suicide bombers there come from neighboring Pakistan.

Violence has risen sharply in Afghanistan this year, and Taliban militants have launched a record number of suicide and roadside bombs. Militants launched only about 20 suicide bomb attacks last year.

Meanwhile, one NATO soldier and an estimated 57 insurgents were killed in four separate attacks in violence-plagued southern Afghanistan, the former Taliban stronghold where the Afghan government wields little power.

Insurgents attacked NATO-led forces Saturday near the Tirin Kot district of Uruzgan province. NATO returned fire and called in aircraft, killing approximately 50 insurgents, NATO's International Security Assistance Force said Sunday. One NATO soldier was also killed. The nationality of the soldier was not released.

In the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province on Saturday, insurgents fired on Afghan army and NATO soldiers. A retaliatory air strike killed approximately five insurgents, said the ISAF statement. Three NATO soldiers were injured.

In neighboring Zabul province, about 50 Taliban fighters attacked the Arghandab district chief's compound on Saturday and clashed with police for about an hour, leaving one Taliban dead and three wounded, said district chief Fazal Bari. He said the police suffered no casualties.

On the main Kabul-Kandahar highway in Zabul province, Taliban fighters ambushed a police convoy Saturday night and exchanged gunfire with police, said Zabul highway police commander Jainani Khan. One Taliban was killed.

President Bush, meanwhile, called Afghan President Hamid Karzai Saturday evening to assure him that the U.S. will reiterate its commitment to Afghanistan at the upcoming NATO summit in Latvia, Karzai's office said. The summit starts Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0098002

The two presidents also discussed proposed plans for an upcoming meeting involving tribal leaders from Afghanistan and Pakistan. Karzai had proposed the idea during a White House dinner with Bush and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

Karzai hopes the meeting, called a jirga, can help solve the problem of militants crossing from Pakistan to launch attacks in Afghanistan.

The U.S. military on Sunday said it was spending $34.5 million to build four new regional hospitals and the refurbishment of the National Military Hospital. It is also spending $70 million on first aid kits for the Afghan army.

Rift Over Afghan Mission Looms For NATO (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 26 — NATO is bigger than ever, and it is reaching further than ever before, by taking the lead in the war in Afghanistan. But the Afghan mission threatens a rift within the Atlantic alliance between those nations willing and able to participate fully in combat operations in Afghanistan and those nations that are not.

The challenge represents a third generational test for the allies — one fraught with argument and angst like the others were. The first test was how best to face off against the Soviet threat, a challenge that gave birth to NATO in 1949. The second was whether to move beyond the boundaries of NATO's members in the 1990s to halt ethnic bloodshed in the Balkans.

NATO's 26 members and 11 non-alliance partners have committed 32,000 troops to Afghanistan, with 12,000 Americans assigned to the NATO portion of the mission. (Another 8,000 American troops are in Afghanistan carrying out counterterrorism missions solely under American command.)

Most nations have imposed restrictions on their member troops that NATO commanders say hamper their ability to move forces for missions and rescue other NATO forces that may get into trouble. The restrictions include whether troops are allowed to conduct missions at night, which parts of Afghanistan they may patrol and whether they are permitted to conduct offensive operations against the Taliban.

Pentagon and military officers say the list of nations with caveats, and the exact restrictions they have imposed, remains classified, to avoid helping Taliban fighters assess alliance weak points.

President Bush is expected to push for easing the restrictions when he meets with NATO leaders on Tuesday and Wednesday at an alliance summit meeting in Riga, Latvia.

Bush administration officials, diplomats from NATO nations and military officers said that how the alliance resolved the question of caveats would determine whether NATO's leading role in Afghanistan represented a first step toward a broader future for the alliance — or a peak that, once attained, might never be scaled again.

Gen. James L. Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, told the Council on Foreign Relations in October that "there are about 50 restrictions that have an operational impact, that impact on the commander" in Afghanistan.

While NATO officials said progress had been made in easing restrictions since then, the senior American officer in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, said this week that problems remained, and that NATO nations needed to fulfill their commitments to send troops, as well.

General Eikenberry, chief of the Combined Forces Command-Afghanistan, said Tuesday that NATO nations had contributed only "85 percent of the level of what was promised." Speaking at the Pentagon, he also said "there does remain the question of some countries that have particular caveats — that is, restrictions on their ability to commit to all missions of Afghanistan."

Experts on alliance relations now in the private sector say the Afghanistan experience actually may raise the level of combat competence among those nations that entered the mission with caveats and reluctance to take on a heavy role in the fighting.

"I fall into the category of the half-full glass more than the half-empty," said Gen. Joseph W. Ralston, who retired after serving as NATO's supreme allied commander.

"We have seen a maturation in the past 11 years," said General Ralston, now a distinguished senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a policy institute here. "And I think as the nations encounter the high-intensity conflict of Afghanistan, there will in fact be a positive outcome that comes from that."

Daniel Fried, the assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, said that even nations with troops in Afghanistan under combat caveats contributed to reconstruction and overall security, and that the system, however difficult, was better than a wholly unilateral American mission.

"It is a success for the trans-Atlantic community that despite disagreements about Iraq, despite politics and partisanship, that NATO has undertaken a set of new missions with Afghanistan front and center that changed the nature of the organization," Mr. Fried said.

DOJ_NMG_0098003

He emphasized that the summit meeting's work would be to respond to current security challenges and improve the alliance's responses.

NATO is not scheduled to accept any new members at the Riga meeting. Even so, words of encouragement are expected for three nations — Croatia, Macedonia and Albania — in line for membership, perhaps as early as 2008.

And in an expansion of NATO's relations with nations far from its traditional geographic sphere, members are expected to propose establishing an initiative for a global partnership to acknowledge the role that nations like Australia, Japan, South Korea, Sweden and Finland play in NATO missions.

These countries "do not seek NATO membership, but we seek a partnership with them so that we can train more intensively from a military point of view and grow closer to them because we are deployed with them," said R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs.

"Australia, South Korea and Japan are in Afghanistan," he said. "They have all been in Iraq, as you know. They have all been in the Balkans."

But Mr. Burns acknowledged that "for us, the No. 1 issue is Afghanistan."

In a telephone interview, NATO's secretary general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, said, "The threats and challenges facing NATO as we speak are of a global nature: terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction." He added: "NATO today is transforming and adapting itself. We need 21st-century answers to 21st- century threats and challenges."

Dutch Parties To Demand Changes In Policies (FT)

By Ian Bickerton In Amsterdam

Financial Times, November 27, 2006

As Jan Peter Balkenende sets about building a coalition government in the Netherlands after last week's general election, he faces the prospect of a shift in government policy.

The election reflected a surge in support for parties on the far right and left, and a fall in the number of seats held by centrist parties. While Mr Balkenende, as the head of the single largest party, the Christian Democrat Alliance, is likely to continue as prime minister, a coalition of at least three political parties is inevitable.

The most likely outcome is a coalition of CDA, Social Democrats [PvdA] and either ChristenUnie, a small religious party, or the leftwing Socialist party.

The inclusion of the Socialist party could trigger a foreign policy shift. The party demands a withdrawal of Dutch troops from Afghanistan, where they are part of a Nato mission, and opposes an attempt to revive the European Union's constitutional treaty, rejected in a referendum last year.

The PvdA wants to halt plans to privatise Amsterdam's Schiphol airport and Dutch involvement in the US-led production of the Joint Strike Fighter aircraft, in which Dutch business has invested hundreds of millions of euros.

There are deep divisions over taxes, which have made Dutch employers wary of a leftwing government bias, people close to the employers' federation have said.

A CDA, PvdA and SP coalition was the public's preferred choice in a weekend opinion poll for Dutch television. The Socialists won 25 seats, compared with nine in 2003, after the final tally of votes. PvdA won 33, nine fewer than in 2003.

De Volkskrant, the left-leaning newspaper, warned in a weekend editorial that a cabinet including the CDA and SP would mean a "powerless, bickering" government. The newspaper said the only viable option was a CDA, PvdA and Christen-Unie coalition.

But political commentators said the process of building a coalition could drag on into the new year.

At the weekend Queen Beatrix appointed Rein Jan Hoekstra, a 65-year-old civil servant, as "informateur". Mr Hoekstra, who advised Ruud Lubbers, the former Dutch prime minister, and heads a CDA research institute, must mediate among party leaders and attempt to reach agreement on the shape of a coalition.

If Mr Balkenende's fourth government in less than five years is to fare better than his previous administrations, which were dogged by political feuding, he will have to compromise.

The process will test the Dutch "polder model", a consensus-based system in which rivals co-operate in times of crisis. Even if the Socialists do not make it to government, Mr Balken-ende's new allies will level tough demands.

Both PvdA and Christen-Unie want a general pardon for 26,000 failed asylum seekers resident in the Netherlands, a move resisted by Mr Balkenende's previous centre-right government.

To further complicate matters, Geert Wilders, the far-right anti-Islam politician whose one-man party won nine seats, is likely to insist on talks to form a centre-right alliance with CDA, his Freedom party, the liberal VVD, and ChristenUnie.

A NATO Bid To Regain Afghans' Trust (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0098004

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

PANJWAI, Afghanistan -- The road to this southern Afghan farming town is wide, smooth and utterly empty, except for an occasional old man on a bicycle or a meandering herd of baby camels.

It was paved last year with Japanese funds to help farmers send their grapes to market and patients reach hospitals in the city of Kandahar, 20 miles to the east. But that was before war came to Panjwai, making its name synonymous with the physical destruction and political mayhem wrought by months of Taliban attacks and NATO bombing.

Now almost no one dares to drive on the road. NATO forces declared victory here in late September, claiming to have killed about 1,500 insurgents in a campaign named Operation Medusa. Yet Taliban fighters still linger in the surrounding orchards and launch sporadic attacks. On Monday, insurgents fired at several NATO bases in the district, although no one was injured.

Many shops in Panjwai remain shuttered, and most of the estimated 80,000 people who fled nearby villages have not returned. Some harbor bitter memories of NATO bombings that destroyed their homes and fruit crops. At least 50 civilians were killed over several weeks of bombing, and President Hamid Karzai last month ordered an investigation into the deaths. NATO officials have said the insurgents used villagers' homes as shelter, provoking the deadly airstrikes.

"I lost three of my sons, my brother, my wife, two daughters-in-law and many grandchildren," said Abdullah Shah, a white-haired farmer, wiping his eyes with a dirty shawl. "I moved the whole family into a tent for safety when the fighting started. The international forces said there were 20 Taliban in that tent, but it was not true. How could there be, when we were so crowded already?"

In an effort to regain public trust, NATO forces have moved into Panjwai with bricks, bulldozers and lots of cash. Local men have been hired to repair damaged buildings, the renovated high school reopened last week, and a new road is being laid from the town to several grape-growing villages that suffered the heaviest bombing damage.

NATO has pledged $8 million to improve Panjwai and the adjacent Zhari district, in hopes of creating a Taliban-proof development zone and a model for other post-conflict areas. Canadian troops have set up a base above the town and patrol the bazaar in armored convoys, while NATO officers meet often with local elders.

"Panjwai is a microcosm. The key is to move fast once the fighting stops, work with local institutions, get development projects going and get local people involved in their own security," said Maj. Steve Murray, deputy commander of a military reconstruction team in Kandahar. "We can fight the Taliban until the cows come home, but we can't make the area safe if we don't deal with the other issues."

Last Tuesday, a Canadian officer arrived as bulldozers were clearing land for the new road. He was soon surrounded by frowning farmers who demanded extra money to let the road cross their fields. The mayor joined the negotiations, calculating acreage on a pad of paper. The officer politely insisted on the previously agreed price.

In the chilly Panjwai bazaar, turbaned men huddling around sidewalk teapots raised more serious issues. They expressed deep ambivalence about the presence of international troops and both fear of and admiration for the Taliban insurgents.

"The coalition forces have brought us nothing but problems. They enter our houses and mosques without permission," said Abdul Jan Mohammed, a grape grower whose vineyards were damaged by NATO airstrikes. "The Taliban don't want to fight. They are just tired of all the corruption, as we are."

Bismillah, 45, whose farm is a half-hour walk from town, said his neighbors had begun to return home since the bombing ended but that insurgents were still lurking nearby. Like many Afghans, Bismillah uses just one name.

"Everything is confused now," he said. "At night we hear shooting and rockets, and we cannot light our lamps for fear of the Taliban. But if a mine explodes on the road, the army and coalition forces come and pressure us to find out who did it. The best thing to do is negotiate, but the Taliban will never negotiate as long as the foreign troops stay here."

One obstacle to security is the shortage of Afghan police and soldiers in the region. In terms of size and competence, the new national army and police force have lagged far behind what officials hoped for, so the government recently began recruiting and training local auxiliary police officers to serve in conflict zones such as Kandahar province.

The program has drawn praise and criticism. It gives men in poor rural areas an income and a vested interest in protecting their communities. But recruitment standards are low, training is cursory, and many who sign up are rejected because of hashish use or other habits.

Commander Ehsanullah Alizai, the provincial police chief, said local elders and district officials are choosing applicants for the new force and that each recruit is further vetted by his office. But he acknowledged that the two weeks of training they will get are far from adequate.

DOJ_NMG_0098005

"Of course it is not enough. It takes a lot of time and education to become a police officer. But this is an emergency," Alizai said, adding that 250 of the expected 1,000 new police officers have completed training and started work. "The security situation in Panjwai and Zhari was getting worse, and the government had to take action."

But the threat of further NATO bombing has not stopped the Taliban from launching new attacks, often against civilians. Last month, two insurgents on a motorbike ambushed Fazel Mahmad, a Panjwai elder, as he was taking his daughter to a doctor in Kandahar. Mahmad, who works with a government program that helps local insurgents return to civilian life, was shot in the neck and throat but survived after surgery at a NATO base.

"The local Taliban are sons of our soil, but the Taliban trained by al-Qaeda see all Afghans as infidels and Americans. They do not want any reconciliation," said Mahmad, who now speaks with a lisp. He said he saw many wounded Taliban fighters being treated at the NATO field hospital, where he said they cursed the medical staff and refused to eat.

In a second recent attack, insurgents opened fire on a clinic at a camp for nomads and refugees beside the highway from Kandahar to Panjwai and briefly kidnapped the doctor. Now the clinic building sits abandoned beside the colony of patched tents and thorn-bush camel corrals.

On Tuesday, several women in the refugee camp said they had fled there after airstrikes on their villages near Panjwai. One woman, Badro, shrieked and wept, saying two of her brothers and all the family's sheep and camels had been killed.

"Everyone is a witness. There were no Taliban there at all," she cried, shaking a fist. "The dead bodies of my family are still there. It is not safe to collect the pieces."

[On Sunday, a Pakistani suicide bomber detonated himself in Paktika province, killing 15 people and wounding 24, including an Afghan special forces commander, the Associated Press reported.]

The Afghan government has made efforts to console and aid survivors in Panjwai. Abdullah Shah said he was paid about $8,000 as compensation for his dead relatives. He was also taken to Kabul, where he said Karzai gave him a hug and promised him a new house.

Last week, the minister of rural development flew to Kandahar and met with a large group of elders from Panjwai, asking what they needed most. He was accompanied by Christopher Alexander, deputy U.N. representative for Afghanistan, who told them the goal was to transform their region "from this year's battlefield to next year's construction ground."

The delegation did not visit Panjwai because it was considered too dangerous, but Alexander said elders from several villages told him security was better because young men who had been fighting for the Taliban were now earning money on NATO construction projects. He also noted that several elders did not attend the Kandahar meeting, suggesting that they were suspicious of the government and sympathetic to the insurgents.

Mahmad, a fruit grower who remained in Panjwai that day, complained bitterly that the residents were trodden upon by everyone.

"We don't support the Taliban, but we don't want the foreign troops here, either," he said. "I blame President Karzai, too. If we had laws and honest government in this country, the Taliban wouldn't be fighting."

Bush Demands Afghan Action On Drugs (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 27, 2006

President George W. Bush called Hamid Karzai to demand more action against Afghanistan's world-leading drugs trade and reiterate continued US support, the Afghan president's office said.

Bush telephoned Karzai on Saturday, ahead of the NATO summit in Latvia next week where he is expected to press European allies for more support for Afghanistan's battle against the resurgent Taliban.

He said the United States would "reiterate its commitment at the NATO summit to the strengthening of security and reconstruction in Afghanistan."

He also assured Karzai "of the continued assistance of the international community and the United States of America in all areas and at the same time wanted Afghanistan to take effective measures in fighting narcotics."

This country's poppy crop yields about 90 percent of the world's opium, used to make heroin.

Despite internationally backed efforts costing millions of dollars, production jumped by nearly 50 percent this year to a record 6,100 tonnes, according to the United Nations' drug office.

Some analysts allege the booming production is a result of widespread corruption that assures impunity for kingpins of the trade, some of whom are alleged to hold senior positions in the government.

The two presidents also discussed preparations for traditional gatherings planned in Afghanistan and Pakistan in a new initiative to attack the Taliban insurgency that is most active in the border area.

The 26-member NATO alliance will discuss in Riga its mission in Afghanistan at the helm of the 37-nation International Security Assistance Force.

DOJ_NMG_0098006

The operation is the most ambitious in NATO's history and has seen some of the nations involved suffer their highest battle casualties in years. Commanders have called for more troops and equipment, especially in the south.

Nearly 40,000 foreign soldiers, most of them with ISAF and some with a separate US-led coalition, are in Afghanistan to help its police and army fight the Taliban, removed from government in 2001, and its allies.

UK Troops At Risk Over Plan To Stop Afghan Opium Crop (FT)

By Jimmy Burns In London And Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, November 27, 2006

Afghan government plans to eradicate poppy farming in southern Afghanistan risk drawing British troops into fierce fighting with an already embittered localpopulation, military officials and diplomats in the country have warned.

The governor of Helmand has promised to push ahead with a drug eradication programme early in the new year in the southern province where British troops faced unexpectedly fierce battles during the summer.

Local farmers have this month begun to plant for a new opium harvest as fears grow that the Taliban may exploit tensions developing between Nato and the local drugs barons and the farmers who work for them.

Brigadier Jerry Thomas, the UK's Camp Bastion commander, told the Financial Times that while he had the troops he needed in the Task Force's southern base, the drug eradication programme risked putting new strains on security.

"It is important that the programme is carefully targeted at the needy not the greedy . . . it will be a challenge to our hearts and minds campaign," he said.

Helmand province, where the bulk of Britain's 5,200 troops are based, saw a 162 per cent increase in the area used to cultivate opium poppy last year as a result of local officials profiting from the trade and efforts by insurgents to encourage opium cultivation.

A US official said this year's opium harvest inHelmand could be almost as large as last year and, without successful eradicationof the crop, international funding for future counter-narcotics efforts could be in doubt.

"The military is very focused on stability, but we have to look at the benefits of having some eradication when up to one-third of the UK's heroin comes fromHelmand province," said a western official in Kabul.

"Could anyone justify going to the Afghan government and asking to have no eradication In Helmand? It would look very suspicious."

Helmand has been relatively quiet since British troops withdrew from Musa Qala, a district in the north of the province, in late September, but eradication of the crop that many Afghan farmers depend on for their livelihood could reignite tensions.

The onset of colder weather has failed to reduce the violence in the country's restive south. A suicide bomber blew himself up at a crowded restaurant in south-eastern Patika province, killing 15 people and injuring24 yesterday. Separately, one Nato soldier and an estimated 57 insurgents were killed in fighting in four areas of southern Afghanistan at the weekend.

The destruction of poppy crops would centre on the districts of Nad Ali, Nawa and Nari Seraj, along the Helmand River and not far from the provincial capital of Lashkar Gah, whichBritish troops are hopingto use as a showcase forreconstruction and development.

Major Luke Knittig, a Nato spokesman, said that troops from the Nato-led Inter-national Security Assistance Force would assist the government with the eradication programme. But he cautioned: "You will not see Isaf troops in the fields lopping off the tops of poppies."

Military Tests Non-fatal Ways To Halt Vehicles (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, November 27, 2006

Two teams of military engineers competed to come up with a solution to a problem U.S. troops face daily in Iraq — how to stop civilian vehicles that blunder past checkpoints without destroying the vehicles or killing their occupants.

Maj. Gen. Ted Bowlds, commander of the Air Force Research Laboratory, said that after a little refinement, the teams' devices probably will be used in Iraq.

“These young researchers have come up with some pretty good, innovative ideas,” Bowlds said. “My guess is, based on what I've seen, bits and pieces of what we've found here will find their way out there (to Iraq) in some fashion.”

On a test range in the Arizona desert Nov. 10, Air Force Research Laboratory engineers used remote-controlled automobiles and high-speed cameras to test four devices they designed to halt oncoming traffic by non-lethal means.

A team of junior officers and civilian military engineers from Kirtland Air Force Base in New Mexico was declared the winner for a pair of devices that literally lift an onrushing car off the ground, bringing it to an almost instant stop from a speed of 35 mph.

DOJ_NMG_0098007

Bowlds said the Kirtland team's devices might be used in combination with elements of the designs produced by the competing team from Wright Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio.

The teams of six engineers and scientists, all with less than five years' military experience, were given six months and $60,000 to come up with prototypes to help solve a frequent problem on the ground in Iraq.

Hundreds of cars and pickups pass through U.S. military checkpoints every day. Civilians have been injured and killed when they failed to stop as requested and were fired on.

Troops trying to halt such vehicles are told to shoot at the engine block to disable the car, and if they miss, "they might hit something more important," said Capt. Chris Rehm, leader of the winning team from Kirtland.

"We're looking for some kind of non-lethal device we could give them," he said.

The teams came up with relatively similar solutions, despite working without knowing what the other was doing, said Mark Lewis, chief scientist of the Air Force.

They included:

·A wooden wedge placed in the roadway with barricades channeling traffic directly to it. If the vehicle does not stop and strikes the wedge, it is lifted up and slides to a stop, leaving the wheels of the vehicle off the ground and its undercarriage resting on the wooden wedge.

·A "sled" consisting of two low-lying aluminum boxes with air bags inside and grappling hooks at one end. When a vehicle passes over it, a soldier controlling the checkpoint can remotely activate the device, causing the hooks to latch to the front bumper and the airbags to deploy. The car is lifted off the ground by the airbags as the device drags along underneath the vehicle.

·A pair of devices made of steel tubing, one of them shaped like a triangle that rises up when struck, lifting the car's wheels off the ground.

The first two solutions won. The tests were conducted on sedans, an SUV and a van — typical civilian vehicles encountered by troops in Iraq.

They were carried out at a proving ground near Sierra Vista, Ariz., operated by Raytheon. The southern Arizona site was selected both to replicate Iraqi conditions and because the facility is a hub for the development of vehicles operated by remote control. Because the stops can be violent, the military did not want to use manned vehicles.

In addition to seeking a solution to a frequent problem, the Air Force conducted the competition as part of a program to develop expertise among junior military and civilian researchers and engineers who work for the research laboratory.

Lewis, the service's top scientist at the Pentagon, said the Air Force Research Laboratory tries to anticipate technologies of the future, and "at the same time, we've got folks out in the battlefield now whose needs we are trying to answer.

"One of the things the lab is looking at is how we can respond more immediately to problems we're facing today," Lewis said.

"We're concerned about saving as many lives as we can."

Iraq's Deadliest Zone: Schools (WP)

By Abdul Sattar Jawad

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

The mass kidnappings of scholars in Iraq underscore the chilling fact that the most dangerous place in Iraq is not the mosque, the marketplace or the military checkpoint, but the classroom. More than 250 academics have been killed since 2003, targeted by so many warring factions that it seems to be the only issue they can agree on. To date, not one person has been arrested for these murders.

Fundamentalist Sunni, Shiite, Baathist, anti-Baathist and other anti-American militants all have taken credit for these murders. Some are groups of students doing the Mahdi Army's bidding and willing to take matters into their own violent hands. But they all share a common feature: the use of terrorism as a weapon to murder academics, plunge university life into chaos and threaten learning at its source.

Fanatics targeting Iraqi academics are wreaking havoc on the educational system by threatening, kidnapping and killing innocent professors. I know well the nature of the threat. In seeking to bring education, debate and intellectual curiosity to Iraq, I was forced to flee when my life was threatened.

I became a target for a variety of twisted reasons. I was editor of the Baghdad Mirror, the only English-language weekly. Zealots who mistakenly assumed we were aligned with Western sensibilities bombed our building in March 2005, causing extensive damage but, mercifully, no loss of life. It was too dangerous to continue operating, and I reluctantly closed the paper the next day.

DOJ_NMG_0098008

At the time, I had just started as dean of the College of Arts at Mustansiriya University in Baghdad. Several weeks after the newspaper bombing, I was surrounded by students dressed in white shrouds and chanting death threats at me. Being a secular person, like most scholars, I was getting a chilling message of intimidation and violence.

Today the Mahdi Army is running university life in Baghdad, installing its political agenda by canceling classes, altering syllabuses to include its version of religion courses and ultimately driving away professors and students alike.

Virtually overnight I became an editor without a newspaper and a professor without students or a university. And the army of murderers continued to pursue me. One morning in April 2005 I was about to leave my home in Baghdad when I saw my terrified driver gesture for me to stay inside. There were two cars waiting outside, Kalashnikov rifles pointing out their windows. It was clear that the threats were going to escalate, placing my family, my colleagues and me at risk. I knew I had to leave.

My decision to flee was incredibly painful but necessary. I had to leave my wife and three children, and students whom I cherish. Before daybreak on a summer morning in 2005, a driver who knew how to avoid routes peppered with armed insurgents took me to Jordan.

That summer I was granted a visiting fellowship through a partnership between the Scholar Rescue Fund at the Institute of International Education and Duke University. The fund matches scholars, such as professors, doctors and journalists, with host institutions where they can continue their vital work free from fear. At Duke, I am teaching courses in Arabic literature. I am one of the lucky ones.

The Scholar Rescue Fund is grimly conscious that it cannot dedicate its work to Iraqi scholars alone. Despots around the world are waging terror campaigns against intellectuals and academicians. By year's end, perhaps as many as 500 scholars across the globe will be dead, targeted by groups that range from narco-terrorists to religious fundamentalists fighting in suicide and "martyr" brigades. In the struggle to save lives threatened on the classroom battleground, the Scholar Rescue Fund has much to do and little in the way of time or resources to do it.

I am determined to return to Iraq as soon as it is safe for me. Without an open and unfettered educational system, there can be no democracy. We cannot rebuild our country without academic freedom. We will never be able to provide an incubator for a new nation unless professors and students can freely discuss and debate literature and culture or listen to controversial positions on social, economic and political issues.

We are fighting not only for the streets of Baghdad but also for the classrooms. Rescuing our scholars has become as crucial in determining the future of Iraq as disarming the insurgents.

We may ultimately view victory in Iraq as the ability to restore Baghdad to its historical role as a home to intellectual greatness so that universities may once again buzz with the energy of our culture and literature and the celebration of the human mind. Until then, we must continue to find a "lifeboat" for every scholar who faces the murderous mob.

The writer is a visiting professor at the John Hope Franklin Center for Interdisciplinary and International Studies at Duke University.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

White-collar Crime Prosecutors In Slump (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 27, 2006

NEW YORK — When it comes to securities fraud cases, not all U.S. Attorneys are created equal. Defense lawyers, as well as many federal prosecutors across the country, acknowledge that the U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan has the most experience in the field, and is best positioned to bring complicated white-collar criminal cases.

But if federal prosecutors in Manhattan are the New York Yankees of their field, they've been on what seems to be a losing streak lately. Consider:

·After an appeals court overturned a guilty verdict against investment banker Frank Quattrone, prosecutors in Manhattan decided to drop the case. The office accused Quattrone in 2003 of obstructing an investigation into whether his bank rewarded prominent clients with hot IPO stocks, a practice known as “spinning.”

·A federal judge publicly rebuked two Manhattan prosecutors in June for their conduct in the government's investigation of tax shelter abuse by partners from KPMG. U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan said statements submitted to the court by prosecutors from the office were “misleading.”

·Last week, prosecutors dropped five cases against specialists at the New York Stock Exchange. In 2005, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan accused 15 specialists, who are responsible for buying and selling stocks on the NYSE floor, of putting their own interests ahead of those of the investors. Since then, charges against two of the specialists have been dropped, and a jury has acquitted two others. Two specialists have pleaded guilty, three were convicted and the final charged specialist fled the country and is a fugitive.

Despite the setbacks, no one's willing to say the office has lost its fastball. In fact, the decision to drop cases can be viewed as a sign of strength, say some observers.

In the specialist cases, a jury's willingness to acquit two men this year sent a powerful message. “If you're a good prosecutor and you're interested in doing the right thing, you listen to juries,” says Richard Owens, who recently left the Manhattan prosecutor's office for Latham & Watkins. “If you see what fact pattern juries will convict on and what they won't, there's little reason to proceed when there's little chance of success.”

“If you're an aggressive prosecutor and you bring aggressive cases, you're going to lose some,” says David Gourevitch, a white-collar criminal attorney in Manhattan. “It strikes me as the classy and quality thing to do.”

A spokeswoman for Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said there would be no comment on the matter.

ACS Officers Quit After Internal Options Probe (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

Finding of Backdating Snags CEO, Finance Chief As Scandal Fallout Spreads

The options-backdating scandal claimed more high-level officials, as the top two executives at a large technology-outsourcing company resigned after an internal investigation concluded they were closely involved in manipulation of stock options at their company.

Mark King, chief executive of Affiliated Computer Services Inc., and Warren Edwards, the company's finance chief, stepped down from their posts yesterday but will remain employees until June, the company said. Dallas-based ACS is one of the world's largest providers of back-office computer services to companies and governments, and has 55,000 employees world-wide.

The departures bring to more than 60 the number of corporate officials who have lost their posts as the options scandal continues to grow. It already has sparked one of the largest executive-suite housecleanings in memory, and more officials are likely to lose their jobs in coming weeks.

1 MORE ON OPTIONS

Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny2

Perfect Payday: Complete coverage3

In releasing the results of its internal probe, ACS said its investigators determined that Messrs. King and Edwards, along with Jeffrey Rich, a former ACS CEO who resigned in September 2005 before the options issues surfaced, intentionally backdated options in a "significant number of cases," increasing their own potential for profit, and prepared memos with phony dates to document the misdated grants.

Messrs. King and Edwards also misled the company's own directors and lawyers, the internal probe concluded, telling them earlier this year that there wasn't any backdating. ACS said that led the company to make an "inaccurate" securities filing in May that denied any serious backdating issues.

The company said it will face a charge of around $51 million to fix the faulty accounting caused by the misdating. The company said it hasn't yet determined how the adjustment will affect past and current financial statements or whether restatements would be required.

In a statement, Mr. King's lawyer, Karen Seymour, said her client voluntarily resigned as CEO and "cooperated fully" with the investigation. She added: "He acted at all times in good faith and did not engage in any intentional misconduct."

Gary P. Naftalis, a lawyer for Mr. Edwards, said his client cooperated "fully and forthrightly" with the probe and helped find and guide the investigators to relevant documents. Mr. Naftalis noted that Mr. Edwards didn't become chief financial officer until 2001, years after the problems apparently started. "He engaged in no intentional misconduct," Mr. Naftalis said, "and acted in good faith at all times in connection with the company's longstanding and historic options granting practices."

Aitan Goelman, a lawyer for Mr. Rich, said he couldn't comment, because he hadn't seen the probe's findings.

According to the company, only Messrs. Rich, King, and Edwards and one other lower-level management employee, whom the company declined to name, knew of the intentional misdating.

ACS named Lynn Blodgett, its chief operating officer, as its new president and CEO. John Rexford, an executive vice president, was named chief financial officer.

More than 130 companies, including titans such as Apple Computer Inc. and UnitedHealth Group Inc., are facing scrutiny from federal prosecutors and regulators examining whether executives improperly backdated stock-option grants. Options typically are designed to give recipients an incentive to see their company's share price rise, by allowing them to purchase shares in the future at the market price on the day the option was granted. Grants that are backdated to more favorable, lower-priced days give recipients an instant, built-in profit. So far, criminal charges have been brought against five ex-executives in two of the cases, with more charges expected.

DOJ_NMG_0098010

ACS's internal investigation, which reviewed grants from 1994 to 2005, was conducted by Marc L. Mukasey of Bracewell & Giuliani LLP, a former federal prosecutor in Manhattan. It absolved ACS directors, including ACS's founder and chairman, Darwin Deason, of any responsibility for backdating. Mr. Deason, who himself received two grants with particularly favorable dates, escaped blame even though he was CEO until 1999, and was chairman of the board's compensation committee from 1994 through August 2003. A company spokesman said Mr. Deason never exercised his options.

The probe described a convoluted process for awarding options, which began when Mr. Deason would give a "broad authorization" to the company's CEO for the grants. For grants to senior executives, the probe found, the "historical practice" was for Mr. Deason to call all of the board's compensation-committee members "on or about" the same date that he authorized the grants.

The internal probe found that the company's CEO or finance chief then selected the dates on which the grants would be awarded and prepared the paperwork. In a "significant number of cases," Messrs. Rich, King or Edwards used "hindsight" to select the grants, often by waiting until after the company's stock price hit bottom and then started to rise again, then picking the lowest price in the period, the probe found. Memos recommending the grants "were intentionally misdated" by one or more of the men "to make it appear as if the memoranda had been created at or about the time of the chosen grant date, when in fact they had been created afterwards," the company said the probe found.

The company said its board, unaware of the backdating, subsequently approved the grants via written consent documents that carried the improper dates.

ACS was among several companies included in a March article in The Wall Street Journal that used statistical analysis to identify executives who likely received backdated grants. The Journal analysis concluded that the odds were one in 300 billion that the pattern of past stock-option grants to Mr. Rich, the company's former CEO, was chosen by chance. At the time, the company denied backdating was the reason for the pattern of fortunate grants, in which Mr. Rich and other top executives received their options dated just ahead of steep rises in ACS's stock price.

In a conference call with analysts in April, Mr. King said preliminary results of an internal probe indicated that there hadn't been "intentional" backdating of stock options to senior executives and described any problems as a "procedural matter" that would get sorted out in a matter of months.

In a May securities filing, the company said it would likely need to take a $32 million charge against its earnings to rectify accounting from misdated grants, but said it "does not believe that any director or officer" of ACS had "engaged in the intentional backdating of stock-option grants in order to achieve a more advantageous exercise price."

In August, the company backtracked, saying its statements in May could no longer be relied upon.

ACS specializes in cutting cost out of corporate back-office functions such as payroll processing and document scanning. ACS also has scores of government clients, handling such chores as electronic record-keeping for county clerks and administration of cities' automated systems that ticket drivers who run red lights. Through the ups and downs of the tech industry, ACS has seen relatively steady success, though its share price has stagnated over the past five years. ACS shares traded Friday at $50.74 on the New York Stock Exchange.

ACS is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission and by the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York.

Mr. King joined ACS shortly after it was founded in 1988. He served as chief financial officer from 1995 to 2001, when he was appointed chief operating officer. He was named CEO in 2005 after Mr. Rich's resignation. Mr. Edwards, who joined ACS in 1996, replaced Mr. King as chief financial officer in 2001.

Mr. King received several options with the same unusual dates that plumped up Mr. Rich's paycheck -- including one purportedly granted on the very day the stock touched its lowest closing price of the quarter in July 2002, and another for a split-adjusted 100,000 shares that is dated at the annual low in 1998. Mr. King has so far cashed in 32,000 of the shares from that grant.

Options have represented the bulk of his compensation. All told, from ACS's 2001 fiscal year through last fiscal year, Mr. King has reaped $17.9 million in profits from exercising options -- more than three times his combined salary and bonus over that period, according to Standard & Poor's ExecuComp, which tracks executive pay.

ACS said the improper grants increased the potential profit of Mr. King's options by some $4.5 million -- a sum greater than he has been paid in salary for the past 10 years combined. He will have the exercise prices of his options outstanding adjusted upward by that amount. Mr. Edwards will also have some options repriced, the company said.

Write to James Bandler at james.bandler@wsj.com4 and Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com5

DOJ_NMG_0098011

San Diego Charges (WSJ)

By Nicole Gelinas

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

The SEC has announced that it has resolved its pension-fund fraud case against San Diego, with the city agreeing not to commit illegal shenanigans in the future and to hire an "independent monitor" to help it avoid doing so. Although the SEC went easy on the residents and taxpayers of San Diego in its settlement, it still has an opportunity to make an example of the former officials who the SEC determined committed the fraud. The feds should seize that chance to show they're serious about policing a sector of the investment world that remains vulnerable to similar fraud.

San Diego ran into legal trouble with its pension fund because elected officials wanted to keep its municipal workers happy by awarding them more generous pension and health-care benefits, but also wanted to keep taxpayers happy by sticking to a lean budget. The two goals were mathematically irreconcilable. So San Diego officials, with the cooperation of the board members of the city employees' retirement system (the majority of whom were also city officials), intentionally underfunded the pension plan for years. They used the "savings" to award workers and retirees more benefits, some retroactive. Because taxpayers couldn't see how much retirement benefits for public employees eventually would cost them, they couldn't protest against those high future costs. The fund also violated sound investment principles by using "surplus" earnings in boom years to pay extra benefits to retirees, including a "13th check" in some years. Trustees should have put such "surpluses" aside for years in which the market was down.

But the alleged escalated in 2002 and 2003, when city officials brushed aside warnings from outside groups, as well as from an analyst it had itself commissioned, about the fund's parlous financial straits. Although figures clearly showed that the pension fund would face a seven-fold increase in its deficit, to more than $2 billion, over less than a decade, San Diego didn't disclose what, according to the SEC, it "knew or was reckless in not knowing" was an inevitability, instead maintaining its charade. City officials disclosed not a word of the fund's financial troubles to potential investors or bond analysts as it raised nearly $300 million in new municipal securities during those two years.

The SEC elected to go easy on the city. The feds won't levy a fine against it, reasoning that it would end up being the taxpayers who would pay. This argument has merit, since these taxpayers are already on the hook for the $1.5 billion deficit -- roughly equal to the city's operating budget -- the pension-fund fraud had concealed. Taxpayers could face fallout if wronged investors sue the city. But while SEC won't punish taxpayers, it can't afford to go so easy on the officials it's still investigating. (The SEC doesn't name the current and former officials under its scrutiny, but former Mayor Dick Murphy, former city manager Michael Uberuaga and former auditor Ed Ryan, as well as members of the City Council, all had degrees of responsibility for and knowledge of the pension fund's operations.) The SEC must demonstrate that it considers the fraud officials committed against the city's bondholders to be just as grave as similar frauds in the private sector.

People who invest in municipal bonds do so because they feel that such investments are safer than investing in the common stocks of corporations. That's why cities and states enjoy access to capital at affordable interest rates. And, for tax reasons, municipal-bond investors often invest in the bonds of the city in which they reside, so they face double jeopardy. In the first place, if city officials are committing fraud, their bonds will turn out not to be as sound (and thus not as valuable) as they thought they were. The second risk is that they will have to pay higher taxes, or suffer lower government services, to cover pension-funding shortfalls in their city's budget if that is the case.

The SEC's settlement with San Diego doesn't preclude it from levying fines or recommending criminal charges against culpable high-level city officials. The SEC mustn't pass up this chance to hold up San Diego as a warning to other municipal officials who may be tempted to treat taxpayer-guaranteed pension funds as slush funds whose resources can be used to curry favor with public employees.

Ms. Gelinas is a contributing editor at City Journal.

A Big Apple Strategy (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

New York City has long considered itself the capital of the world. Some may think that a prideful conceit, even though some 45 million visitors descend on it each year. But since 1950, nobody could argue with New York's claim to have replaced London as the world's financial capital. New York is home to the broadest, most efficient, and liquid capital markets and boasts the highest concentration of the world's largest financial firms.

Now, however, New York is challenged-and the evidence is in the numbers. Last year, only two of the 25 largest international initial public offerings were issued by firms using American capital markets. London's Alternative Investment Market, instead, has become the exchange of choice for listings by small companies, with 433 new IPOs last year alone, versus just 155 on New York's Nasdaq. In 2000, by contrast, 90 percent of the funds raised by large foreign companies in new IPOs were raised in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0098012

Today those numbers have been stood on their heads: Just 10 percent of new offerings are issued in the United States while 90 percent are raised outside. Over the past six years, the number of non-U.S. IPOs listed here has fallen by almost 75 percent. At the same time, a number of foreign companies have left the New York Stock and Nasdaq exchanges while more and more American companies are opting to leave the public markets and take themselves private.

What's going on? It's called Sarbanes-Oxley. That's the federal law that was enacted in the wake of the Enron, Tyco, and WorldCom scandals. The law offers benefits of transparency, accountability, and investor protection. Fine, but as our insightful new treasury secretary, Henry Paulson, pointed out just last week, the law also has a seemingly innocuous section, known as 404, that has proved to be real corporate overkill.

Sarbanes-Oxley was intended to prevent a repeat of the terrible corporate scandals we have seen over the past few years, but the exhaustive audits the law requires have more than doubled the costs for outside auditors. Large companies, in one study, fund nearly 70,000 man-hours of audit time-an average of $2.4 million more per year than expected.

It is reasonable to ask whether doubling the costs has yielded double the benefits-except for providing a bonanza and a fat retirement plan for accountants, auditors, and lawyers. The onerous costs of Sarbanes-Oxley, moreover, fall disproportionately on small- and midcap companies-the very ones that provide the innovations and entrepreneurship we rely on for economic growth. That one straw might not break the camel's back, but there are more. According to a recent Ernst & Young survey, Sarbanes-Oxley has also created a sharper adversarial relationship between corporate boards and management. Boards now tend to focus more on regulatory-compliance issues than on competitive strategies, with members less worried about falling behind than falling afoul of the complex rules of Section 404.

Repression. There's also a third straw on the poor camel's back. Last year, class action lawsuits cost American corporations an astonishing $9.6 billion, compared with just $150 million in 1997. We must stop so many frivolous lawsuits. On top of this, we have at least 10 federal, state, and regulatory bodies compared with only one in Britain, with each more aggressive than the next. Britain's single oversight body has found ways to reduce the cost of doing business there to less than 10 percent of what it is here. Can we not learn from this?

Board Games (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

The Hewlett-Packard meltdown has offered some poignant lessons in corporate board dysfunction, and with any luck the Securities and Exchange Commission has been taking notes. One way to create more HP-like storylines would be for the nation's top financial regulator to appease the latest political agitation for greater "shareholder democracy."

That's what the SEC will consider at a December hearing to discuss "direct access," or the idea of giving shareholders more power in determining the makeup of corporate boards. What makes the "democracy" campaign so ironic is that this proposal isn't designed to make companies more responsive to most shareholders. It is instead a costly, divisive and deeply unfair proposal that would force many companies to bend to special-interests. * * *

It's also an idea that we'd hoped had vanished with former SEC Chairman Bill Donaldson, who failed to push through a direct access rule in 2003. The idea looked dead until September, when the Second Circuit Court of Appeals got into the act. The SEC has for years allowed companies to reject requests by shareholders to have their own slate of directors included on a company's official election materials, and insurer AIG had blocked such a move by union giant Afscme. The union sued and the court ruled against the SEC, in part because its policy statements were contradictory.

That's true, if only because the SEC has been reluctant to be seen as against "shareholder rights." The result has been a confused string of opinions and public comments. The SEC would be doing itself, and shareholders, a favor if it now used this opportunity to explain why "shareholder democracy" is both misnamed and overrated.

Companies aren't mini-nations. A corporation has no governing powers over its shareholders. Management and boards do not exist as antagonistic "checks" on each other but are supposed to operate together to achieve business and financial success. Shareholders who feel a company is underperforming already have the ultimate "vote," which is to sell their stock.

The direct access rule, in contrast, would give a small group of activists unreasonable influence. The Donaldson-era access rule would have allowed "major" shareholders the right to nominate their own candidates on the company ballot if 35% of proxy votes are withheld from the company's nominees. So in this "democracy," only big shareholders get privileges.

Those large shareholders tend to be union-dominated pension funds, with ambitions for turning board rooms into new political battlegrounds. For an inkling of their agenda, consider the war the California public employees' pension fund (Calpers) waged in 2004 against Safeway, when it withheld its support for the CEO in retaliation for his tough bargaining with unions. More recently, some pension funds threatened to move investments out of financial firms that supported Social Security reform. This was an attempt to muzzle corporate speech masquerading as "shareholder rights."

DOJ_NMG_0098013

Or consider the 350 shareholder proposals that members of the Business Roundtable fielded last year, most forwarded by the very groups that now want a seat at the board table. DuPont was asked to link executive pay to social criteria. General Electric was asked to report on the feasibility of ending its nuclear energy business. Merck was supposed to adopt a drug-price restraint policy, and Pepsi to report its political contributions in newspapers. Most of these proposals are rejected by shareholders who understand they have little to do with achieving higher returns on their investment. Yet companies are still required to spend shareholder money to address each proposal.

Imagine the costs if the SEC gives pension funds special rights to elect board members beholden to these agendas. One probable result would be the balkanization of boards, especially because the funds that exercise sway do not owe any fiduciary duties to other shareholders. Director dysfunction -- rival camps, leaks, obstruction -- was precisely what happened at Hewlett-Packard, distracting management and harming the company's public image.

The SEC might also look at Europe, where "codetermination" -- in which unions are guaranteed seats on corporate boards -- has allowed unions to redirect capital to labor (rather than business) priorities. Such a rule would also give managers one more reason to take their companies private (see the article on the opposite page), or to float their shares in Hong Kong or Shanghai, or somewhere other than in the United States.

Pension funds claim they should have more control, because many are invested in indexed mutual funds and are thus "stuck" with companies. Yet many pension managers simply replicate index funds by making their own investments in a basket of companies, and nothing stops them from selling individual companies they believe are performing poorly. Another complaint is that it is too costly under today's rules to mount a proxy campaign. Yet while proxies can be expensive, those costs are presumably justified if an alternative slate of directors would truly do a better job. * * *

The fallout from the Enron-WorldCom scandals has already spurred companies to become more responsive to shareholders. The most important steps have included the dismantling of anti-takeover provisions, such as poison pills. Takeovers are a far more effective method of turning around companies than board shuffles, and shareholders are benefiting from this more open market for corporate control. The ever-rising CEO churn rate backs up that point. Some companies are also experimenting with new "majority voting" rules in director elections, which set the bar higher for the support directors must get to stay in place.

If the SEC feels obliged to respond to the direct access clamor, it could call for better disclosure and some tweaking of the proxy process. Chairman Chris Cox has been talking up Internet use to lower costs, simplify forms and get more shareholders involved. That would give all shareholders more of a voice, rather than a select few whose goals are partisan, not "democratic."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Subject Of FBI Probe Tells Of Weldon Ties (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Mark Fazlollah

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 27, 2006

When Center City lawyer and Russian trade expert John J. Gallagher lost a $2.5 million investment in a cognac distillery in a former Soviet republic, a family friend stepped up to help - in a big way.

The friend, U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon, first called the president of Moldova. When that didn't work, Weldon went to the House and proposed cutting all U.S. aid to Moldova until Gallagher got his money back.

That deal, now part of an FBI corruption investigation, wasn't the only time that Weldon used his office to help Gallagher, a lawyer who specializes in putting together business deals - from Philadelphia City Hall to the U.S. Capitol to the Kremlin.

Weldon also backed an effort that funneled federal money to former Soviet scientists working for a partnership between Gallagher and a Russian firm.

Gallagher's software firm apparently had no workers and did little in the partnership, The Inquirer found.

Weldon lost his congressional seat to Democrat Joe Sestak three weeks ago. But there was no letup in the FBI corruption investigation involving Weldon, his daughter Karen's consulting firm, and Gallagher.

In the first interview given by one of the subjects of the FBI probe, Gallagher said his relationship with Weldon went back 30 years. Their careers, he said, dovetailed in Russia.

"I was very lucky to have my representative also have an interest in Russia," Gallagher, a resident of Weldon's district, said in his spacious office at 18th and Market Streets in Center City.

DOJ_NMG_0098014

Gallagher said Weldon, in trying to help him in Moldova, was simply providing good constituent service. "It's my congressman's job," Gallagher said. "He represents me, and a foreign country wronged me."

Agents who searched his law office were investigating possible violations of a federal bribery law, Gallagher said. "Of course I didn't pay Curt Weldon," he said.

Gallagher declined to give details of the FBI raid last month, other than to acknowledge that agents took his Moldova file, among others. He said he was cooperating with the investigation.

For years, Gallagher and the Weldon family have constantly crossed paths in the network of U.S.-Russian trade groups.

Gallagher, who says he has made more than 100 business trips to Russia, helped Karen Weldon's firm there. He said he introduced her firm, Solutions Worldwide, to officials from a Russian company that makes drone spy planes.

The aviation firm gave Solutions a $12,000-a-month contract. Curt Weldon pushed the Navy to buy the drone, and officials got as far signing a contract with the Russian company.

But Gallagher said the deal ended because of news coverage of Karen Weldon's contract.

The first client of Solutions Worldwide was the Russian natural-gas giant Itera International Energy. The FBI also raided its Florida office last month.

Weldon set up a Library of Congress dinner for Itera in 2002 and, on the floor of Congress, pushed for a federal grant to the firm. A month later, Itera hired Solutions for $500,000 a year.

Weldon and his daughter, as well as Itera officials, have denied wrongdoing.

Gallagher said he met Itera officials but declined to elaborate, saying only that he did no business with them. "If it's part of the grand jury investigation, unfortunately I can't speak."

Until recently, Gallagher may have been better known in Russian trade circles than in his own hometown. A graduate of La Salle University and the University of Pennsylvania law school, Gallagher, 54, started his own law firm in 1980.

Gallagher also knew his way around City Hall.

During the City Hall corruption investigation, the FBI recorded him talking to the late power broker Ronald A. White about raising money for Mayor Street and trying to win city deals, sources said.

On one such 2003 call, Gallagher phoned White from Russia to complain that he wasn't getting his share of city legal work. White said he'd take care of it. "Relax," White told him. "Everyone knows who you are."

Gallagher said in the interview that he and White had been friends since they attended law school together three decades ago.

He said he never paid White to help him with the Street administration. For "all good friends," he said, White "would lend a hand."

Gallagher said in the interview that he held two Street fund-raisers with White - one raised about $25,000 - because he was "a lifelong Democrat."

Gallagher also is close to top Republicans in Delaware County, where he lives.

He has given $48,000 to the Springfield Republican Party over the last six years - three times more than any other donor, campaign records show. The Springfield party is run by Charles Sexton, Karen Weldon's partner in Solutions Worldwide.

Gallagher said he contributed because he had known Sexton for 25 years. He said he never got work from Delaware County.

In 2003, Gallagher and Delaware County Republican chief Thomas J. Judge Sr. traveled to Serbia to see Sexton get an honorary doctorate. Gallagher said the degree was arranged by the wealthy Karics, who were banned from the United States because of their ties to the late dictator Slobodan Milosevic.

The Karics also hired Karen Weldon to try to improve their image. Gallagher said he did no business with the Karics.

In his forays to Russia and Eastern Europe, Gallagher wears many hats: sometimes private lawyer, other times an agent of U.S. antinuclear policy. Sometimes, the roles blur.

One example: Gallagher now serves as chairman of the United States Industry Coalition, a Weldon-backed, government-financed group that lines up private business ventures in Russia.

Shortly before Gallagher became a board member, the agency in 2001 helped set up a deal for him with one of Russia's leading software companies.

Gallagher's firm, CTG Software Inc., had no address, other than his law office, and apparently no employees. It was founded two days before the Energy Department announced it would fund the venture, which aimed to find software jobs for former weapons scientists.

About 12 months later, Gallagher dropped out without getting any of the federal money. The endeavor fell short of expectations, hiring far fewer scientists than planned.

Gallagher gets strong support from the industry coalition's former CEO, Victor Alessi.

DOJ_NMG_0098015

"I am convinced that his involvement in this project was altruistic," Alessi said.

Some coalition board members said Gallagher had helped the organization as chairman.

"One of the very strongest suits was his relationship with Curt Weldon," said former coalition chairman David C. Bell, president of Phygen Inc., a high-tech Minneapolis firm doing business in Russia. "Curt has been a friend of [the coalition]. It's nice to have friends in positions of power."

The former director of the Energy Department's nonproliferation programs said he "would not have chosen someone with a known close relationship with Weldon to be chairman of the board with [the coalition]."

"My goodness, it raises the appearance of a conflict of interest," said John Hnatio, who called Weldon a "major funder" of the program.

Weldon also was at Gallagher's side in a fight to help a young Russian crippled in an accident with a U.S. diplomat.

In 1998, U.S. Consul General Douglas Kent was uninsured when his SUV hit a Toyota in the Russian city of Vladivostok. Passenger Alexander Kashin, then 23, was left paralyzed.

Gallagher filed a federal suit in Philadelphia and gained wide attention in Russia. Protesters picketed the U.S. consulate in Vladivostok. "I thought... if we initiated suit, it could be settled very quickly," Gallagher said.

But the case lingered.

In May 2004, Weldon pushed Congress for a settlement, describing the case as a human-rights issue. He said the suit was filed by a "very prominent Russian lawyer in Philadelphia by the name of John Gallagher."

Congress took no action, and a federal court dismissed the case against Kent last month.

Kashin will never walk again, Gallagher said, but he hasn't given up trying for help from the U.S. or Russian governments.

Kent said he was confused by Weldon's role. "I could never tell whether Gallagher was working for Weldon or Weldon was working for Gallagher," Kent said.

The FBI is clearly interested in Weldon's actions in the Moldova affair, Gallagher said.

In that venture, Gallagher said he put up $500,000 of his own money and gathered the rest from a group of investors, several from Delaware County.

At first, he said, he received assurances from top Moldovan officials that the sale had the government's blessing.

He met with Moldova's prime minister and the man who later allegedly scammed him. The prime minister said, "deal with him," Gallagher said. He cited that incident in a 2004 deposition in a suit investors filed against him.

After Gallagher deposited the money in an Eastern European bank, he said, it disappeared. When Gallagher returned to Moldova, he said officials acted as though they didn't know him.

In 2003, Gallagher went to Weldon, who offered the amendment to cut off foreign aid.

"A longtime constituent of mine invested $2.5 million in Moldova," Weldon told Congress. "I have taken this matter to the president of Moldova on several occasions."

Weldon demanded that Moldovan officials recover the lost money. But he later withdrew the amendment to cut off aid.

Gallagher vowed to continue fighting to get the money back from Moldova because some investors are "dear friends."

"This isn't something I'm forgetting about because the FBI took the file," he said.

To view the U.S. Industry Coalition Web site for John J. Gallagher's firm, go to http://go.philly.com/usic

CORRUPTION'S SCENT (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 27, 2006

AS THE 2007 mayoral election season begins and Philadelphia pols engage in the predictable frenzy of raising money, spreading rumors, begging and bluffing for support, talking trash and trading gossip, something is different from past campaign chatter:

They're not sure who else may be listening.

Over the past four years, the FBI and federal prosecutors have gone on an anti-corruption crusade, nailing more than two dozen people on corruption charges and shaking the city's Democratic power structure to its core.

"I assume I have no confidential communications now. Everybody is mindful," said a politically active lawyer, who like many interviewed, spoke only on condition of anonymity.

Besides stirring uneasiness about who investigators are listening to, the probes and their legislative fallout have dramatically altered the rules for political fundraisers and donors.

The combined effect is an altered political climate for 2007.

"I think it's changed everything," said one Democratic ward leader, who also spoke on condition that he not be named. "Contributors are much more skittish. Out-of-town contributors just don't like to get involved in Philadelphia campaigns.

"There's new contribution rules, and a general sense of bad karma, bad weather, bad things happening, so maybe you should just stay away from Philadelphia."

The anxiety is widespread because the feds haven't focused on just one political organization in town. They've investigated - and, in two cases in particular, successfully prosecuted - a number of prominent pols from throughout Philadelphia's political landscape:

· The City Hall corruption probe nailed two of Mayor Street's friends and fundraisers as well as his city treasurer, several private businessmen and others.

· An investigation continues into State Sen. Vincent Fumo and a community nonprofit group he's associated with. So far, only two state Senate employees have been charged.

· City Councilman Rick Mariano and five businessmen were indicted and convicted. Mariano is now serving time in a federal prison.

· Authorities recently executed a search warrant at the home of labor leader and potential mayoral candidate John Dougherty. The exact nature of that investigation is unclear.

The investigations occur at the same time as national scandals involving congressional leaders in trouble for everything from campaign-finance violations to improprieties with congressional pages.

And in Philadelphia, pols are edgy.

"There's a shunning effect when somebody's name gets mentioned in an investigation," said one prominent Democrat. "There's a kind of guilt by association, then after a period of time, if nothing happens, it begins to heal."

U.S. Rep. and Democratic city committee chairman Bob Brady said if politicians are apprehensive about investigators, it's for good reason.

"It's devastating to an elected official," Brady said in an interview. "A rumor gets started that you're under investigation, and if the FBI says they'll neither confirm nor deny, you're in trouble."

In February, Brady fielded calls from numerous reporters who'd been tipped by political sources that his Washington office had been raided by the feds.

No media carried the story, and the FBI quickly issued a statement clearing Brady. But the episode demonstrated how prominently federal investigations figure in the city's political life now.

Another clear way that corruption probes have changed Philadelphia politics is the presence of new laws driven by the perceived need for reform.

Campaign contribution limits for city elections were enacted shortly after the 2003 election and modified in 2005, and other City Council ordinances now restrict contributions among those who want no-bid city contracts or financial assistance for development projects.

"That's a very tangible impact that will play itself out in this [mayoral] campaign," said Zack Stalberg, president of the Committee of Seventy, the nonpartisan political watchdog group. "Candidates will probably be raising and spending less money, and if you have to buy fewer TV commercials you'll have to figure out other ways to get your message across."

Brett Mandel, director of Philadelphia Forward, said the probe and ensuing reforms have pushed candidates in the right direction.

"You've seen candidates working to comply with the contribution limits, even when it's not so clear what they mean," Mandel said. "And when they cut corners, there are lawsuits and at the very least a shame factor that's made them defensive about it. The shame factor is something that's been missing in Philadelphia politics for a long time."

One question embedded in discussions of the probes is why U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan has been so actively going after Philadelphia politicians.

Meehan says when he came into the job in November 2001, he made public corruption a priority, and he notes that success in public-corruption cases tends to bring in more information about alleged wrongdoing.

"When it occurs to people involved in the [political] process that something will actually be done, they're more likely to bring issues to our attention," Meehan said.

Meehan has also gone after politicians in Norristown and elsewhere.

Another explanation is a new focus from the FBI on public corruption. Spokeswoman Jerri Williams said that when Robert Mueller became FBI director in 2001, "we shifted our priorities... . Public corruption became the number-one criminal priority."

"The cases aren't made by the U.S. attorney," said Peter Vaira, who was U.S. attorney here under Presidents Carter and Reagan. "You need agents, people on the street to follow up on leads."

In the end, Meehan said, politicians who do the right thing have nothing to worry about.

"It's conduct that invites scrutiny," Meehan said. "The investigations are determined by the actions of those who are investigated."

DOJ_NMG_0098017

South Florida Corruption Capital Of U.S. (PALMBEACHP)

By Jane Musgrave, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), November 27, 2006

South Florida is the public corruption capital of the country, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Between 1996 and 2005, a record-setting 576 people were convicted of federal corruption charges in the district that extends from Key West to Sebastian, according to the agency's most recent annual report.

That's far more than the 402 convicted during the same 10 years in Washington, D.C. or the 453 convicted in Chicago, where political machines have been rolling for decades.

New York City, another hotbed of government scandal, didn't even come close. A mere 374 people were convicted of public corruption charges during the last decade, the report shows.

Some political scientists said they were surprised South Florida beat out its more time-honored counterparts for the dubious distinction. But, having watched scandals rock the airport, numerous cities and other government agencies in Miami-Dade County, they said they expected it would be high on the list.

"If you had given me a multiple choice test and South Florida was one of the choices, I probably wouldn't have checked it," said Stephen Craig, a University of Florida political science professor. But if "all of the above" were an option, he said he would have recognized it as a player on the corruption scene.

The reasons South Florida has been plagued by public corruption are many and varied, observers say. Rapid growth, an influx of immigrants who may have a different view of how government business is run, skyrocketing land values and aggressive prosecution are all factors, political scientists said.

But attitudes are key, most say. "It reflects the political culture of the area," Craig said.

In the wake of the wide-ranging influence-peddling scandal involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff, it appears that prosecution of political corruption is increasing.

However, justice department officials say perception isn't reality.

"There's not been a sudden explosion in these types of cases," said Bryan Sierra, a justice department spokesman. "They've been there all the time."

The Abramoff scandal, with tentacles that reached dozens of members of Congress, was huge news across the nation.

"The profile of the cases increased, if not the volume," Sierra said.

Agency numbers shore up his claims.

From 1986 to 2005, the agency says, 23,602 federal, state and local officials and private citizens were charged with some form of public corruption. The most - 1,276 - were charged in 1987. Only 984 were charged in 1996.

The numbers increased steadily each year until 2004, when 1,213 people were charged. The number dropped slightly in 2005, when 1,163 people were charged with a variety of public corruption offenses.

Government To Appeal Acquittal Of Zucchet (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 27, 2006

Ex-councilman's lawyer calls move a 'mistake'

The government will appeal a federal judge's controversial decision to overturn a jury's guilty verdicts against former San Diego City Councilman Michael Zucchet.

San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who lobbied heavily for permission to appeal, waited an unusually long time for approval from the Solicitor General's Office, an arm of the Justice Department that makes all decisions about appeals and represents the United States before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The approval, which took about a year, means Justice Department lawyers have concluded that the jury's verdict was correct, that there was sufficient evidence to convict Zucchet of trading political favors for money, and that it's likely a panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will agree.

A lawyer connected to the case said those involved were informed of the development by overnight letter late last week, but the Thanksgiving holiday might have delayed some notifications.

Zucchet and his lawyer, Jerry Coughlan, said yesterday that they had not yet been notified of the government's decision. Zucchet declined to comment, but Coughlan called the move “a dumb mistake.”

“They'll lose again because (U.S. District Judge Jeffrey T.) Miller was absolutely right. If the solicitor general made the decision on the law and the facts, it wasn't even a close call, but I also know this U.S. attorney's office put a lot of pressure on the solicitor general,” Coughlan said. Zucchet was indicted in 2003 along with former Councilmen Ralph Inzunza, Charles Lewis and strip club associates on extortion and honest-services wire-fraud charges. They were accused of scheming to deprive citizens of honest services by surreptitiously trading efforts to repeal a law banning touching between strippers and patrons for campaign contributions.

Zucchet, Inzunza and Las Vegas lobbyist Lance Malone were convicted by a jury July 18, 2005. Lewis died before trial. Malone's boss, strip club owner Michael Galardi, made a deal with the government and testified against the others. Galardi is scheduled to be sentenced in January.

In a stunning move a few months later, in November, Miller overturned a jury's guilty verdicts against Zucchet, acquitting him of seven corruption counts and granting a new trial on the remaining two counts.

During the same hearing, Miller also sentenced Inzunza to 21 months in prison, and Malone to 36 months in prison. Inzunza is free on bond pending appeal; Malone has agreed to drop his appeal as a condition of a subsequent plea bargain in a parallel corruption case in Las Vegas.

The government's opening briefs are due January 17. A response from the defense is due April 17, and the government has a month to reply. After that, it could be several months before arguments take place before a three-judge panel, and then up to a year for a decision.

The circuit panel could uphold or reverse the district court judge's decision to overturn the guilty verdicts. Or, it could split the decision by upholding some counts and reversing others.

In case of reversal, the jury's original verdict would stand. If the acquittal is upheld, the government then would have to decide whether tore-try Zucchet on the remaining two counts.

In making its decision on the San Diego case, the Solicitor General's Office assessed the likelihood that Miller's decision would be reversed, and evaluated the consequences should the government lose.

It's likely the government's appeal will focus in part on the controversial honest-services fraud statute and an instruction Miller gave to the jury that caused debate behind the scenes between prosecutors and the defense.

The defense argued that the statute is vague and jurors could mistake typical conduct of politicians – such as receiving contributions and later voting on matters affecting the contributors – for criminal conduct.

To protect the defendants from being unfairly convicted, the defense said the jury should be instructed that they can only convict on the honest-services wire fraud counts if they find evidence of a quid-pro-quo agreement between the defendant and the strip club employees.

The government argued that unlike the crime of extortion, which requires a jury to find a quid-pro-quo agreement, honest-services fraud does not require such proof.

The judge ruled in favor of the defense.

Miller reversed the conviction in part because he found no evidence of a quid-pro-quo agreement, and the prosecution has indicated that Miller's instruction to the jury will be an element of its appeal. The government is likely to argue that Miller erred when issuing this instruction.

To prove wire fraud under the statute, the government must show that the defendants planned to deprive citizens of honest services, it must show intent, and it must show that defendants used or caused someone else to use the mail or a wire communication – such as a telephone – to carry out the plan, according to a book of standard jury instructions by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco.

Coughlan has said he would not be surprised if the case went to the U.S. Supreme Court based on the controversy over the honest-services statute.

While pursuing that angle, the government is also likely to appeal on grounds that the judge was simply wrong, that there was plenty of evidence of a quid-pro-quo agreement.

The jury convicted Zucchet of three extortion counts, one count of conspiracy, and five wire fraud counts. Miller, the district court judge,acquitted Zucchet of the three extortion counts and four of the wire-fraud counts. The judge granted a new trial on the remaining charges of wire fraud conspiracy and wire fraud.

Miller sided with Zucchet's lawyers, who argued that he could not be convicted because there was insufficient evidence of a quid-pro-quo agreement between Zucchet and the strip club owner or his representatives. Miller ruled there was no clear relationship between campaign contributions Zucchet received in 2001 and 2002 from Malone and the action he took on behalf of Malone in 2003.

At Malone's behest, Zucchet referred adult entertainment matters to the City Attorney's Office for review. The referral happened at a public meeting of the Public Safety and Neighborhood Services committee.

The councilmen and Malone arranged for a man posing as a concerned citizen to appear before the committee, asking that the politicians increase the required distances separating strip clubs from schools, churches and other clubs. The man, who gave a bogus address, was an employee of one of Galardi's Las Vegas strip clubs.

DOJ_NMG_0098019

The distance requirement was intended to be a distraction for other council members and the media, the government maintained. The real plan was to sneak the no-touching matter onto the agenda.

Zucchet resigned his council seat after his conviction. Soon after his acquittal, he took a job with the Utility Consumers' Action Network, and he recently became vice president for development for downtown developer and former Port Commissioner Peter Janopaul.

Meanwhile, Inzunza's appeal is on the same schedule as the Zucchet matter.

Life As An FBI Mole In Berwyn (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, November 27, 2006

Former alderman brings bribery to light, but he lost his job and faced a mental breakdown

The Berwyn assistant mayor nodded toward Ald. Alex Bojovic and the two stepped into a City Hall bathroom near the council chambers, just as they had arranged.

The official, Sonny Stillo, handed $500 in cash, the first of two scheduled payoffs, to the alderman to vote for a controversial redevelopment.

And the whole transaction was captured on video.

Bojovic, it turned out, was more than an alderman--he was an FBI mole. He now explains that he had a tiny camera hidden in his clothes.

Earlier this month, Stillo was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison after pleading guilty to bribery in the case. Clifford Josefik, a developer also snared by Bojovic, is expected to plead guilty, possibly next month, according to court records.

Because the cases didn't go to trial, Bojovic never was called as a witness to tell his story in detail. In his first interview since the probe of public corruption came to light, Bojovic (pronounced Boy-o-vich) described for the Tribune a tension-filled double life that he had to keep confidential even from his wife.

"Maybe my career is not in government; maybe it's in acting," he quipped of his success in winning the trust of corrupt insiders.

Bojovic worked nearly two years undercover, pocketing at least $15,000 in payoffs made public so far and tape-recording more than 400 calls and meetings.

Bojovic said he secretly tape-recorded others, in addition to the two men charged, and is hopeful that federal prosecutors will bring additional charges.

For face-to-face conversations, he was usually "wired" with a recorder strapped to the small of his back, its microphone sewn into the lapel of his navy-blue sports jacket, he said.

The Tribune interview of Bojovic, 45, took place in his heated garage, which he used as his political campaign office and was the scene of many of his undercover meetings.

Bojovic asked a reporter for identification. His son, Chris, 22, still concerned about his father's safety, stood nearby.

After his undercover role came to light, Bojovic had a security system installed at his residence.

`Rebel Yell'

Code-named "Rebel Yell" by the FBI (in apparent reference to his status as an outspoken maverick alderman), Bojovic seemed an unlikely government mole on the surface. A product of Berwyn's Regular Democratic Organization, he had become a staunch opponent of then-Mayor Thomas Shaughnessy's administration. He was a politically ambitious alderman with a penchant for publicity.

Current Berwyn Mayor Michael O'Connor, a former Bojovic political ally, said he was stunned that Stillo even talked to Bojovic, let alone grew to trust him. "Alex had a reputation of being an honest person," O'Connor said.

"Obviously, [Bojovic] had to take on the persona of someone they could trust," O'Connor said.

Bojovic said Stillo and an elected official who hasn't been charged were initially wary of him. In a restaurant meeting, he said both urged him to quit going to the news media with complaints, a favorite Bojovic tactic.

"I was told, `Keep your mouth shut. We'll make you a rich man,'" Bojovic said.

Bojovic said he convinced them that he was tired of fighting with them. He also toned down his rhetoric and less frequently questioned Shaughnessy administration policies and expenditures.

Bojovic doesn't regret his decision to work undercover for the FBI, he said, but it came at a price. He said he grew increasingly nervous at being wired, fearful that the hidden recorder would be discovered.

The stress mounted as he juggled his work, political and undercover schedules. He slept fitfully and broke down crying at least half a dozen times from the stress, he said.

Bojovic said his outgoing personality ebbed. Friends and family noticed a change, but he couldn't explain what was going on because of the confidentiality of the investigation.

"I wanted so bad to talk to my wife, Diane, or my brothers," said Bojovic, who has six brothers, including Branko, who was a Berwyn alderman at the time. "The agents I worked with were great. But I felt like I had no one to talk to."

The FBI even brought in therapists once to try to help him cope with the anxiety.

Feeling overwhelmed, he abruptly quit his job as public works director for the Village of Lyons.

According to a government affidavit, federal agents approached Bojovic in summer 2001 after an undisclosed intermediary had contacted the FBI and suggested Bojovic knew of corruption and would be willing to help.

Bojovic said he agreed to cooperate in his first face-to-face meeting with the FBI.

In the interview, Bojovic struggled a bit to explain his motivations for working undercover. He said he had grown frustrated that thefts of political signs during his re-election fight earlier in 2001 hadn't been investigated by police.

Pressed further, he expressed unhappiness that his calls on the council floor for action on illegal dumping and other problems went ignored.

According to court records, Bojovic first won Josefik's trust. Over several months, Josefik sought the help of Bojovic, chairman of the council's Building, Zoning and Planning Committee, in his bid to buy the former Berwyn police station.

Swing vote

For an alleged $10,000 kickback from Josefik, Bojovic cast the swing vote as the council backed the sale, even though a church bid almost twice as much money for the property.

Bojovic described the vote as the toughest of his undercover role because it went against public sentiment. Many residents wanted the city to build a parking lot there, he said.

Next, Josefik set his sights on a dilapidated city-owned residence, charges alleged. In pleading guilty, Stillo admitted he rigged bids on the purchase to ensure Josefik would be the winner.

`Flip and flop'

In conversations recorded by Bojovic, Stillo laid out in detail his bid-rigging plans. "I know how to flip and flop," court records quoted Stillo as saying.

Armed with the tape-recorded evidence, federal prosecutors won court permission to hide a closed-circuit TV camera in the city clerk's office, the records show.

Bojovic said he supplied agents with a key to City Hall's front door to install the camera overnight.

The closed-circuit TV captured Stillo pulling four sealed bids inside a closed City Hall on a Saturday in November 2003. He returned them a couple of hours later. The highest bid was for $55,000, he later told Bojovic in a recorded call.

Five days later, on Nov. 13, Stillo returned to City Hall before it opened to the public and added Josefik's revised $56,000 bid to the pile, ensuring his would win.

It was that same day that Stillo met with Bojovic in his garage and offered $1,000 for the alderman's vote on the controversial plan to tear down a historic former bank building as part of the city's Super Block project, a major revitalization effort along Cermak Road.

That night, shortly before a scheduled council meeting, Stillo nodded at Bojovic, their pre-arranged signal to meet in the men's room. Stillo quickly handed over the first payoff--five $100 bills stuffed in an envelope.

At the council meeting, Bojovic delayed the Super Block vote after telling Stillo that he had to explain his flip-flop on the issue with constituents. But the council voted to accept Josefik's secretly rigged bid to buy the city-owned residence.

The undercover project ended less than two weeks later with Stillo's arrest. Bojovic said he forced the issue with the FBI because he refused to vote for the Super Block project in his undercover role. Bojovic said he feared the historic building would have been quickly razed if the vote had passed.

"They had the cranes ready," he said.

After Bojovic's undercover role became public, he said he struggled for more than two years to find another job in local, county or state government. "I made a name for myself--a rat," he said.

Lyons hired him back as public works director earlier this year.

Bojovic ran for mayor in 2005, making his undercover work the centerpiece of his campaign, but he lost handily in the Democratic primary.

He believes his undercover efforts, though, contributed to Shaughnessy's decision not to seek re-election.

While he has been out of public office since his 2005 defeat, Bojovic said he plans to run again for mayor in 2009.

- - -

Undercover crime fighters

DOJ_NMG_0098021

In the last quarter-century, moles have played a pivotal role in gathering evidence for federal authorities in some of Chicago's most successful corruption investigations:

JOHN CHRISTOPHER: A mob-connected contractor doled out more than $150,000 in bribes in 3 1/2 years of undercover work during the 1990s. The Operation Silver Shovel probe led to the convictions of former Chicago Ald. Lawrence Bloom, once the council's conscience, as well as five aldermen and six others. But Christopher received among the stiffest prison terms for engaging in wrongdoing while he cooperated with authorities.

ROBERT COOLEY: A corrupt lawyer walked into the U.S. attorney's office in 1986 and said he wanted to help the government bring down the mob. His 3 1/2 years of undercover work in Operation Gambat exposed mob influence in City Hall and resulted in more than two dozen convictions of judges, mobsters, politicians, police officers and lawyers. In 1997 Cooley's testimony helped convict alleged mob hit man Harry Aleman in a historic retrial; Cooley had bribed a judge to acquit Aleman in the original trial.

TERRENCE HAKE: An idealistic assistant state's attorney upset over corruption in the Cook County court system. His cooperation in the early 1980s led to the landmark Operation Greylord investigation. In 3 1/2 years of undercover work, he fixed drunken driving, narcotics, robbery and other cases for FBI agents posing as criminals. Fifteen judges and dozens of lawyers and court personnel were convicted. As part of the probe, authorities bugged a judge's chambers for the first time in U.S. history.

MICHAEL RAYMOND: A con man who agreed to pose for the FBI as a corrupt business representative after his arrest in 1984 on a weapons charge. The FBI set Raymond up in a posh apartment in Lake Point Tower after installing cameras and listening devices. The Operation Incubator probe led to the convictions of 15 people, including Chicago aldermen, city and county officials and business people. Raymond died in a federal prison in 1996 while serving a life sentence for masterminding a murder in New York.

WILLIAM `B.J.' JAHODA: Managed a lucrative gambling business for one of the Chicago Outfit's most violent street crews when he decided to turn his life around in 1989. The government moved Jahoda into a Chicago apartment wired with video and audio recording equipment from which he operated undercover for six months. His testimony in 1991 led to the first convictions of organized crime figures in a murder-related case in Chicago history.

---

mo'connor@tribune.com

Ex-McNamara Aide Faces Charge Over Campaign Work (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, November 27, 2006

The federal government brought a criminal charge Wednesday against an aide to former Wayne County Executive Edward H. McNamara, four years to the day after agents raided the Old Wayne County Building and allegedly found political materials on the aide's computer.

Robert S. Wisler of Livonia is charged with theft of government property under $1,000. He is the third Wayne County official charged since the Nov. 22, 2002, raid on the seat of county government.

The charge is a misdemeanor, but allegations in the complaint suggest federal officials have linked political activity on county time to officials for whom Wisler worked as well as those he directed.

Wisler "assisted in election campaigns (and) received campaign assignments from his county superiors as well as requests from political candidates," the complaint alleges.

"He delegated campaign work to other county employees who helped him perform such work during normal business hours."

Wisler, knowing it was illegal, "used county-supplied equipment and infrastructure," and "spent a substantial amount of the normal business hours doing campaign work without taking time off to do so."

The alleged offenses occurred between January 1987 and December 2002. Wisler could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

Wisler worked on "special projects" in the office of McNamara, the longtime Wayne County executive who died in February. McNamara spokeswoman June West confirmed in December 2002 that Wisler was subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury in the McNamara investigation.

Wilbourne Kelley III, a former airport official, is serving a prison term on bribery and extortion-related charges.

Wade McCann, a former Wayne County assistant prosecutor who reported to the prosecutor, not McNamara, pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor for directing an intern to assemble a database of political donors on county time.

County officials said earlier this month the grand jury investigation continues.

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

DOJ_NMG_0098022

FBI: Verhotz Embezzled For 10 Years (AP)

AP, November 27, 2006

CLEVELAND - A former KeyBank vice president accused of embezzling $29 million bought a multimillion dollar home on Long Island and spent $1.1 million on his fiancee's engagement ring, investigators say.

David F. Verhotz, 56, also lived a double life, according to pretrial statements made by U.S. Attorney Justin Roberts. He said Verhotz had recently divorced his wife in Ohio but told his fiancee, who lived with him in New York, that the marriage had ended 10 years ago.

"Mr. Verhotz can't even be honest with his family and his fiancee," Roberts said at a hearing earlier this month. He said Verhotz also told his fiancee, Kim Chen, that he had two children instead of four.

Verhotz, who has been fired as the head of the bank's international loans unit, carried out his financial scheme for 10 years, according to the FBI. He had worked at the bank for 11 years.

According to prosecutors, Verhotz used fake names to steal the money and support a lavish lifestyle that included the purchase of a $5.7 million home on Long Island. He also had $2.2 million in an escrow account to buy a town house on New York City's Park Avenue.

Investigators said he poured money into his New York home, including spending $30,000 for a chandelier and $50,000 for landscaping.

The money authorities say he embezzled also went toward his children's college tuition, which, along with some of the other funds, can't be recovered. About $10 million of the $29 million he is accused of stealing over the last three years has been repaid, and investigators say they have accounted for another $11 million in property, bank accounts, jewelry and other purchases.

Investigators believe the rest of the money may be in accounts under fake names, Roberts said.

Verhotz's attorney, Carlos Warner, a federal public defender in Akron, did not immediately return a call Sunday.

The alleged scheme began when Verhotz, who made $110,000 a year working at the bank, apparently got a fraudulent loan to pay the $30,000 to $40,000 he owed in back taxes, FBI supervisor Scott Gilbert said. Over the years, Verhotz would take out more loans to make payments on previous loans to avoid suspicion, according to the FBI.

That pattern continued without detection until this month, according to prosecutors, although it's unclear how it was uncovered. Bank officials are auditing seven more years of his activities to determine how much they believe he stole.

"I'm not going to speculate what the number might be," KeyBank spokesman Mike Monroe said. "Our investigation is now working backward to those earlier years."

Verhotz committed at least some of the fraud using the made-up identity of a European bank executive named Thomas Henderson, who supposedly borrowed millions from KeyBank, Roberts said.

Verhotz was arrested Nov. 11 at Cleveland Hopkins International Airport after getting off a flight from Dallas.

He could face six to eight years in prison if convicted on charges of bank fraud and embezzlement from a federally insured bank. A federal magistrate has denied bail while Verhotz awaits trial.

KeyBank is owned by KeyCorp., which has more than 900 branches in Alaska, Colorado, Idaho, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Utah, Vermont and Washington.

Zoning Laws That Bar Pedophiles Raise Concerns (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

FRANKLIN TOWNSHIP, N.J., Nov. 21 — The man identified in court documents as A. B. does not talk to his neighbors or tarry at the convenience store. Seventy-seven years old, soft-spoken and sometimes confused, he hardly ever leaves the little ranch house he bought in 1969. “People know what’s what with me,” he said.

What’s what with A. B. is that he moved back here last year after serving seven years in prison for sexually molesting two grandchildren and another youngster. And because his home is in a “child safety zone” drawn by the township, he may be forced to leave it.

But the public defender’s office in New Jersey, a state government agency, filed suit against the township on his behalf last month, claiming that the ordinance not only violates his right to due process, but also conflicts with a state law requiring that parole officers decide where registered sex offenders live. It is the first such case the agency has taken up, and could herald a curb on the rapidly proliferating local ordinances that threaten to push pedophiles to the fringes of civilization.

Such regulations — more than 100 have been enacted in New Jersey municipalities — are popular around the nation. More than 20 states have broad laws keeping sex offenders from schools, churches, playgrounds and the like. This month 70 percent of California voters approved expanding statewide restrictions to include more sex offenders, and authorized towns to designate even stricter limits.

DOJ_NMG_0098023

On Long Island, the East Rockaway Village Board voted on Nov. 13 to add areas in which sex offenders are barred: Now they cannot live within 1,000 feet of day care centers, community centers, places of worship, libraries and recreational facilities. And the Village of Babylon announced Tuesday that it had evicted seven offenders who were violating its residency restrictions.

The steady march of more and more restrictive regulations, though, is sending sex offenders into rural territory, which in New Jersey and on Long Island is scarce — or worse, into vagrancy, law enforcement officials say. Now these officials fear that uprooting sex offenders makes them less stable and harder to track.

"It certainly makes our job difficult," said Thomas James, New Jersey's director of parole, explaining that because his officers often have to find housing and social services for offenders, their banishment by local governments is "an ever-increasing problem."

But Michael DiGiorgio, chief of police here in Franklin Township, said, "We're not telling any of these individuals they can't live in Franklin Township; they just can't live where the children are."

"That's the whole purpose of the ordinance," he added. "To protect children."

A. B.'s name is on the state's registry — "I'm broadcast on the Internet," he said — but he was identified by randomly chosen initials in court papers, and granted anonymity for this article, so as not to expose his victims. His lawsuit, filed in State Superior Court in Gloucester County, is one of a handful filed across New Jersey in recent months to overturn the local rules, part of a national wave of litigation that is beginning to follow the multiplying new laws.

An Ohio court ruled in October that the state's buffer-zone law could not be enforced against offenders who lived in such zones before it took effect. Citing several constitutional concerns, a federal judge in California issued a temporary restraining order barring enforcement of the residency restrictions set forth in the state's recent ballot proposition.

In Georgia, plaintiffs in a class-action suit include several offenders who would seem to pose little further threat: an elderly man with Alzheimer's disease and another living in a hospice, along with a woman whose long-ago conviction was for having consensual oral sex with a 15-year-old boy when she was 17.

Sex Allegations Swirled Around Md. Man Before (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

Before he was charged in recent weeks with abusing three minors, Stanley D. Schwartz had a clean record.

But allegations of sexual misconduct with underage boys by the 64-year-old patent lawyer were first made more than a decade ago, a Montgomery County detective said.

Jordan Satinsky said fellow detectives opened an investigation in 1992 after the Rockville man was accused of sexually touching at least nine Thomas S. Wootton High School male basketball players, whom he coached.

Schwartz also has been accused of inappropriate sexual conduct with boys between the ages of 13 and 16, whom he chaperoned on ski trips and hosted at his home as foreign exchange students, the detective said.

Satinsky said none of the previous allegations brought to the attention of police led to charges because they couldn't be corroborated and no alleged victims wanted to come forward.

Schwartz's attorney, Sanford Berman, would not comment on the allegations or the supervisory roles that have placed Schwartz in close contact with male teenagers. He said his client should be presumed innocent unless proved guilty in court. He also said his client would not be available for an interview.

"We have no response to police allegations in the press," Berman said. "We respond to them in the courtroom."

Satinsky said he chose to disclose information about the earlier investigations because he believes others might be willing to come forward now that some have formally accused Schwartz of molesting them.

"I think he has been doing this for a very long time," Satinsky said.

Satinsky said Schwartz, a longtime Montgomery resident who has a law practice in Arlington County, has been estranged from most of his close relatives for more than a decade. He was married for nearly 30 years before his wife filed for divorce in 1997, according to court records.

Some of the teenagers said inappropriate sexual touching occurred after Schwartz had given them alcohol, the detective said.

Schwartz was apparently a volunteer coach at Wootton; a school system spokesman said he had never been on the system's payroll. Some of the allegations involving Wootton students were made to police after Schwartz took teenagers on out-of-state trips to help him do legal research, the detective said.

DOJ_NMG_0098024

The ski trips Schwartz chaperoned also took place in the early 1990s, Satinsky said. They were apparently sponsored by a Fairfax-based program, the detective said. Its name could not be immediately determined.

Satinsky said it is not clear how far the past investigations got because they were conducted by detectives who no longer work at the department. He said he found notes in the investigation folder indicating that some teenagers came forward but were later asked by their parents not to pursue the matter.

Schwartz was arrested in October after a 15-year-old exchange student from Kuwait told detectives that Schwartz fondled him Aug. 27, according to a charging document. The document provides the following account:

Schwartz, who was acting as a surrogate guardian because the teenager's host parents couldn't take care of him that night, told the teenager he could sleep in Schwartz's bed. Later that night, Schwartz got in bed with him while he was sleeping.

Schwartz fondled him and told him that "American boys sleep in their underwear, not T-shirt and shorts."

The teenager left the bedroom, knelt to pray and later called his host parents, who picked him up and called police.

Satinsky said Schwartz has hosted about 30 foreign-exchange students at his home in recent years. All have been white or light-skinned male teenagers -- most are from Europe -- and were ages 13 to 16.

Satinsky said officials of San Francisco-based AYUSA International, the company that used Schwartz as a host parent for foreign-exchange students, have cooperated with investigators. A phone message left Wednesday for an AYUSA employee who handles media inquiries was not returned.

Schwartz was charged with sexual abuse of a minor, sex offense and assault in the exchange-student case.

Schwartz was arrested again Nov. 15 and charged with child abuse and sex offense after a woman and a man separately told police that he molested them in the 1980s when they were 13 and 15, respectively. He posted $100,000 bond in the first case, two $50,000 bonds in the second and third and was released awaiting the resolution of the cases.

Anyone with information may call Satinsky at 240-773-5421.

Lanier To Focus On Crime Hot Spots (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

Cathy L. Lanier, chosen last week to lead the D.C. police force, said she plans to use "precision patrol teams" to reduce crime in certain parts of the city, focusing on the places and times when criminals are most apt to strike.

The patrols are part of a broader community policing strategy that Lanier hopes to push as head of the 3,800-member department. In an interview, she said she intends to give more authority to commanders and beat officers to customize their own crime-fighting programs.

Targeted patrols have been used by police departments for years to combat spikes in crime. D.C. police have more than a dozen hot spots that get increased attention -- although not to the degree that Lanier is proposing. She created a model in 2002 when she was commander of the 4th Police District in upper Northwest and Northeast Washington. It reduced crime there, she said, and could have an impact citywide.

The precision patrol teams focus on crime hot spots and the "hot times" in which they occur, Lanier said. In the model Lanier used, officers blanketed areas in marked police cars with flashing lights to maximize visibility. The hot spots were relatively small -- about six square blocks each. But they were accounting for large shares of robberies, burglaries, vehicle thefts and other crimes. Crime dipped within 90 days, she said.

"What will make or break this is engaging the people who have to carry it out and engaging the people who have to live with it," Lanier said.

Lanier, 39, a 16-year force veteran, was selected by Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D) to replace Charles H. Ramsey in a job that is often a lightning rod for criticism and complaints. A protege of Ramsey's, she said she plans to build on his successes in reducing crime while making the department more responsive to residents. If confirmed by the D.C. Council, Lanier would become chief in January, soon after Fenty takes office.

"With community policing, there is not one template you can implement across the city," Lanier said in the interview last week. "Every neighborhood is different."

Lanier, who was offered the position by Fenty earlier this month, said she still is crafting her plans and provided few details about how the precision patrols will work. She has not yet assembled her command team.

She said that she wants to put more officers on the streets, but not necessarily by increasing the size of the force. First she wants to explore increasing efficiency. But in any event, she said, the police must do more: be more visible on the streets, address neighborhood concerns in all parts of the city and simply be more polite to the public.

"I want us to be innovative," she said. "I want us to change the way we do this to mirror a successful business."

DOJ_NMG_0098025

Lanier most recently headed the force's homeland security division, a subject in which she holds a master's degree. But she has more than a decade of experience in patrol work, including stretches as an officer in the 6th District and as a commander in the 4th District.

She said she plans to rely on district commanders and officers to develop their own plans for dealing with disparate needs. Beat officers will get more freedom to work directly with residents and solve the problems they face -- a hallmark of community policing.

Some neighborhoods, especially those with an active night life, need a heavy presence of foot patrols at midnight. Others, mostly residential areas, need less, she said.

Residents in some high-crime neighborhoods have welcomed emergency tactics, including the occasional use of klieg lights to illuminate streets. People in other areas find the lights a nuisance and offensive, she said.

Wherever they are, Lanier said, police must be attuned to the people they serve. People walking into police stations should be greeted by someone who is polite and helpful, she said. Neighbors worried about yellow crime tape on their block should be able to get an answer from officers about what is happening there, Lanier said.

Fenty crisscrossed the city for two years before his election as mayor, listening to residents who at times fumed about crime, fear and their frustrations with police. Throughout the mayoral campaign, he touted his public safety fix: better community policing. He met Lanier while serving as the council member for Ward 4 and believed she shared his vision.

"Community policing" is a decades-old concept that has a broad meaning of building bridges to people and increasing police presence.

"Community policing has become a motherhood, apple pie catchphrase," said Brian Forst, a professor of criminal justice at American University. "It means different things in different places. If you look in New York City, it means arresting the turnstile jumpers. In Seattle it means bringing back Officer Friendly."

Lanier's talk of viewing the police force as a business is a staple of community policing, Forst said. "Managers have to manage by walking around; they have to get to know the customer," Forst said, and police must do the same.

In Washington, officials have been promoting community policing since before Ramsey arrived in 1998. The city has more than 40 Police Service Areas, each with teams of officers who are expected to know community members and their concerns.

Lanier said she wants to "go to the next level" and cited her experience with the precision patrol teams as an example.

Neighborhood activist Sara Green, who lives in Takoma Park, said she thought Lanier did a fine job when she headed the 4th District, from 2000 to 2002. But Green wished she had stayed longer, saying the district has had too much turnover.

"I thought she was a real human being, as opposed to someone in a uniform who walked a bureaucratic line," Green said. "Some of these top police are very military. You have a feeling that no matter what your human problem is, they are long past an understanding of it."

Andrew Karmen, a criminologist and sociology professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said Lanier's goals seem attuned to victims' concerns. Karmen, who has written books about crime and victimology, said victims want police to show up quickly when they call, to be treated with sensitivity, for their case to be solved and for police to be transparent about what they're doing.

Lanier said she hopes to make better use of community resources and tap into local universities to have academics study police procedures. As with Ramsey, she wants to push officers to continue their educations, as she did in her own career.

She credited Ramsey for moving the department forward and said she will make her own imprint. "I think everything he's done is great," she said. "But I want to do things differently."

Spain's Lesson On Fighting Spousal Abuse (CSM)

By Geoff Pingree And Lisa Abend

The Christian Science Monitor, November 27, 2006

MADRID

Margarita's partner - a university ethics professor - had abused her from the beginning of their 14-year relationship. But after she got pregnant with their first daughter, the violence became intolerable. Still, she didn't file her first police complaint for six years.

"Domestic violence kills your self-esteem, and I needed help," says Margarita (not her real name). "But there's not much of a tradition in Spain of protecting women or of punishing offenders."

In 2005, the country seemed ready to chart a different path when its newly elected Socialist government introduced sweeping domestic-violence legislation. Yet almost two years after the law went into effect, Spanish courts are flooded with spousal-abuse cases and the number of women killed by their partners has risen.

DOJ_NMG_0098026

Indeed, as officials from around Europe convene at a Madrid conference Monday to kick off a continentwide campaign against domestic violence, many in Spain have realized that legislation alone can't solve the problem.

"The law was a big step forward," says Eva Suarez, head of Amnesty International's domestic-violence project in Spain. "But a lot remains to be done before the rights that women have on paper become a reality."

Last Thursday, the number of women killed by their partners this year reached 61, surpassing 2005's total of 60. That number is lower than the 95 women killed so far this year in France, or the roughly two women killed each week in Britain. It also falls proportionately below rates in Denmark, Finland, and Sweden. But the problem is severe enough that Spain approved unusually comprehensive legislation to combat it.

The Law for Comprehensive Protection Against Domestic Violence, which went into effect in January 2005, stiffened penalties against abusers, provided greater social assistance to abused women, and created special courts and a government delegation dedicated to combating "gender violence." Unlike legislation in other European countries that treats prevention, punishment, and aid to victims as separate concerns, Spain's law does everything from appointing special prosecutors to providing victims with financial support to calling for less sexism in advertising.

That holistic approach was singled out in a report this year to the Council of Europe, the body organizing Monday's conference. In the latest of its efforts to secure the rights of women across the continent, the council is using the conference as a springboard for its "Campaign to Combat Violence against Women, including Domestic Violence." Through the campaign, which will run through March 2008, the council hopes to raise awareness, urge member states to deliver concrete results, and promote the implementation of effective measures for preventing and combating violence against women. Is the Spanish law one such measure? To be sure, it has had its successes.

"Before, there were no specific resources for domestic-violence victims. Now, there are," says Ana Herranz, a social worker who administers the Program for Abused Women under the direction of the Women's Institute in Madrid. "The fact that you can now denounce your abuser and get a restraining order, and that the man has to leave the house is an important change; it diminishes the degree to which women have to hide."

Better awareness of the problem has also dramatically augmented the numbers of women who report abuse; more than 100,000 have done so this year.

"We've seen a fourfold rise in the number of complaints filed by women in the past decade, yet just a small increase in the number of deaths," says Ángeles Álvarez, director of the domestic violence task force at Madrid's Women's Foundation. "So the situation has actually improved."

Nevertheless, there are clear failures. Thirty percent of the women killed this year had filed complaints against their partners. And the fact that Spain's death toll this year surpasses that of prelegislation years (50 victims in 2001; 54 in 2002), has many suggesting that the law has not been adequately enforced. Speaking at the Women's Foundation offices, which buzz with activity as staff members work phones at shared desks, Ms. Álvarez contends that the legal, social, and medical workers provided for by the law have not been adequately trained.

"We haven't seen real enforcement of the restraining orders," she adds. "And without enforcement, the orders are worthless." The jump in the number of legal complaints has also overwhelmed the 27 courts created to deal with domestic violence. "It's hard work taking care of this avalanche of abused women," says Ana Eisman, one of 260 court workers who earlier this month protested "intolerable" labor conditions.

"The government didn't foresee all the problems that would be involved in applying the new law, and we workers have been exploited," she says. "Our shifts are supposed to end at 3 p.m., but we usually have to stay until 7."

Yet this scarcity of resources may be less an obstacle than entrenched attitudes toward women. "We have to educate and reeducate an entire society," said Soledad Cazorla, prosecutor in Madrid's domestic-violence court, in an interview with El País newspaper. "We have to learn to believe in equality."

Ana María Pérez del Campo, president of the Foundation for Separated and Divorced Women, adds that Spaniards still resist taking domestic violence seriously. "Women here are denied credibility. For years, women have been denouncing domestic abuse, yet only 10 percent of their complaints are processed [in the courts]."

Margarita, who has lived free of her partner's abuse for three years, agrees that there is much to be done. "Domestic violence is a crime now," she says. "But that doesn't resolve the problem. The law is more talk than reality."

Ground Search For Minn. Boys Called Off (AP)

AP, November 27, 2006

RED LAKE, Minn. (AP) — Authorities called off a major ground search Sunday on the Red Lake Indian Reservation after they turned up no sign of two young brothers who have been missing since they went out to play Wednesday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0098027

But FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said authorities would continue pursing leads, and the effort to find 4-year-old Tristan White and 2-year-old Avery Stately was not over.

"We will not stop looking for Tristan and Avery until they are found," McCabe said.

McCabe said it's still unclear whether they wandered off or were taken. "We don't have any indication at this time that foul play is involved," he said.

Investigators had received around 70 phone tips, McCabe said, but none led to the boys so far.

The FBI last week offered a $20,000 reward for information that leads to the boys.

Falling temperatures had dimmed hopes that the boys could have survived in the woods. By Sunday, afternoon temperatures in the area were in the 20s, and there was a chilly wind out of the northwest.

McCabe acknowledged that the hundreds of searchers and volunteers were disappointed with the decision to call off the ground search.

"They've all been so focused and so dedicated to finding these two children that it's somewhat discouraging for them to have to leave," he said. "They really wanted to find these boys."

Officials Call End To Air, Land Search For Red Lake Boys (MINNST)

By Terry Collins

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 27, 2006

RED LAKE, MINN. - After five days of expansive searching, authorities called off the air and ground search Sunday for two young brothers who have been missing on this northern Minnesota reservation since Wednesday.

The investigation, however, will continue in the baffling disappearance of Tristan A. White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, last seen playing outside their home in the remote Walking Shield area.

"That's a promise," FBI special agent Paul McCabe said during a news briefing. "We won't stop until they are found."

Those sentiments were later echoed by Red Lake Chairman Floyd (Buck) Jourdain to dozens of people at a post-search gathering at the tribe's Humanities Center on Sunday evening.

Jourdain said that tribal officials are expected to meet today to "restrategize" their efforts, which will likely include searching on a much smaller scale.

"I can't say how much I've appreciated you taking the time from your families and your lives to help us try finding these two boys," Jourdain said. "Your efforts were not done in vain. ... It's not over."

The decision to halt the massive search, at times in freezing temperatures, came after scores of people -- including dive teams from three neighboring counties, unmanned aerial vehicles flying overhead and teams of search dogs that grew with each passing day -- came up empty.

"There is some disappointment that they couldn't help bring the kids home," McCabe said about the search parties. "But we feel confident that the search has been extensive and thorough."

McCabe said authorities will continue to investigate whether the boys wandered off or whether foul play was involved.

No evidence of foul play has been discovered, Jourdain said. He also said there has been no sign the boys were attacked by wild animals or fell into nearby small lakes. Other areas such as log piles were triple-checked, as were three bear dens discovered during the searches.

A hot line set up Friday has led to about 70 tips, double the total announced on Saturday, McCabe said Sunday. However, the tips have not led to any substantial leads.

Investigators will continue to pursue any possible leads, he added.

Meanwhile, several weary and befuddled volunteers attending the post-search gathering listened to what the next steps would be. They were assured repeatedly that the search to find Tristan and Avery won't stop.

"What will happen is what we call a limited continuance search," said Paul Burke, a consultant with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. If there is a significant piece of evidence or information, another large-scale search could commence, Burke said.

"If you hear or see something, tell the authorities so they can check it out," Burke urged them.

Burke also thanked them for the thousands of hours of going through woodsy areas, trying to find anything to provide clues to where the boys are.

"I gotta tell you, it's going to be hard for me to leave this place. The effort and energy put into this search for these two boys is deserving, and I know that the family appreciates it," Burke said. "Stick together."

Several Red Lake citizens could be seen comforting each other. Judy Roy, a former tribal secretary who lost to Jourdain in a hotly contested battle for chairman this summer, hugged her onetime opponent.

"Just call me if you need anything," Roy said to Jourdain, who nodded in appreciation.

DOJ_NMG_0098028

Others, such as Red Laker Pete Neadeau, who'd spent the past four days searching, told Jourdain he'd be ready to search again if needed.

"If that's what the community wants to do," Neadeau said. "I'll be there."

Unbearable Tragedy In Pomona (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 27, 2006

The senseless death of a child raises concerns about the priorities of federal crime policies.

WHO COULD BEAR to write an epitaph for Ethan Esparza? Ethan was celebrating at his 4th birthday party Nov. 19, playing with a new toy car in the frontyard of his Pomona home, when a gunman stepped out of an SUV and began spraying bullets into the crowd of children. After being shot, Ethan lived long enough to scramble to his mother's room and spend his last moments gasping for breath in her arms. There are no words strong enough to express her agony or the depths of a community's sympathy.

Police departments don't have any words for such tragedies either, but they do have numbers. Statistics compiled by the FBI show that violent crimes nationwide rose 2.3% in 2005, the first such increase since 2001. Homicides were up 3.4%, and a separate report issued in September by the Justice Department showed a marked increase in gun violence last year.

A one-year statistical bump doesn't necessarily signal a trend, and crime statistics are always problematic because they're based on reported incidents; a jump might simply mean more people are going to the police, not that more crime is occurring. Further, nationwide crime patterns are extremely uneven: Violence is down in New York but up in Boston. Locally, police are concerned about a rash of gang attacks in the San Fernando Valley, but violent crime in Los Angeles as a whole has been declining for years.

But the country's top cops don't think the statistics are an anomaly. At a conference in August, about 300 police chiefs complained to FBI officials that a shift in national priorities toward fighting domestic terrorism was compromising their ability to fight conventional crime. Federal funding for municipal police work has been cut nearly in half since 9/11, diverted instead to anti-terrorism programs. At the same time, the Bush administration and Congress have significantly loosened federal gun-control measures such as the now-expired assault weapons ban.

On Wednesday, the Justice Department chose 18 regions for a study on why homicides are on the rise, including San Bernardino County and San Diego. Police chiefs hope this will lead to an increase in funding, but that's not likely. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales has made it clear that they shouldn't expect much more help from the federal government.

It would be absurd to say that Ethan or the other victims of senseless violence died because of federal crime policies, but it's equally absurd to think one can make it easier for criminals to obtain deadly weapons without having an effect on the murder rate. Last year, there were nearly 17,000 homicides in the United States, five times the death toll from 9/11. It may be that our focus on Middle Eastern terrorists has distracted our attention away from a bigger, entirely homegrown threat.

Rape Is Rape (WP)

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

IS IT RAPE if a woman agrees to have sex, then changes her mind after the act has begun and tells the man to stop? Not in Maryland, no matter how clear it is that the woman has withdrawn her consent. According to a ruling last month by the Maryland Court of Special Appeals, the state's intermediate appellate court, forcing a woman to continue to have sex against her will is not rape under common law and state court precedents. If this is a correct interpretation of the law, the law should be changed.

Perhaps the facts of the case produced this repugnant result. An 18-year-old Montgomery College student gave a ride to Maouloud Baby, then 16, and his friend. The friend -- who later pleaded guilty to rape in the incident -- had sex with the young woman in the back seat of her car. Then Mr. Baby said it was his turn. "He was like, 'I don't want to rape you,' " the student testified. She said she felt as if she couldn't refuse and agreed to have intercourse "as long as he stops when I tell him to." They began to have sex, she pushed him away and told him to stop, and, she testified, after "about five or so seconds," he did. Mr. Baby was convicted of first-degree rape and sentenced to five years in prison.

This isn't the strongest set of facts for a rape conviction, and a new trial for Mr. Baby seems warranted. But what's troubling is that, in granting the new trial, the court found that once consent is given and penetration occurs, no set of facts, however egregious, could produce a rape conviction. The court said it was bound by a 1980 ruling in which the Court of Appeals found that "ordinarily if [the woman] consents prior to penetration and withdraws the consent following penetration, there is no rape" -- though that case involved the opposite situation, where the woman refused to agree to have sex but gave consent afterward.

Its conclusion, the court said, was further required by the common law understanding of rape, under which the crime is viewed as an infringement on the property rights of the woman's husband or father. The common law, the court said, "views the initial 'de-flowering' of a woman as the real harm or insult . . . after this initial infringement upon [her husband or father's] interest in a woman's sexual and reproductive functions, any further injury was considered to be less consequential. The damage was done."

DOJ_NMG_0098029

The real damage is done by this ruling, which promotes an offensively archaic view of women and is out of line with other states that have considered the question. Only one state court (North Carolina) has agreed with Maryland, seven state courts have found to the contrary, and Illinois has passed a statute making clear that consent can be withdrawn. The Court of Appeals or the legislature should overturn this decision.

CIVIL LAW:

Spitzer Battles Wachovia's Dream Team In State-Power Court Case (BLOOM)

By Alison Vekshin And Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, November 27, 2006

Nov. 27 (Bloomberg) -- A lineup of legal heavyweights unusual even by Supreme Court standards is doing battle in a case pitting Wachovia Corp. against Michigan banking regulators.

Wachovia's side includes Walter Dellinger, Seth Waxman and Theodore Olson, all of whom served as solicitor general of the United States -- the government's top courtroom lawyer. Backing Michigan in its arguments to the court Nov. 29 are the other 49 states, led by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, the state's governor-elect.

At stake is what Dellinger, 65, calls ``the single most important legal doctrine" for many U.S. industries: how free states are to impose stricter regulations than those set by the federal government. If Michigan and Spitzer prevail, says Dellinger, who served under President Bill Clinton, ``we're in danger of switching roles, where Europe has the great common market and we have the Balkanized economy."

The high court is being asked to decide whether federal oversight of Wachovia and other national banks extends to their state-chartered subsidiaries, immunizing them from state regulation of their mortgage businesses.

A decision favoring Michigan may lead some national banks to close their subsidiaries and move the services they perform into the bank, restricting the availability of credit and increasing its cost, banking industry officials say.

Drugs and Autos

The dispute also has implications beyond the banking industry, testing federal regulators' power to block more aggressive state oversight. A broad court ruling might affect the regulation of prescription drugs, autos and other consumer products -- all fields governed by federal agencies that have sought to curtail suits by individuals under state laws.

``It has potentially broad ramifications for the ability of state attorneys general to enforce consumer-protection laws," says Stephen D. Houck, executive director of the Center for State Enforcement of Antitrust and Consumer Protection Laws in New York.

Like Dellinger, Waxman, 54, served under Clinton, while Olson served under President George W. Bush and was part of the team that helped secure his legal victory following the disputed 2000 presidential election. All three were retained by groups backing Charlotte, North Carolina-based Wachovia, the nation's fourth-largest bank by assets.

Backed by Bush

Also lining up behind Wachovia is the Bush administration, which is urging the high court to give federal agencies wide latitude to override their state counterparts.

In recent years, the Food and Drug Administration, National Highway Transportation Safety Administration and Consumer Product Safety Commission all have sought to use their regulatory power to limit suits by consumers. Earlier this year, the FDA put a preamble on a product-labeling rule that would give the agency final say on what warnings drugmakers must provide to patients.

Those efforts would get a boost if Wachovia wins a ruling that expands the authority of federal agencies, says Thomas W. Merrill, an administrative law professor at Columbia University in New York.

``This has become an issue of pretty considerable significance," Merrill says. ``There's been a lot of effort by federal agencies to make noise about pre-emption" as an indirect way of limiting injury lawsuits.

Stemming States' Efforts

A Wachovia victory potentially would stem the aggressiveness that has become a hallmark of Spitzer, 47, and other state attorneys general. In the past decade, state officials took the lead in pressing high-profile cases against the tobacco and securities industries and played a role in the government antitrust battle against Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0098030

State officials say they are alarmed by the prospect that the high court might let an administrative agency, the U.S. Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, or OCC, displace traditional state regulatory powers without explicit authorization from Congress.

``We are contending Wachovia Bank and Wachovia Mortgage are very distinct corporate entities," says Ari Faneuil, a spokesman for Michigan Attorney General Mike Cox. ``Congress has not given the OCC the authority to preempt state corporations."

Wachovia says its subsidiary, Wachovia Mortgage Corp., should be supervised by the OCC, the Treasury Department agency that oversees national banks.

`Inconsistent and Conflicting'

Wachovia argues that the National Bank Act and OCC regulations pre-empt state law governing operating subsidiaries in the same way as for national banks.

``From a practical standpoint, a decision for the states would result in a very difficult, inconsistent and conflicting regulatory environment for national bank operating subsidiaries," says Van Beck, senior vice president and attorney at Wachovia.

Michigan laws require a mortgage lender to register with the state, pay annual fees, submit financial statements and keep records for examination purposes.

``States very understandably desire to have jurisdiction over transactions within their borders and protect their citizens," says Peter Heyward, a partner in the financial services group at the Venable LLP law firm in Washington. ``National banks want to operate nationwide through their subsidiaries without having to deal with a patchwork of state laws."

Predatory Lending

Consumer advocates argue that states are better equipped to protect their consumers against predatory lending and other potential abuses because they are more familiar with and accountable to their constituencies.

``States should be allowed to play a role in protecting consumers against abuses by operating subsidiaries," says Amy Quester, a lawyer in the Washington office of the Center for Responsible Lending, a consumer-rights group. ``The OCC's focus is safety and soundness, but not protecting consumers."

The case began in 2003 when Wachovia Mortgage became an operating subsidiary of Wachovia Bank. After the mortgage lender said it would comply only with federal regulations, state officials banned it from operating in Michigan, prompting Wachovia to sue.

Precedent

Two federal appeals courts have ruled that the Wachovia subsidiary isn't subject to state banking regulation, and the Supreme Court in past years has tended to rule in favor of national banks and the comptroller of the currency.

``The comptroller has a very strong record in the Supreme Court," says Jonathan Macey, a Yale Law School professor specializing in corporate law and finance. ``When there are cases like this challenging the comptroller's power, the comptroller has tended to win."

At the same time, since Supreme Court intervention wasn't necessary to clear up lower-court disagreement, some attorneys suggest the justices might have taken up the matter in order to reinvigorate the regulatory rights of states.

``One possibility is that the Supreme Court is going to radically change pre-emption law and is going to reverse the lower courts' decisions," says Brian Brooks, a partner in the financial services group at Los Angeles-based O'Melveny & Myers LLP. ``The effect of that would reverse 200 years of banking law."

When Don't Smoke Means Do (NYT)

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

Philip Morris has adopted the role of good citizen these days. Its Web site brims with information on the dangers of smoking, and it has mounted a campaign of television spots that urge parents, oh so earnestly, to warn their children against smoking. That follows an earlier $100 million campaign warning young people to "Think. Don't Smoke," analogous to the "just say no" admonitions against drugs.

All this seems to fly against the economic interests of the company, which presumably depends on a continuing crop of new smokers to replace those who drop out or die from their habit. But in practice, it turns out, these industry-run campaigns are notably ineffective and possibly even a sham. New research shows that the ads aimed at youths had no discernible effect in discouraging smoking and that the ads currently aimed at parents may be counterproductive.

That disturbing insight comes from a study just published in The American Journal of Public Health by respected academic researchers who were supported by the National Cancer Institute, the National Institute on Drug Abuse and the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation. Using sophisticated analytical techniques, the researchers concluded that the ads aimed directly at young people had no beneficial effect, while those aimed at parents were actually harmful to young people apt to see them, especially older teenagers. The greater the teenagers' potential exposure to the ads, the stronger their intention to smoke and the greater their likelihood of having smoked in the past 30 days.

DOJ_NMG_0098031

Just why the costly advertising campaigns produce no health benefits is a rich subject for exploration. The ads are fuzzy-warm, which could actually generate favorable feelings for the tobacco industry and, by extension, its products. And their theme — that adults should tell young people not to smoke mostly because they are young people — is exactly the sort of message that would make many teenagers feel like lighting up. (Trial testimony has made it clear that the goal of Philip Morris's youth smoking prevention programs is to delay smoking until adulthood, not to discourage it for a lifetime.)

The most exhaustive judicial analysis of the industry's tactics, by Judge Gladys Kessler of the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, concluded that the youth smoking prevention programs were not really designed to effectively prevent youth smoking but rather to head off a government crackdown. They are minimally financed compared with the vast sums spent on cigarette marketing and promotion; they are understaffed and run by people with no expertise; and they ignore the strategies that have proved effective in preventing adolescent smoking. The television ads, for example, do not stress the deadly and addictive impacts of smoking, an emphasis that has been shown to work in other antitobacco campaigns.

Philip Morris says it has spent more than $1 billion on its youth smoking prevention programs since 1998 and that it devised its current advertising campaign on the advice of experts who deem parental influence extremely important. But the company has done only the skimpiest research on how the campaign is working. It cites June 2006 data indicating that 37 percent of parents with children age 10 to 17 were both aware of its ads and spoke to their children about not smoking. How the children reacted has not been explored. And somehow the company forgot to tell the parents, as role models, to stop smoking themselves.

Philip Morris, the industry's biggest and most influential company, is renowned for its marketing savvy. If it really wanted to prevent youth smoking — and cut off new recruits to its death-dealing products — it could surely mount a more effective campaign to do so.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

50 Shots Fired, And The Experts Offer A Theory (NYT)

By Michael Wilson

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

It is known in police parlance as "contagious shooting" — gunfire that spreads among officers who believe that they, or their colleagues, are facing a threat. It spreads like germs, like laughter, or fear. An officer fires, so his colleagues do, too.

The phenomenon appears to have happened last year, when eight officers fired 43 shots at an armed man in Queens, killing him. In July, three officers fired 26 shots at a pit bull that had bitten a chunk out of an officer's leg in a Bronx apartment building. And there have been other episodes: in 1995, in the Bronx, officers fired 125 bullets during a bodega robbery, with one officer firing 45 rounds.

Just what happened on Saturday is still being investigated. Police experts, however, suggested in interviews yesterday that contagious shooting played a role in a fatal police shooting in Queens Saturday morning. According to the police account, five officers fired 50 shots at a bridegroom who, leaving his bachelor party at a strip club, twice drove his car into a minivan carrying plainclothes police officers investigating the club.

The bridegroom, Sean Bell, who was to be married hours later, was killed, and two of his friends were wounded, one critically.

To the layman, and to the loved ones of those who were shot, 50 shots seems a startlingly high number, especially since the men were found to be unarmed. And police experts concede that the number was high. Yet they also note that in those chaotic and frightening fractions of a second between quiet and gunfire, nothing is clear-cut, and blood is pumping furiously. Even 50 shots can be squeezed off in a matter of seconds.

"We can teach as much as we can," said John C. Cerar, a retired commander of the Police Department's firearms training section. "The fog of the moment happens. Different things happen that people don't understand. Most people really believe what it's like in television, that a police officer can take a gun and shoot someone out of the saddle."

The five officers involved in the shooting were placed on administrative duty yesterday — without their guns — as the Police Department and the Queens district attorney investigated the circumstances surrounding the shooting, and relatives of Mr. Bell, joined by the Rev. Al Sharpton, staged a rally and a march to demand answers.

The officers have not yet been interviewed by police investigators or prosecutors to give their account.

Again and again, the focus of the day returned to the number of bullets that went flying.

DOJ_NMG_0098032

One of the officers fired more than half the rounds, pausing to reload, and then emptying it again, 31 shots in all, according to the police. Another officer fired 11 shots. The others fired four shots, three shots and one shot apiece, the police said.

But it is the total number of shots that shook and angered the families of the men and community leaders. "How many shots?" Mr. Sharpton asked yesterday, over and over, in a chant at a rally in a park near Mary Immaculate Hospital, where the wounded men were being treated. The crowd called back, "Fifty!"

Statistically, the shooting is an aberration. The number of shots fired per officer who acted in the 112 shooting incidents this year, through Nov. 19, is 3.2, said Paul J. Browne, a department spokesman. Last year, that number was 3.7 shots fired per officer in 109 incidents. They are down from 4.6 in 2000 and 5.0 in 1995.

But shootings with high numbers of shots fired, however rare, call to mind dark events of the city's past, like the 1999 killing of Gidone Busch, who was clutching a hammer when officers fired 12 times, and, most notably, the shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed West African immigrant who died in a hail of 41 bullets, also in 1999.

In the 1995 Bronx bodega robbery in which officers fired 125 shots, the suspects did not fire back. "They were shooting to the echo of their own gunfire," a former police official said at the time.

The shooting on Saturday unfolded in a flash. An undercover officer posted inside the Club Kalua, a site of frequent drug, weapon and prostitution complaints in Jamaica, overheard an exchange between a stripper and a man that led the officer to suspect the man was armed, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said on Saturday. The undercover officer alerted the officers acting as backup outside — there were seven officers in all — about 4 a.m., setting into motion the events to follow later.

Eight men left the club and argued briefly with another man, with one from the group saying, "Yo, get my gun," Mr. Kelly said.

The eight men apparently split into two groups of four, with one group piling into a Nissan Altima driven by Mr. Bell, Commissioner Kelly said. As an undercover detective who had been following the group on foot approached the vehicle, Mr. Bell drove into him, striking his leg, before plowing into a minivan carrying two backup officers, the commissioner said.

The Altima reversed, mounting a sidewalk and hitting the lowered gate of a building before going forward and striking the van again. The officers opened fire, striking Mr. Bell, 23, twice, in the right arm and neck, Commissioner Kelly said. The critically wounded man, Joseph Guzman, 31, was struck 11 times, and the third man, Trent Benefield, 23, three times. Mr. Kelly said it was unclear whether there was a fourth man in the car and what became of him.

A person familiar with the case who knows the detectives' version of events said yesterday that it was Mr. Guzman who asked for his gun, and that the first undercover detective on foot clearly identified himself to the occupants of the car and, gun drawn, told them to get out. Instead, the person said, they roared toward him. That detective fired the first shot.

In the ensuing barrage, one shot struck the window of a house, another a window at an AirTrain platform, injuring two Port Authority police officers with flying glass. It appeared that the Altima was struck by 21 shots, fewer than half of the number fired, the police said.

The whole thing most likely took less than a minute. The officer who fired 31 times could have done so in fewer than 20 seconds, with the act of reloading taking less than one second, Mr. Cerar said. The 49 shots that followed the undercover detective's first may have been contagious shooting, said one former police official who insisted on anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

"He shoots, and you shoot, and the assumption is he has a good reason for shooting. You saw it in Diallo. You see it in a lot of shootings," the official said. "You just chime in. I don't mean the term loosely. But you see your partner, and your reflexes take over."

The phenomenon of officers' firing dozens of shots at a time dates back in part to 1993 and the department's switch from six-shot .38-caliber revolvers, cumbersome to reload, to semiautomatic pistols that hold 15 rounds in the magazine and one in the chamber. The change, like any of its magnitude, followed years of studies and differences of opinion, and finally came into effect after the 1986 murder of a police officer, Scott Gadell, who was reloading his six-shooter when he was fatally shot.

Commissioner Kelly, during his first term in the office, in 1992 and 1993, ordered a switch to semiautomatics, but ordered the clips modified to hold only 10 rounds. That modification was later undone, prompting him, after Mr. Diallo's shooting six years later, to speculate in a New York Times op-ed article, "Now may be the time to re-impose it and to intensify training that teaches police officers to hold their fire until they know why they are shooting."

Eugene O'Donnell, a professor of police studies at John Jay College, said a high number of shots fired underscores the threat the officers felt.

"The only reason to be shooting in New York City is that you or someone else is going to be killed and it's going to be imminent," he said. "It's highly unlikely you fire a shot or two shots. You fire as many shots as you have to, to extinguish the threat. You don't fire one round and say: 'Did I hit him? Is he hit?' "

DOJ_NMG_0098033

Mr. Cerar said, “Until we have some substitute for a firearm, there will always be a situation where more rounds are fired than in other situations.”

N.Y. Police Assailed For Bachelor Party Shootings (WP/AP)

By Deepti Hajela

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 26 -- An angry crowd demanded Sunday to know why police officers killed an unarmed man on the day of his wedding, firing dozens of shots that also wounded two of the man's friends. Some called for the ouster of the city's police commissioner.

At a vigil and rally the day after 23-year-old Sean Bell was supposed to have married the mother of his two young children, a crowd of a few hundred counted off to 50, the number of rounds fired by the five officers.

At the gathering outside Mary Immaculate Hospital, where one of the wounded men was in critical condition, some in the crowd yelled, "Kelly must go," a reference to Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly.

The police officers' group 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care said it was issuing a vote of no confidence in Kelly over the shooting.

Paul Browne, chief spokesman for the New York Police Department, said Sunday, "We are continuing to look for additional witnesses to shed light on the incident, and assisting the district attorney's office with its investigation."

The five officers were placed on paid administrative leave pending the investigation, Browne said.

The shootings occurred at about 4 a.m. Saturday outside Kalua Cabaret, a strip club where Bell's bachelor party was held. The survivors were Joseph Guzman, 31, who was shot at least 11 times, and Trent Benefield, 23, who was hit three times. Guzman was in critical condition Sunday and Benefield was stable.

The car, driven by Bell, was struck by 21 police bullets after the vehicle rammed an undercover officer and hit an unmarked NYPD minivan. It was unclear what prompted police to open fire or whether the shooters had identified themselves as police, Kelly said.

According to Kelly, the groom was involved in a verbal dispute outside the club and one of his friends made a reference to a gun.

An officer dressed in plain clothes and working an undercover operation inside the strip club walked closely behind Bell and his friends as they headed for their car. As the officer walked toward the front of the vehicle, the car drove forward -- striking him and a nearby undercover police vehicle, Kelly said.

That officer, who had served on the force for five years, was apparently the first to open fire, Kelly said. One 12-year veteran fired his weapon 31 times, emptying two full magazines, the commissioner said.

Bell backed the car onto a sidewalk, hitting a building gate, authorities said. He then drove forward, striking the police vehicle a second time, Kelly said.

The New York Police Department's policy on shooting at moving vehicles states, "Police officers shall not discharge their firearms at or from a moving vehicle unless deadly force is being used against the police officers or another person present, by means other than a moving vehicle."

Chief Vows To Review Shooting (AJC)

By Saeed Ahmed, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 27, 2006

Five days after an elderly woman was killed in a gunbattle that left three officers wounded, Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington said Sunday night his department will review its policy on "no knock" warrants and its use of confidential informants.

Speaking for the first time since the Tuesday night shooting death of Kathryn Johnston at her home in northwest Atlanta, Pennington said his office "will turn over every stone to make sure we get to the reason why this tragic incident happened."

Pennington provided little new information on what led to the confrontation at 933 Neal St. when narcotics officers seeking to serve a warrant broke down the front door and exchanged gunfire with Johnston.

Earlier that day, a man named "Sam" had sold drugs from inside the house to an informant, police said, prompting officers to seek a "no-knock" warrant. Such warrants are frequently issued so police can get inside a home before suspects can destroy or flush drugs.

Johnston — described by neighbors and family as a frightened woman who had burglar bars on her windows and door and rarely let friends and neighbors into her home — had lived at the one-story brick home near the Georgia Dome for 17 years.

The police chief said officers found marijuana inside the house but "not a large quantity." Previously, police only said drugs were seized at Johnston's home.

DOJ_NMG_0098034

Pennington was out of town last week for the Thanksgiving holiday and said he was unable to get a flight back to Atlanta earlier. He said he had not talked to the officers involved in the shooting, but he had been briefed by his commanders.

The chief said he did not know the contents of the sworn statement that police provided to a judge to obtain the warrant. "I will have it [Monday]," he said.

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation, at the request of the Fulton County District Attorney's Office, is looking into the incident, including examining the home to determine how many gunshots were fired in the confrontation. GBI spokesman John Bankhead said it will take several more weeks before results are available.

Pennington spoke with reporters at Lindsay Street Baptist Church after a meeting with civil rights activist the Rev. Markell Hutchins.

Hutchins leaves for Washington this morning to deliver a letter to the U.S. Justice Department calling for a federal investigation into "what we believe are at worst, gross violations of this woman's life, and at best, poor judgment on the part of the police officers."

Pennington said he welcomes any investigation into the shooting.

Sunday night, Hutchins said he was satisfied with what Pennington shared, citing a law enforcement agency's "right to protect the integrity of its investigation."

"I did not ask him any confidential questions that I should not be privy to," he said. "I appreciated that he came down to reassure us that he will do everything that needs to be done to look into this."

Johnston's family could not be reached for comment. Hutchins, who is acting as their spokesman, said he had not had a chance to speak with them after he met with Pennington.

Also Sunday, the Fulton County Medical Examiner's Office corrected reports on Johnston's age. The family had said that Johnston was 92, but the medical examiner's office said records show she was 88.

Police described their suspect as a 6-foot-tall man weighing 250 to 260 pounds. Johnston's niece, Sarah Dozier, has said her aunt lived alone.

The officers were not wearing uniforms but had on bulletproof vests with "Police" emblazoned across the front and back. And they identified themselves as they burst through the doors, police said.

Johnston grabbed a rusty six-shot revolver and emptied it. Five shots struck the officers, hitting one of them three times. The other two were each hit once. The officers returned fire, shooting Johnston twice in the chest and elsewhere, police have said.

The three officers were released from the hospital the next day. They are on leave with pay.

Funeral plans for Johnston have not been made.

Staff writer Jeffry Scott contributed to this article.

When Public Schools Aren't Color-Blind (TIME)

By Julie Rawe

Time, November 27, 2006

Stephanie Brown admits thatÂ moving from a small Kentucky town into sprawling Louisville made her a "very paranoid" mother-- so much so that she won't let her kids play in the front yard unless she's with them. But she willingly puts Joe, 8, and Julianna, 6, on a bus every day for the 75-min. ride to a school in a rundown, mostly black neighborhood. The bus picks her kids up in their mostly white suburb at 7:30 a.m. and doesn't bring them back until 5 p.m. "It was a very hard thing to put my baby girl on a bus and let her go out into the world with people I don't know," says Brown, who is white.

Some 58,000 children crisscross Jefferson County on school buses in much the same manner, with 1 out of 7 of these kids traveling an hour or more each way. What's more, most of their parents--Brown included --are happy with the system. So much to-ing and fro-ing is a result of the school district's generally popular racial guidelines, which aim to keep the percentage of African Americans in any one school from falling below 15% or rising above 50%. The district as a whole is about one-third black.

Parents aren't simply bystanders in this numbers game. They can apply for the schools they want their child to attend--many have magnet programs that make it worth going that extra mile--and 92% of families wind up with their first or second choice. Even if some don't get what they ask for, race is never the sole factor in how assignments are made. "We look at choices first, we look at siblings, we look at capacity," says Pat Todd, the district's student-assignment director. "Race is way down the list."

The system, which has been in place for a decade, has made Jefferson County one of the most integrated school districts in the country. But if Crystal Meredith, a single mom who was told her son could not transfer to another elementary school because he is white, has her way, the whole thing will be dismantled. And plenty of critics agree that it should be. Meredith and others contend that the guidelines amount to an unconstitutional quota system. So Jefferson County finds itself in an ironic position. After years of court-ordered desegregation, the school district will appear before the U.S. Supreme Court next Monday, arguing that it should be allowed to use the same system voluntarily.

DOJ_NMG_0098035

Jefferson County is one of two cases that will help the Supreme Court decide how--or if--race can be used to deploy kids across a school district. The court next week will also consider whether Seattle can continue to use a student's race as one of several tiebreakers when too many kids seek admission to the same high school. Taken together, these cases could represent, as Georgetown law professor James Forman puts it, "the last gasp of the integration movement."

The Jefferson County dispute has in some ways been brewing for more than a half century, ever since the Supreme Court in its 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision outlawed school segregation. The busing battles that followed this landmark ruling were the stuff of civil rights lore. But in 1991 the court ruled that school districts could abandon that unpopular strategy and return to neighborhood schooling, even if that meant some schools would resegregate. That's what happened in many districts, and the proportion of black students attending nonwhite-majority schools has increased over the past dozen years from 66% to 73%. In some parts of the country, Latino segregation is even higher, according to Harvard University's Civil Rights Project. Many school districts have given up trying to break up racial concentrations and instead are working to deal with the achievement gaps that accompany largely segregated schools-- a de facto return to the separate-but-equal idea that Brown v. Board of Ed. sought to abolish.

Jefferson County has worked hard to avoid this first by racially gerrymandering school- attendance zones in the 1980s and then by instituting its 15/50 "managed choice" program in the '90s. This system has maintained not only integrated schools but also community peace. Despite all the long bus trips--the average ride for Jefferson County students is about 45 min.--77% of Jefferson County parents agreed that guidelines should be used to ensure diversity, according to a survey conducted in 2000 by the University of Kentucky. The district also assiduously tracks the percentage of the county's school-age children who attend public school, and in recent years, when private schools were gaining students nationwide, Jefferson County's public schools were inching up in "market share," from 76% in 2001 to 80% last year.

To keep things moving in that direction, the school district emphasizes customer service. In many neighborhoods, the buses stop every fifth of a mile. "Legally, we only have to put a stop every two miles, but we wouldn't be very popular if we did," says Mike Mulheirn, who oversees the school district's transportation system. "The seats," he notes, "are well padded."

All of this is paying off where elected officials feel it most--at the ballot box. School-board members who are pro-guidelines keep getting re-elected. Two years ago, when Meredith's lawyer, Teddy Gordon, ran for the school board, promising a return to neighborhood schools, he came in--as guideline advocates like to point out-- dead last. "I don't care if my children go to school on the moon as long as they are getting a good education," says Ronald Thomas, who lives downtown and sends his three children to school on a half-hour bus ride via the Interstate.

But critics offer a lot of complaints about the system, not the least being that some just find it galling. Why should schools that are more black than white be inherently suspect, even if they don't reflect the racial breakdown of the district as a whole? "It doesn't make sense," local PTA-board member Dreema Jackson says of the guidelines. "It's O.K. for the minority to be between 15% and 50%, but if you flip those percentages, a school is no longer diverse?"

Worse, by stressing racial balancing, critics say, you take the focus off improving educational outcome. Thirty years of seating black students next to white ones has failed to close Jefferson County's achievement gap. Black high school students still trail their white counterparts by 25% in reading-proficiency tests and by 34% in math. The gap is closely linked to factors like parents' education level and income, which no amount of school balancing is likely to fix. "We have the most integrated school system in the country," says Carmen Weathers, a retired Jefferson County schoolteacher. "That sounds good on a business brochure, but it has nothing to do with education."

Weathers, who is black, favors a return to schools that are all or mostly black because he thinks the teachers would be more attuned to the particular needs and learning styles of some black students. But where are those teachers supposed to come from? Raoul Cunningham, who heads the local chapter of the N.A.A.C.P., points out that it is harder to recruit experienced teachers to work in largely minority schools. Critics "blame all the ills of the current system on desegregation," he says. "Desegregation did not cause the achievement gap."

One challenge facing the Jefferson County school district is to convince the Supreme Court that racial integration not only does no harm but offers concrete benefits that would be lost without the guidelines. To help make this case, 553 social scientists--including professors at Harvard, the University of Hawaii and myriad institutions in between--have submitted a friend- of-the-court brief detailing how racial integration in schools reduces prejudice and prepares students to enter a diverse workforce. More support will come from a study to be released this week showing that blacks and Latinos perform better academically in integrated schools. Based on an analysis of No Child Left Behind data conducted by Doug Harris, an assistant professor at Florida State University, the study reveals that test scores of minority students in high-minority schools fall about 4 percentile points a year behind those of minority students in lower-minority schools.

DOJ_NMG_0098036

Meredith's lawsuit seeks an end to the guidelines (and $25,000 in damages for her son, who was eventually admitted to the school that originally rejected him and is now a fourth-grader there). While dozens of civic organizations, the Louisville Chamber of Commerce and five former Secretaries of Education have sided with the school district, the Bush Administration has taken up Meredith's cause. The Solicitor General submitted a brief arguing that schools should not be in the business of racial balancing and that even Brown v. Board Ed. declared that public schools should ultimately admit students "on a nonracial basis."

The district fears that if the guidelines are overturned, the schools will quickly return to sorting themselves by race. PTA-board member Mary Myers is so concerned that she is organizing a bus trip to Washington so Louisville parents can protest outside the Supreme Court next week. "What in the world are we trying to go backward for?" she asks. In a sign of what might be coming, a judge in 2000 forced Jefferson County to stop applying the district's guidelines at an inner-city magnet school because the career academy offers unique programs--like legal services and veterinary science--that students can't get anywhere else. Since then, Central High, a historically black school, has seen its white population shrink from 51% to 18%. And this shift could mark the beginning of a vicious cycle. "The greater the racial isolation," says district administrator Pat Todd, "the more difficult it is to recruit children of different races."

Whatever the merits of Meredith's case, even her supporters can admit she is hardly the ideal plaintiff. She didn't attempt to sign her son up for kindergarten until August, despite numerous radio and TV announcements and signs posted in day-care centers and Laundromats reminding parents to apply for their choice of school by March. By the time Meredith (who declined to be interviewed for this article) did apply, most of the seats had been allocated. Cheryl Wirth, a waitress at Waffle House whose son attends a magnet school, thinks this alone ought to be enough to dispose of the case. "It's like life," she says. "You gotta stay on top of things." Myers, like many mystified locals, can't believe the suit has even gone this far. "In the end, [Meredith's] son is where she wants him to be," she says. "Would you dismantle a whole system over that?" With reporting by With reporting by Deirdre van Dyk / New York

ANTITRUST:

Airline Merger May Not Take Off (HC)

By David Ivanovich, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, November 27, 2006

US Airways bid for Delta must clear regulators

WASHINGTON — A consolidation craze has taken off in the airline industry. But federal antitrust-busters may not be so keen to get on board.

With the nation's planes packed full and air fares flying high, US Airways Group's hostile bid to take over financially troubled Delta Air Lines could face a cool reception at the U.S. Justice Department.

"It's going to be a difficult deal to get through," warned Mark Schechter, a Washington antitrust lawyer and the former head of the Justice Department's Transportation, Energy and Agriculture Section. "If they do get it through, it's going to make the next deal even more difficult."

Wall Street is more optimistic the deal will fly. If so, many investors anticipate another proposal will arrive in short order.

"You may see some defensive plays ... as other carriers start looking down the road at who they could pair up with to protect their own market share," said Washington aviation attorney Josh Romanow.

Other airlines have certainly taken notice.

Larry Kellner, Continental Airlines' chief executive officer, already has said the Houston-based carrier might have to act if the airline industry changes.

And a Continental deal with, say, United Airlines, might prove less problematic with regulators than a US Airways-Delta union, JPMorgan analysts say.

Earlier merger blockedWhen evaluating a merger, regulators try to ensure consumers aren't harmed by allowing air service in particular markets to be concentrated in so few hands the remaining carriers have the power to raise ticket prices dramatically.

But they must balance that aim with the need to help stabilize the U.S. airline industry in the post-9/11 world.

Knowing business travelers don't like layovers, regulators will pay particular attention to nonstop service between cities. A carrier offering the only nonstop flights between a pair of cities can afford to hike fares significantly.

Five years ago, for instance, the Justice Department moved to block United's proposed takeover of the old US Airways.

That deal made regulators uncomfortable because United and US Airways were the only carriers offering nonstop service from Washington to a number of cities. Those two also offered the only nonstop service from hub cities such as Philadelphia to Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0098037

But when America West declared its affection for US Airways, Justice officials gave that merger its blessing.

That's because the two carriers' route systems had little overlap. America West's operations were concentrated in the West, with hubs in Phoenix and Las Vegas, while US Airways focused on the East, with hubs in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Charlotte, N.C.

In a speech to regional air carriers last year, J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's antitrust division, called that merger, which created what is now US Airways, "an example of the kinds of mergers that may easily avoid antitrust problems."

US Airways and Delta's networks overlap significantly more — about 18 percent for service among the top 500 city pairs, a JPMorgan analyst team noted in a recent report. That deal would also reduce competition to a potentially unacceptable degree in about 11 city pairs, the JPMorgan analysts noted.

A combination of Continental's and United's route systems, in contrast, would overlap about 16 percent but would spark competitive concerns in only four cities — New York, San Francisco, Seattle and Kansas City, the report said.

Factors in favorUS Airways has said it thinks any antitrust concerns can be resolved.

In the last quarter of a century, US Airways officials say, no merger in which the purchaser had such a small share of the overall market — about 8 percent — has been challenged. And, they point out, of the 11 markets with overlapping nonstop routes, seven have competing service from nearby airports.

Delta's financial difficulties could also play a role. Regulators would prefer to allow a takeover reducing competition to go through than watch an airline be liquidated. That's why Justice officials cleared American Airlines' pickup of TWA.

Delta is operating under Chapter 11 bankruptcy court protection, but the carrier has said it plans to emerge from bankruptcy next year as a "strong, stand-alone carrier."

Despite US Airways and Delta's route overlap, the JPMorgan analysts peg the chance of obtaining approvals from both creditors and regulators at 80 percent.

But with seats more than 80 percent full and the airlines having been successful in raising fares repeatedly this year, Mike Boyd of The Boyd Group, a Colorado-based aviation consulting firm, doesn't believe regulators will be in any mood to open the door to a new merger wave.

"I think it'll get stopped here," Boyd said.

Facing new CongressIf Delta agrees to a takeover, US Airways will also have to face a new, Democratically controlled Congress. Lawmakers on Capitol Hill — virtually all of whom are frequent fliers — don't hesitate to express their displeasure about airline deals they fear could hurt their constituents.

Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who will soon chair the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee in the new Congress, hasn't taken a position on the proposal.

But he'll be asking "what is the impact on fares," noted Oberstar spokesman Jim Berard. "What is the impact on service, and what is the impact on competition? If you have US Airways and Delta merge and fewer seats serving the market, that normally drives up the prices."

"No airline merger will ever go under the radar screen," Schechter said.

What's So Great About Private Equity (WSJ)

By Donald J. Gogel

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

What's so good about private equity? A lot. That's why private equity has emerged as a large, successful and growing asset class that attracted more than $300 billion in new investor commitments this year and that is responsible for more than 20% of total merger and acquisition activity in the U.S. and Europe in 2006. Put another way, as a chief executive once chided me, "Why can't a public company management team do every damn thing that you guys do when the company is private?"

Unfortunately, there are many reasons that public companies can't "just do it." Many public CEOs tell me that they feel like Gulliver bound by a thousand ropes: It is extremely difficult for public company CEOs and their management teams to focus and execute long-term strategies that require fundamental changes in business practices at the same time as they are responding to the cacophony of their many, multiple constituencies. In an economic environment riddled with land mines, then, private equity has several compelling structural advantages.

Better governance. This is a bold statement, but I believe private-equity firms today have a better governance model than public corporations. The "agency problem" fades away because the owners are a team of focused professionals who directly control (but do not manage) the business. Private-equity firms recruit industry and functional experts as directors who want tangible engagement with the business rather than a social forum; start off with a well-defined set of objectives to change business performance; insist on tight reporting requirements; and run board meetings that are issue-oriented, not show-and-tell.

DOJ_NMG_0098038

A more stable shareholder base. The largely institutional investors that comprise most of the private-equity limited partner base define themselves as long-term investors. State and corporate pension funds and endowments for universities and charitable foundations have very long-term missions -- think 50 years or more -- and look to private equity to provide returns that are superior to the public markets. At least for these investors, who can select private-equity firms that routinely deliver top quartile performance, returns have not disappointed. Although recent internal rates of return have been exceptionally high due to faster-than-usual realizations, the long-term top performers in private equity have been able to outperform the major indices by well over 500 basis points. Accordingly, many sophisticated institutions have increased their allocations to "alternatives" to 15% to 20% and have reduced their traditional allocations to public equities and bonds by the same amount or more. Compound that out-performance over many years and the results are startling.

Opportunity to upgrade management talent. Private-equity firms recognize that people make all the difference and so have a relentless focus on drafting the very best talent. Private-equity firms today are a magnet for talent, and they typically seek to add several new managers in "skill positions" that really matter. Depending on the company, that could mean one or more new executives to head sales or marketing, finance or, sometimes, the entire business. I speak with two or three great managers a week, each seeking a position in a private equity-sponsored company. They are uniformly competitive, winning executives who are anxious to get back to what they love to do -- build businesses. Today more than ever, it is easy for private-equity firms to attract world-class managers, offering both management freedom and innovative, stock-based compensation plans. More job satisfaction and more money are hard to beat.

Resetting Expectations. A change in ownership offers a great opportunity to reconsider assumptions about how a company gains and sustains its competitive advantage. A fresh look at the business, unencumbered by legacy strategies and investments, is usually the starting point for good private-equity investors, and often leads to reallocation of capital, new research and product priorities, emphasis on different market segments and sharper understanding of a company's competitive cost position.

When a buyout occurs, it is a big event, and everyone from the CEO to first line supervisors in the field to vendors and customers expects change and a higher bar for performance. As the industrial sociologists have known for years, this period of heightened expectations creates a wonderful climate for innovation. The first year of a buyout is an unparalleled chance for the management team, backed by the new owners, to demonstrate that things will change.

More efficient capital structures. Private-equity firms are comfortable using significant -- but safe -- levels of debt to finance a significant portion of their investments. As a period of unequalled liquidity has swept the world capital markets in the past few years, private-equity firms have capitalized on low interest rates and relatively loose covenants to shape capital structures that improve likely returns on equity. Public companies could do the same -- but are reluctant to do so, clinging to more conservative goals of maintaining historical debt ratings.

A sense of urgency. Private equity owners bring a sense of urgency to the entire business. This reflects a realization that global forces erode a company's competitive position every day that the management does not act to deliver more value to its customers. Speed of execution itself becomes a competitive advantage that is squandered by companies that manage by committee and fail to seize opportunities.

These are powerful advantages that are only compounded by the ways that professionals in private-equity firms have learned to deploy capital. Supremely opportunistic, they recognize that the flexible and transitional nature of their capital means that they can fill spots in the global restructuring environment that public company capital cannot. They have established a highly effective form of financing and governance that enables large struggling corporations to remain competitive in response to the rapid changes in the global economy. They "just do it." Many public companies struggle to keep up.

Mr. Gogel is president and chief executive of Clayton, Dubilier & Rice, Inc., a private equity firm.

Chinatrust Official Resigns As Inquiry Probes Role In Deal (WSJ)

By Perris Lee Choon Siong

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan -- Chinatrust Financial Holding Co., a banking company and major credit-card issuer, said its vice chairman, Jeffrey Koo Jr., resigned Friday.

The company didn't give a reason for the resignation, but Mr. Koo's departure comes as Taiwan prosecutors probe his role in the financial group's unauthorized purchase of rival Mega Financial Holding Co.'s shares.

A Chinatrust Financial public-relations official wouldn't say whether Mr. Koo is still abroad. Company officials had said earlier that he would return to Taiwan on Nov. 18.

The Taipei Prosecutors Office issued an arrest warrant for Mr. Koo on Thursday after investigating the transaction for more than a month. Fred Lin, a spokesman for the prosecutors office, wasn't available for comment Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0098039

The investigation has led to detentions of senior company officials and resulted in a management shuffle at the financial group.

In October, prosecutors detained Chinatrust Financial General Counsel Y.D. Deng, Financial Investment Division Vice President Sean Lin and former Chief Financial Officer Perry Chang on alleged breach of trust and violation of banking law. Chief Strategic Officer Lin Shiaw-pin resigned this month, while the general auditor, Thomas Chen, was moved to a different position.

U.S. Firm Shelves Deal Amid Probe (WT)

By Andrew Salmon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

SEOUL -- A U.S. company has pulled out of a multibillion-dollar deal with a leading South Korean bank, citing an extended criminal probe that some investment analysts view as a dangerous outburst of hostility toward foreign investment.

At stake is a deal that would have netted the Dallas-based Lone Star Funds an estimated $4 billion with the sale of the once-ailing Korean Exchange Bank (KEB), which it purchased three years ago, rehabilitated and had planned to sell to Kookmin Bank.

"We have concluded that we cannot move forward with the sale of KEB to Kookmin Bank due to the continuing investigations, which have been extended several times and now have no firm completion date," Lone Star Chairman John Grayken said in announcing the decision late last week.

Lone Star acquired the near-bankrupt KEB in 2003 for $1.2 billion. In March, Lone Star agreed to sell its controlling stake in KEB, whose financial status has turned around dramatically, to Kookmin Bank, Korea's biggest lender.

The sale was expected to be completed by the summer, but has been indefinitely delayed by a massive investigation into the deal.

Prosecutors say they are probing whether Lone Star colluded with government officials and former executives of KEB to overstate the bank's financial woes to drive down the purchase price. Prosecutors say they also suspect that Loan Star and KEB manipulated the stock price of a KEB credit-card subsidiary prior to the original purchase.

Foreign investors and financial analysts view the investigation as a warning to outsiders interested in doing business in South Korea, raising objections that echo arguments heard when political pressure forced Dubai Ports World to back out of a deal to manage six U.S. ports earlier this year.

"I think it's a disturbing development as foreign investors are not convinced that this is a predictable market," said Tami Overby, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Korea. "It is troubling."

"There needs to be alacrity by the authorities," said Hank Morris, a finance specialist at the Seoul-based consulting firm IRC Ltd. "They have to say there is a case or no case, and proceedings must be fair."

The investigation involving 70 prosecutors has lasted for eight months with no indictments issued. South Korean courts last week turned down prosecutors' fifth request for an arrest warrant for Paul Yoo, Lone Star's top executive in South Korea. That hasn't stopped prosecutors from hauling Mr. Yoo in for questioning -- 24 times since the investigation began.

Some analysts expect Lone Star to extract dividends from KEB until investigations are complete, then put out a renewed tender to sell.

Kookmin CEO Kang Chung-won told reporters that he expected Lone Star to sell KEB "eventually," and said Kookmin might rebid.

In the wake of the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis, U.S.-based private-equity funds snapped up, turned around and resold a number of distressed South Korean assets, leading newspapers here to dub them "vulture funds."

Lone Star's KEB deal was slated to make the biggest profit of all, though many attributed the KEB turnaround more to a Korean economic upturn than to Lone Star's management. But against a background of public anger at Lone Star's anticipated windfall, Kookmin refused to pay until all the investigations are concluded.

"Once the investigation is finally completed, we will again consider our strategic options," Mr. Grayken said. "Until then, we will continue to vigorously defend our company and officers against the prosecutors' groundless accusations."

Mr. Grayken spoke on Thursday, a week after a Seoul court issued detention warrants for the fund's vice chairman and its legal counsel, both of whom are in the United States. An extradition process has reportedly begun, though few expect a U.S. court to extradite the two.

ENVIRONMENT:

High Court To Weigh Climate Change Case (AP-Y)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, November 27, 2006

The Supreme Court hears arguments this week in a case that could determine whether the Bush administration must change course in how it deals with the threat of global warming.

A dozen states as well as environmental groups and large cities are trying to convince the court that the Environmental Protection Agency must regulate, as a matter of public health, the amount of carbon dioxide that comes from vehicles.

Carbon dioxide is produced when fossil fuels such as oil and natural gas are burned. It is the principal "greenhouse" gas that many scientists believe is flowing into the atmosphere at an unprecedented rate, leading to a warming of the earth and widespread ecological changes. One way to reduce those emissions is to have cleaner-burning cars.

The Bush administration intends to argue before the court on Wednesday that the EPA lacks the power under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant. The agency contends that even if it did have such authority, it would have discretion under the law on how to address the problem without imposing emissions controls.

The states, led by Massachusetts, and more than a dozen environmental groups insist the 1970 law makes clear that carbon dioxide is a pollutant — much like lead and smog-causing chemicals — that is subject to regulation because its poses a threat to public health.

A sharply divided federal appeals court ruled in favor of the government in 2005. But last June, the Supreme Court decided to take up the case, plunging for the first time into the politically charged debate over global warming. The ruling next year is expected to be one of the court's most important ever involving the environment.

"Global warming is the most pressing environmental issue of our time and the decision by the court on this case will make a deep and lasting impact for generations to come," says Massachusetts' attorney general, Thomas Reilly.

David Bookbinder, a lawyer for the Sierra Club, says a legal clarification of the EPA's authority could determine whether the current administration must regulate carbon dioxide emissions and whether a future one will be able to demand such limits.

At issue for now is pollution from automobiles. But the ruling indirectly may affect how the agency deals with carbon dioxide that comes from electric power plants.

In a separate lawsuit, the EPA says the Clean Air Act also prevents it from regulating such emissions from those plants. That claim would be undercut, Bookbinder says, if the high court rules in the states' favor in the auto emissions case.

President Bush has rejected calls to regulate carbon dioxide. He favors voluntary steps by industry and development of new technologies to reduce the amount of greenhouse gases released into the atmosphere.

"We still have very strong reservations about an overarching, one-size-fits-all mandate about carbon," James Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, recently told a group of reporters.

The administration says in court papers the EPA should not be required to "embark on the extraordinarily complex and scientifically uncertain task of addressing the global issue of greenhouse gas emissions" when other ways are available to tackle climate change.

The United States accounts for about one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions. The amount of carbon dioxide from U.S. motor vehicles, power plants and other industry has increased on average by about 1 percent a year since 1990.

Now that Democrats will control the House and Senate in January after their election victories this month, there is expected to be increased pressure in Congress for mandatory limits on carbon emissions.

The election results "have signaled a need to change direction" on dealing with global warming, three Democratic senators who will play leading roles on environmental issues recently wrote the president.

But whether there is such a shift actually may depend, in the end, on the Supreme Court.

Plaintiffs in the suit are California, Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington. They were joined by cities such as Baltimore, New York and the District of Columbia; the Pacific island of America Samoa; the Sierra Club; the Union of Concerned Scientists; Greenpeace; and Friends of the Earth.

The case is Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, 05-1120.

A Texas Mess Over Coal (USNEWS)

By Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Proposed plants have stirred a clean-air uproar

That mantra of Lone Star State toughness, "Don't mess with Texas," actually began as an antilittering campaign back in the 1980s. While the campaign saw some success, the energy-producing state has proved less capable in cutting back on other pollutants. According to the American Lung Association, both the Houston and Dallas-Fort Worth areas are in the nation's top 10 for highest ozone levels, a major component of smog.

DOJ_NMG_0098041

Now, some Texans fear their air will be further, well, messed with. The state is seeking permits to build some 16 new coal-fired power plants. And the Lone Star State isn't alone. Though talk of clean energy dominates the headlines, cheap, plentiful coal is staging a quiet comeback. According to the Department of Energy, 154 coal plants are being proposed nationwide, enough to power 93 million homes. While power grids nationwide are surely strained, the crush of new coal plants--typically dirtier than natural gas--is sparking brawls at state and local levels.

Gamble. But the old not-in-my-backyard fight over power plants has a new wrinkle, global warming-potential ammo for environmentalists and motivation for utilities. Analysts say the rush to build new plants is a calculated gamble by utilities that the federal government is poised to impose historic curbs on greenhouse gases-particularly with Democrats ensconced in Congress. By building now, utilities may grandfather in a new generation of plants that won't be required to bear the full brunt of future laws. Utilities say they're simply trying to meet the burgeoning demands of a growing country. But environmentalists aren't buying, and they vow to fight the coal plant expansion in every available forum.

In something of a twist, energy-friendly Texas has become the closely watched ground zero in this battle. Gov. Rick Perry expedited the permitting of the coal plants in October 2005, when he was under pressure from energy price hikes that came about in the wake of deregulation of the state's energy market back in 2002. Some customers saw electric bills jump 80 percent, in part because of rising natural gas prices and, some say, a botched formula that determines the rates charged by the biggest providers. Coal plants, Perry argued, would drive down costs and give a much-needed boost to the state's power grid. Earlier this fall, a report by the North American Electric Reliability Council buttressed at least part of Perry's argument, saying Texas is among regions most at risk for grid failure because future demands are expected to exceed capacity. "We need to make sure Texas stays ahead of the demand for energy," says Perry spokesperson Kathy Walt.

Green groups. But a bipartisan coalition of 21 Texas cities and counties, as well as environmental groups, says conservation and renewable energy could reduce the strain on the grid. And the groups argue that the proposed fleet of pulverized-coal plants-standard technology but short of cutting-edge-isn't the answer for an already polluted state. Plus, pulverized coal releases more carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas, than do other options. Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, who leads the coalition, called the proposal "just mind boggling." Miller has "panhandled" across the state recruiting supporters and raising money for a fight to block the plants as currently proposed. Miller is using the $500,000 that's been raised to hire health and air-quality experts to testify before the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, which oversees permitting for the plants. At hearings beginning this week, Miller's coalition may argue that the commission didn't force energy companies to review all "best available technology," as required by federal law. The coalition believes that fledgling coal-gasification technology--producing a dramatically lower level of pollutants--should be considered.

10 Questions For Al Gore (TIME)

By Carolina A. Miranda

Time, November 27, 2006

Al Gore's reinvention keeps rolling. His interactive cable network for young people, Current TV, is available in 30 million homes in the U.S. An Inconvenient Truth, Gore's global-warming slide show turned hit film, is the third highest grossing documentary of all time and debuted on DVD last week. Gore, 58, talked with TIME's Carolina A. Miranda about his Hollywood role models, the steps he has taken to be carbon neutral and whether he'll run for President in 2008.

Given your star turns at Cannes and Sundance and the success of your documentary, should Brad Pitt worry?

Nah! I'm trying to follow in the tradition of Rin Tin Tin. I would like to have my paw print in front of [Grauman's] Chinese Theater. But I'll have to hold a lot more slide shows before that's possible.

Can audiences expect more show-business credits in the future?

My previous work, as you may know, was as a disembodied head in Futurama. I played opposite Richard Nixon. They're making a movie version where I will reprise my role. There are a number of people clustered in a certain age group who are quite taken with the fact that I once uttered the immortal line "I have ridden the mighty moon worm!"

How did a lecture on climate change become such a hit?

I've had a powerful ally in reality. Global warming is now clearly the overriding challenge of our time. Nations around the world are waking up to it and putting in place new policies. Of course, much more is needed, but the good news is that much more change is on the way.

There are many people who still doubt the science. Senator James Inhofe, head of the Senate's environmental committee, has condemned global-warming science as "hoax."

DOJ_NMG_0098042

There's some good news here. Senator Inhofe will soon be replaced by Senator Barbara Boxer, an advocate of solving the crisis, as chairwoman of that committee. As to why there are still skeptics--there are people who believe that the moon landing was staged in a movie lot in Arizona. Another reason is that some of the largest polluters are still putting millions of dollars a year to hire pseudo scientists to confuse people into thinking that this crisis isn't real.

In proposing a solution to this problem, you are asking people to change their lifestyles. How feasible is that?

The grass-roots response has been impressive. There are 330 U.S. cities that have independently embraced the Kyoto treaty. And millions of Americans are deciding to become carbon neutral.

Your critics on the right say that with all your jet-setting, you don't live as carbon neutral as you preach.

That's just not true. Two years ago we became a carbon-neutral family. I purchase Green Power [electricity from renewable sources], have installed new lightbulbs and clock thermostats, and I'm installing solar panels. We switched to a hybrid car. I am not recommending actions that I haven't already taken myself.

Soon there will be a new Democratic Congress in town. Do you think it will seriously tackle this issue?

Yes, I do. It remains to be seen, of course--in deeds, not only words. It will be difficult. But I think that the odds of meaningful change in U.S. policy have improved quite dramatically since the election.

Should ratifying the Kyoto Protocol be a priority?

We should ratify it, but this will be very difficult so long as Bush and Cheney remain in the White House and there is a narrow majority in the Senate.

Speaking of that narrow majority, there is talk that your former running mate, Joe Lieberman, will defect to the Republican Party. Do you think that's likely?

I'd be surprised, but I really don't know. Joe has always been a leader on the issue of global warming. It's one of several issues where he would find himself in uncomfortable company if he changed parties.

You have stated repeatedly that you are not currently planning to run for President in 2008. Do you have a more creative denial?

I don't have any plans to run. Nor do I have any creative denials. I'm using the same ones. They'll soon be out on DVD.

Power Surge After Decades, A Solar Pioneer Sees Spark In Sales (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. -- Stanford R. Ovshinsky has spent 40 years -- and millions of dollars in backing from various partners -- pursuing his dream. He wanted to build a huge machine that would make giant sheets of material that can generate solar power.

"I said we are going to make it by the mile," he recalls. "Nobody believed me, not even in my own company."

Today, Mr. Ovshinsky, 84 years old, finds himself running his factory at full capacity and overwhelmed with orders. His company, Energy Conversion Devices Inc., is the largest U.S.-owned maker of photovoltaic materials, which convert sunlight to electricity. The company is a pioneer in an exploding global industry selling $15 billion a year of what's called "PV."

The company's mammoth machine extends the length of a football field. It runs much like a printing press, spooling out thin sheets of the PV material, which can be used on roofs of homes or businesses. As energy costs rise, along with concerns about global warming, PV is in demand.

For decades, solar power -- invented in the U.S. in the 1950s and improved on in the space program in the 1960s -- was a made-in-America product with a tiny market. U.S. companies dominated until the late 1990s, when Japanese and German companies took the lead. Today, the U.S. holds third place in solar-power production, but China is closing fast.

Mr. Ovshinsky, a thin, nattily dressed inventor who never progressed beyond high school, is a big reason why the U.S. remains in this high-tech race. He has a six-month backlog of PV orders, selling about half his production to Germany, and is building three new plants. His PV is thinner, cheaper and more flexible than that of many competitors, and can be used directly as a roofing material.

"Stan Ovshinsky has shown the world that there is a robust market for thin film panels," says Rhone Resch, president of the Solar Energy Industries Association, based in Washington, D.C., which represents U.S. manufacturers.

Along the way, critics have seen Mr. Ovshinsky's ideas as marginal or far-fetched. His plans have cost a succession of business partners millions of dollars. And even today, while sales of his solar products are booming, his company is still losing money because of his other unconventional projects, such as a system that can store hydrogen fuel in cars.

"His thinking is different than most of us," says Robert Stempel, who was chairman of General Motors Corp. when he first became intrigued with Mr. Ovshinsky's approach. In 1995, after being forced out at GM, Mr. Stempel took his current job as chairman and chief executive of Energy Conversion Devices.

DOJ_NMG_0098043

Mr. Ovshinsky's PV product has caught the attention of President Bush, who earlier this year decried the U.S.'s "addiction" to oil and vowed to expand domestic energy resources.

In February -- after calling for a doubling of the government's current solar-research budget of $83 million a year in his State of the Union speech -- Mr. Bush visited Mr. Ovshinsky's factory. After meeting privately with the inventor, the president spoke glowingly about how a consumer with a PV system on his roof could produce his own power and even sell it to the local utility in times of peak demand. For many U.S. consumers, however, the idea is more theoretical than practical, given a welter of conflicting state laws and utility practices.

Photovoltaic materials come in a variety of forms. What they have in common is that sunlight excites their atomic structures, creating electricity. Most producers make PV from expensive silicon crystals and cover their panels with protective sheets of glass. These materials depend on a uniform crystalline structure.

In the 1960s, Mr. Ovshinsky began working with cheaper materials that require a relatively tiny amount of silicon. In 1977, his work with these materials prompted him to begin thinking about a machine that would make a paper-thin film of PV. By this time, challenges weren't new to him.

Growing up in Akron, Ohio, Mr. Ovshinsky did odd jobs to help support his family during the Depression. He attended trade school at night, where he learned to run a machine shop. Building and fixing big machines became his passion. He soon wanted to know about the physics and chemistry that made machines run and the electronics needed to automate them. On weekends, he spent much of his time in Akron's libraries. "To me, school wasn't the place where I did most of my learning," he says.

He came to Detroit in the 1940s to sell his first invention, an automated lathe. In 1960, he and his wife, Iris, who had a doctorate in biochemistry from Boston University, set up Energy Conversion Devices. The purpose: to exploit the potential of amorphous materials, which include combinations of cesium, tellurium, germanium and other elements. "We wanted to start new industries and solve serious societal problems," says Mr. Ovshinsky.

His wife, who died in August, helped drive the business. "She was a very strong technical person and very strong in organizing him," says Larry Kazmerski, who manages the solar-energy program for the Department of Energy's National Renewable Energy Laboratory. "When you bought Ovshinsky, you got two Ovshinskys." One of their skills, he notes, was the ability to attract a steady stream of financial backers.

The Ovshinskys planned a factory that would make thin-film solar PV. Mr. Ovshinsky envisioned a machine that would deposit layers of the electricity-producing film on flexible materials, such as stainless steel, plastic membranes and even shingles. "Other products you put on your roof," he says. "Mine is the roof."

Support for solar took a nosedive in 1982, when the Reagan Administration cut the government's solar research budget in half, sending entrepreneurs and scientists to other fields. Meanwhile, Wall Street investors, burned by over-hyped solar projects, were skeptical. The electricity produced by solar power was far more expensive than that generated by coal or natural-gas power plants.

None of this deterred Mr. Ovshinsky. His goal was to make PV so cheap that it would be competitive with fossil fuels. Some backers wound up disappointed because it took him decades to build the big PV-producing machine. Others learned from his ideas, while providing him with funds to pursue his project.

The first company to take the plunge was Atlantic Richfield Oil Corp., which gave him $25 million in 1980. But after a three-year contract expired, it wasn't renewed. Then came Sharp Electronics Corp. The Japanese company was interested in using solar-powered cells to run its calculators and other electronic devices. That pact ended in 1987, Mr. Ovshinsky says. Sharp later returned to solar energy and is now considered the world's leading manufacturer of silicon crystal panels.

Standard Oil of Ohio became a partner in 1981. Mr. Ovshinsky recalls the company wanted to build only small PV machines. "I said you have to have a big machine to bring down your costs," he says. That pact ended after BP PLC, the British oil company, took over the Ohio company in 1986.

Eric Daniels, vice president of technology for BP's solar division, says the company saw merit in Mr. Ovshinsky's thin-film approach, but decided to commercialize silicon crystal panels instead. BP is now one of the world's leading PV producers. Some customers prefer the heavier silicon product because they say it makes electricity more efficiently in areas where there is strong sunlight.

Mr. Daniels says BP is still doing research on thin-film PV, but in order to gear up to manufacture solar panels "there were some tough decisions taken" to focus on making and selling one initial product.

In 1999, Mr. Ovshinsky formed a joint venture with Canon USA, a subsidiary of the Japanese camera and copier maker. Canon later sold its interest to a Belgian company, Bekaert NV, which agreed to invest some $50 million to construct the big machine Mr. Ovshinsky had in mind.

Bekaert's engineers helped design and build the PV machine, which began running in 2002. But in May 2003, Mr. Stempel says, a new team of Bekaert managers concluded the machine was too big and expensive to make a profit.

DOJ_NMG_0098044

"We didn't want a reluctant partner, so we bought them out," says Mr. Stempel. Energy Conversion Devices paid Bekaert about $6 million, he says. Francoise Vanthemsche, a spokesperson for the Belgian company said: "Bekaert considers this as a closed file and will not provide any additional comment."

About that time, demand for PV panels began to rise as the result of incentive programs in Germany and Japan. Both countries were preparing restrictions on carbon dioxide and other emissions believed to cause global warming. In 2000, Japan began offering incentives that paid 50% of the costs of buying and installing solar panels.

That same year Germany launched a program that allows solar users to pay for their systems by selling excess electricity back to utilities at a generous, fixed rate. Some homeowners even rented neighbors' rooftops to expand production of solar power and their income.

These days, the global market for PV has grown so much that silicon is in short supply. To counter demand from PV makers, the computer industry and other users of silicon chips are bidding the price up, hampering companies like BP and Sharp that need lots of silicon crystals. That's good for Mr. Ovshinsky. Because his process uses relatively little silicon, he is selling all the PV he can make.

Sales for the solar division of his company, called United Solar Ovonic, have quadrupled since 2003, now running at $90 million a year. About 50% of its products are headed to Germany, where sunlight is relatively thin. "Germany has the average solar exposure of Anchorage, Alaska," says Mr. Resch, of the U.S. solar-industry association. But Germans get fat incentives for installing Mr. Ovshinsky's product.

Last year, for example, Michael Schindler's apartment building in downtown Berlin invested its reserve fund in a local bank, which paid 2.5% interest. This year, it has invested part of the fund in a new solar membrane on the roof -- made by Mr. Ovshinsky's company -- which is making enough electricity to raise the rate of return to about 5% for the money invested in solar.

Mr. Schindler says he had questions about the project at first, but electricians installed a voltage meter that shows him and other unit owners when they are making juice. "Overall, I am optimistic that it is a good system," he says.

Biohaus PV Handels GmbH, one of Germany's biggest distributors of solar products, likes Mr. Ovshinsky's PV because it can produce energy on older buildings with flat roofs and sometimes on walls of large buildings. "Business with this material is picking up strongly and continues to grow," says Manuela Schafers, spokeswoman for the company.

Some states are trying to prime the solar pump. Earlier this year, California launched an 11-year, $2.85 billion incentive program that, among other things, provides rebates to consumers to reduce by as much as 30% the cost of solar rooftop installations. Other states are working on similar programs.

The rising cost of natural gas sometimes pushes peak electricity prices in California and other areas above 20 cents a kilowatt hour -- a range where solar can compete without government incentives.

Thirty-four states have laws that permit homeowners to produce and sell solar energy, but many have limitations that discourage the practice, and utilities often make it difficult. "It's like having 50 different rules for plugging in your telephones," says Mr. Resch.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Sentencing Disparity Continues (AP)

By Ben Evans, The Associated Press

AP, November 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress is headed toward adjournment again this year without acting on what is widely viewed as an indefensible sentencing disparity between federal drug offenses involving crack and powder cocaine.

Although nearly everyone agrees that the uneven treatment the two drugs receive under federal sentencing laws is unfair, Democrats and Republicans have been locked in a stalemate for more than a decade over the proper fix.

That stalemate, unlikely to break before Democrats regain control of Congress, has left in place a system that frequently sends black, inner-city defendants to jail for more than a decade over quantities of crack that would fetch far shorter sentence for powder-cocaine offenders.

"It can't be sustained on public policy arguments," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican and former federal prosecutor who has co-sponsored a bill to address the issue since 2001. "Congress has mandated these sentences, and we should constantly monitor what we did and adjust it for fairness."

Sessions' bill has stalled because many Democrats believe it doesn't go far enough to address the problem, and could in part aggravate it.

Under the current law, passed amid the crack epidemic of the 1980s, trafficking in 5 grams of crack cocaine -- about the weight of a nickel -- calls for a mandatory minimum five-year prison sentence. The same sentence for powder cocaine requires 500 grams.

Sessions' bill, which he plans to reintroduce next year, would increase the amount of crack triggering the five-year sentence from 5 grams to 20 grams, while raising the trigger for an automatic 10-year sentence from 50 grams to 200 grams.

At the same time, the bill would lower the quantities of powder cocaine warranting such sentences, from 500 grams to 400 grams for a five-year sentence and from 5 kilograms to 4 kilograms for a 10-year sentence.

Although Sessions' bill has two Democratic co-sponsors, many Democrats say it would perpetuate significant inequities while creating more arbitrary and unnecessarily long sentences for powder cocaine offenders. With backing from the legal community, Democrats instead have called for further reducing the mandatory sentences or for getting rid of mandatory minimums for drug offenses altogether and giving judges more discretion.

With Democrats taking control of Congress, incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont and fellow committee Democrats will likely take up the issue soon, said Tracy Schmaler, Leahy's spokeswoman. But with narrow majorities in both the House and Senate, it remains unclear whether any of the Democratic proposals could pass.

Law enforcement groups as well as the Justice Department continue to argue that stiffer penalties for crack are warranted because of the drug's strong connection with violent crime in poor neighborhoods.

"There's violence associated with both, but the nature of the way crack cocaine is retailed lends it to a higher degree of local street violence than powder cocaine does," said Jim Pasco, executive director of the national Fraternal Order of Police, which supports raising penalties for powder cocaine to balance the sentencing gap.

Sessions acknowledged that many of his colleagues are wary of appearing soft on crime by reducing penalties.

But critics of the current system, including many federal judges and legal groups such as the American Bar Association, argue that it is devastating inner-city neighborhoods -- more than 80 percent of the crack offenders are black -- while clogging federal prisons with low-level drug dealers.

In testimony before the U.S. Sentencing Commission earlier this month, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton, a former deputy drug czar for the first President Bush, called the disparity "unconscionable."

The commission, an independent agency created by Congress to monitor federal sentencing laws, has recommended changes to the current structure three times since 1995, including an initial recommendation to eliminate the disparity by lowering crack sentences.

The commission is again reviewing the disparity.

According to the commission, 25,762 drug offenders were prosecuted under the federal sentencing laws in 2005. Almost half of those cases involved crack or powder cocaine.

'Soda Pop' Targets Draw Long Sentences (KCK)

Kansas City Kansan, November 24, 2006

Leaders of a Kansas City, Kan., drug ring targeted by a federal drug enforcement investigation called "Operation Soda Pop" are drawing sentences of 10 years or more in prison.

"The government has seized more than $1.8 million in cash and property from the members of this far-reaching conspiracy to flood the market in the Kansas City metropolitan area with marijuana and cocaine from Mexico," said U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren. "This was a carefully planned and executed criminal enterprise in which the conspirators tried to disguise their conduct behind seemingly legitimate storefronts, frequent trips to Mexico in vehicles modified with hidden compartments and furtive cellular phone conversations conducted in a coded language."

Operation Soda Pop, an organized crime drug enforcement task force operation announced Sept. 4, 2004, has resulted so far in the convictions of 16 conspirators. Among those who have been sentenced:

Dennis Goyer was sentenced to 300 months in prison.

Gerardo Reyes-Lopez was sentenced Nov. 21 to 151 months.

Bill Joe Antle was sentenced Nov. 15 to 108 months.

Oswaldo F. Pozo was sentenced in September to 151 months.

Daniel Moreno was sentenced in August to 135 months.

Norma J. Renteria was sentenced in July to 120 months.

Upcoming sentencing hearings include: Lewis Lamonte Smith (2/5/07); Maria Hernandez (1/8/07); Sigfredo Paez (1/8/07); Jacinto E. Hernandez (1/2/07); Sandra Etters (12/18/06); Carlos Roberto Ortega (11/27/06); Eduardo Agramon-Castro (11/27/06); and Mauricio A. Garces (12/18/06).

DOJ_NMG_0098046

Others charged in the case who already have been sentenced include Jesus Casteaneda (33 months); and Germain Devia (time served).

Operation Soda Pop was an 18-month investigation coordinated by the Drug Enforcement Administration with the assistance of the Kansas City, 0Kan., Police Department, the Internal Revenue Service's Criminal Investigation Division and other federal, state and local law enforcement agencies.

A federal grand jury indictment returned in August 2004 charged that from Jan. 1, 2002, through Aug. 11, 2004, a multi-national drug transportation and distribution organization organized the shipment of marijuana and cocaine from Mexico through El Paso, Texas, into the Kansas City area. The indictment alleged that the organization transported marijuana and cocaine using commercial trucks, passenger vehicles, and trailers and that cash derived from the sale and distribution of the cocaine and marijuana was collected, packaged, concealed in motor vehicles and transported to El Paso, Texas, and then on to various locations in Mexico. The indictment alleged that proceeds from the sale of the cocaine and marijuana were also used to purchase personal and real property in Texas, Kansas, Missouri, and Mexico.

According to court documents:

Conspirators purchased an automobile repair business, Anaco Transmission, in Merriam, Kan., where marijuana and cocaine was received and distributed.

Marijuana also was delivered from El Paso, Texas, to a turf farm in Stillwell, Kan.

Members of the organization traveled to El Paso, Texas, to coordinate the shipments of marijuana and cocaine to the Kansas City area. They conspired to distribute approximately 11,272 kilograms (approximately 24,798 pounds) of marijuana and approximately 293 kilograms (approximately 644 pounds) of cocaine from Jan. 1, 2002, through Aug. 11, 2004.

Melgren said the Drug Enforcement Administration received assistance in the investigation from the Internal Revenue Service, Criminal Investigation; the Bureau of Immigration and Custom Enforcement; the KCK Police Department; the Johnson County Sheriff's Office; and the Overland Park Police Department. Other agencies also assisted with the investigation and the execution of search warrants including the FBI; the Missouri Highway Patrol; the Kansas City, Mo., Police Department; the Kansas Highway Patrol; the Jackson County Drug Task Force; the U.S. Marshals Service; and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Missouri.

Melgren commended Assistant U.S. Attorney Tris Hunt, Assistant U.S. Attorney Marietta Parker, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Christensen and Special Assistant U.S. Attorney David Zabel, who prosecuted the case.

Popular Ex-Malden Detective Sentenced: Jordan To Serve 15 Years For Role In 2003 Cocaine Case (MO)

Malden (MA) Observer, November 24, 2006

David Jordan, a 19-year veteran of the Malden Police Department and a former narcotics investigator, was sentenced last Wednesday to 15 years in federal prison for his role in a 2003 cocaine heist.

Jordan, 45, who lives in Stoneham, was sentenced along with co-conspirator and reported heist ringleader Anthony Bucci, 44, of Wakefield.

Judge Reginald Lindsay said Bucci would spend the next 21 years in federal prison, serving six years more than his accomplice because of Bucci's role in masterminding the operation, according to U.S. District Court Clerk Stephen York.

Two other men - Francis Muolo and Jon Minotti, who testified against Jordan in the case - have already been sentenced to terms of 57 and 59 months, respectively, for their roles in the conspiracy.

The charges stem from a staged raid on Dec. 24, 2003, in which Minotti, who was a drug informant for Jordan, set up a meeting between Bucci and known area cocaine mogul Carlos Ruiz in the parking lot of the former Malden Hospital.

According to investigators, the deal was worth $80,000.

As the deal went down, Jordan intervened and, as planned, Minotti swiped the cocaine and escaped through the woods to a waiting vehicle driven by Muolo. Jordan then allegedly told Bucci and Ruiz to leave the scene with the money.

Jordan was to receive a $30,000 kickback in the deal, but was unaware that federal drug investigators had set up a tap on Ruiz' phone prior to the transaction as part of a much larger investigation in the area.

As a result, DEA agents witnessed the incident, which they immediately believed was staged, and began investigating Jordan and his counterparts.

Prosecutors said that Jordan continued to meet with Minotti on several occasions during the investigation. In one interview, Minotti reportedly wore a wire and recorded a conversation in which Jordan threatened his former friend and accused him of setting him up.

DOJ_NMG_0098047

Jordan, who was also a contract painter, claimed that his conversations with Minotti continued because the men had a business relationship outside of the police force and had done some contracting work together.

Both Jordan and Bucci were convicted on charges of conspiracy and cocaine distribution in April of this year, although both have maintained their innocence throughout the judicial process. Jordan also reportedly pulled a gun on Ruiz during the incident, earning him additional charges in the case.

Jordan was a third generation Malden detective and the department's lead narcotics investigator at the time of his arrest. It is unclear whether either party plans to appeal the sentence.

Fugitives Among The Millions Lured To The Grand Strand Each Year (AP)

AP, November 27, 2006

MYRTLE BEACH, S.C. - Myrtle Beach draws tourists every year by the millions. But when the sunbathing throngs thin out in the fall and winter, another group of travelers is easier to spot - fugitives.

About 14 wanted criminals are arrested each month in city of Myrtle Beach, said Investigator Brenda Christy of the Myrtle Beach Police Department.

"Mainly, it's because we're a tourist destination," said Christy, who also is a special deputy with the U.S. Marshals Service. "We grow from about 26,000 people to about 300,0000 on any given weekend."

She said fugitives go to Myrtle Beach - and other tourist destinations across the country - hoping to blend in with those large numbers.

"If I'm wanted, it would be nice to come here, soak up some sun, lay on the beach, blend in and feel like I'm not a wanted criminal," Christy said.

Marshals Service spokesman Deputy Tim Stec said an average of 240 fugitives a month are captured throughout South Carolina.

"We see a lot of people come to South Carolina because they obviously don't want to get caught," Stec said. "We see a lot of people coming from, say, New York City, just wanting to lay low with a relative who lives out in the country."

But as summer turns to fall and winter, it becomes harder for those out-of-towners to hide in Myrtle Beach.

"Businesses also tend to close earlier this time of year, so a fugitive who maybe usually hangs around the bars until all hours of the morning now has to leave them earlier and find someplace else to go," Christy said.

And they may try to go home for the holidays.

"A fugitive may at one of these times say 'Hey, I haven't seen mom and dad in 10 years and I know they're having dinner at home' and there's a good chance that's when you'll be able to find them," Christy said.

Christy and Stec said finding wanted men and women can be dangerous.

"We see people go to extraordinary means not to get caught," Stec said. "We see them hide in attics, under beds and run out the back door as we're approaching the front, and we have had incidents where someone has pulled a weapon."

Christy said she has been in some pretty tricky situations.

"I've been in a lot of situations and I've been really, really blessed that someone hasn't turned on me, tried to kill me," she said. "These guys you're looking for are going to jail for murder and we're standing between them and freedom. It can be pretty daunting."

TAX:

Outside Audit Minding The Gap: IRS Looks Closer At Profit Disparity (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

Publicly traded companies reduced their U.S. taxable income by at least $34.8 billion in 2004 through potentially abusive tax transactions without taking a similar hit on profits reported to shareholders, new Internal Revenue Service data show.

The vagaries of accounting rules and tax laws allow public companies to keep two sets of books: one for shareholders and another for the Internal Revenue Service. Not surprisingly, companies tend to report higher profits to investors than to the tax man.

For 2004, the IRS started requiring companies to give it more detail about the reasons behind that gap. Companies that year reported roughly 40% higher profits to Wall Street -- known as book income -- than to tax authorities. The IRS also asked companies to reveal what portion of the difference between taxable income and profits reported to shareholders was attributed to deals the IRS defines as having some hallmarks of questionable tax shelters, known as "reportable transactions."

DOJ_NMG_0098048

The IRS is collecting the data on reportable transactions in part to help decide which companies' returns deserve more scrutiny as part of a broader drive to crack down on corporate tax shelters.

"These items are all hints that they warrant further review," said Bob Adams, a senior adviser at the IRS. "Some of the transactions that fall in this category may be perfectly fine, but many times they're not."

All told, U.S. public companies included in the data reported about $554 billion in pretax profits to Wall Street in 2004, but only about $394 billion to the IRS. (It's difficult to compare 2004, the most recently available year, with prior years, because of changes in reporting requirements.) For all companies required to report such figures -- not just the publicly traded ones -- the gap was even bigger: They reported $707 billion in pretax profits to their investors, but $523 billion to the IRS.

The biggest reason for the disparity is depreciation. Companies often can write off the cost of equipment faster for tax purpose than for financial statements. Other large factors include differences between tax and accounting rules for expensing stock options.

Such data on individual companies, if publicly available, would be of interest to many investors. Companies being audited by the IRS with book income that was much higher than their taxable income were more likely to be ordered to pay bigger back-tax bills, according to a 1998 paper by Lillian F. Mills, now a University of Texas accounting professor. The bigger the gap, she found, the higher the adjustment.

Other studies have concluded that companies with big gaps are more likely to be aggressive with their accounting, which can result in restatements and legal problems that can hurt share prices. A 2005 study by Michelle Hanlon, a University of Michigan accounting professor, found that big-gap companies had less-consistent earnings than those with smaller gaps.

Tax disputes recently have saddled several big companies with costly bills, including GlaxoSmithKline PLC, which agreed to pay the U.S. government $3.4 billion for taxes stemming from transactions between the British pharmaceutical maker and a U.S. subsidiary.

It's difficult to ascertain a company's tax situation from quarterly disclosures to investors, in part because items like tax reserves obscure the picture. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson has floated the idea of making corporate tax returns, or part of them, public. Companies confidentially explain the gap to the IRS on a form now called "Schedule M-3," which is a revised version of an earlier form.

"Transparency is an important underpinning of our financial markets, [but] transparency is quite limited in the area of tax, which remains largely a black box," Mr. Everson said in an interview. "Looking at the M-3 and the information it provides as a source of public discourse certainly should be considered."

At a Senate hearing in June, well-known tax lawyer Edward Kleinbard testified in favor of making the forms public. "Investors today know shockingly little about the actual cash tax liabilities of public companies," he said. Disclosing such information also "might dampen some corporate enthusiasm for tax-shelter transactions."

The IRS data are based on filings by 4,195 U.S. public companies with fiscal years that ended between December and June. Available only in aggregate, the data were contained in tables accompanying an article by IRS researchers published in the trade journal Tax Notes. Only companies with assets of $10 million or more were required to file the new forms. Figures from about 2% of the public companies weren't included because of flaws in their submissions.

The two sets of books vary because they measure different things. Companies report financial results to investors according to generally accepted accounting principles, a set of standards promulgated by the Financial Accounting Standards Board. For taxes, however, income is calculated according to laws passed by Congress -- which are peppered with sweeteners to encourage certain types of corporate behavior, such as increased research spending, and loopholes requested by lobbyists for industries and even individual companies.

The IRS has long required companies to file a form reconciling the gap. The previous form required far less detail, and gave companies significant leeway in defining book income. The new form requires thousands of companies to give far more information, including dozens of new categories to explain the gap.

But one of the biggest is the category for reportable transactions. The category includes transactions pitched by advisers who are paid with fees based on tax benefits or who require that the deals' structures remain confidential. Confidential tax advice is "troublesome," said the IRS's Mr. Adams. "If it's OK, then why is it so confidential?"

The reportable-transactions category also includes deals that have been explicitly forbidden by the IRS -- so-called "listed transactions."

Some corporate tax experts advocate making the rules more uniform to reduce the gap and discourage the use of improper shelters.

"The only solution that I have confidence will work to shut this stuff down is to say: 'If you're going to claim a tax loss, book it,' " said Michael J. Graetz, a tax-law professor at Yale Law School.

DOJ_NMG_0098049

Many accountants oppose such a move, arguing that shareholders shouldn't be given understated pictures of companies' true value simply because Congress allowed tax deductions to encourage some type of economic activity.

The Thorny Question About Tax Increases Concerns Economic Risks Over The Long Term (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

Would higher taxes cripple the U.S. economic expansion?

That's what the Bush administration is warning, with the Democrats set to control Congress.

But, in fact, such a tax increase probably wouldn't do much short-term harm, many economists say, because the Federal Reserve could offset the chilling effect on consumer spending with lower interest rates. A much trickier question is whether raising taxes would do long-term damage, and that would depend on which taxes were raised and how bond markets responded.

It is hardly certain that Democrats could raise taxes in the face of a veto by President Bush. Still, about half the 41 newly elected Democratic congressmen favor reversing the tax cuts for the richest taxpayers right away, rather than waiting until they expire at the end of 2010. Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said three weeks ago that raising taxes now would have "about zero negative effect on the economy."

Last week, Edward Lazear, chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, disagreed, warning that a tax increase would be "very risky" and "endanger the kind of economic growth that we've had over the past couple of years."

Economists on Wall Street, though, are sanguine. Despite a recent slowdown, the economy is strong. The unemployment rate, at 4.4%, is even lower than the 4.8% the White House considers sustainable in the long run. The Fed is worried enough about inflation that it says another rate increase remains on the table. Tighter fiscal policy -- either higher taxes or lower spending -- could ease inflation pressure and allow the Fed to cut rates sooner than otherwise.

Higher taxes would impose a drag, and "in our view of the world -- which is that growth is resilient -- that would be welcome," says Michael Feroli, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.

Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley, says with interest rates already high enough to slow growth a bit, the Fed "definitely" has the wherewithal to offset a tax increase, though that depends in part on its type, timing and size.

One risk is that by the time taxes went up, the economy could be weaker, and rate cuts might come too late to help. Timing is one reason economists generally recommend against using fiscal policy to modulate the business cycle. Ed McKelvey at Goldman Sachs thinks growth will be relatively weak next year, so a tax increase "would certainly raise the risk [of recession] considerably."

The bigger controversy is whether raising taxes would make good long-term sense. While the administration has often touted its tax cuts' role in boosting consumer spending, and thus pulling the economy out of a slump in 2003, Macroeconomic Advisers, a forecasting firm, estimates that benefit had fully faded by early last year. The Treasury Department estimates the tax cuts will eventually raise annual gross domestic product by 0.7%, by increasing the incentive to work and invest.

Whether those benefits would be lost depends on which taxes were to be raised, says Glenn Hubbard, dean of Columbia University's graduate business school, who as a White House adviser from 2001 to 2003 helped design the tax cuts. "A lot of the tax cuts weren't pro-growth," he says.

Treasury estimates the biggest boost to economic growth comes from the cuts in capital gains and dividend taxes, and to the upper marginal income-tax rates. Those are the cuts the Democrats most want to reverse. On the other hand, the expanded child tax credit is relatively uncontroversial and thus unlikely to be reversed. Gregory Mankiw, economist at Harvard University and a former White House adviser, says, while that "might be good for social purposes, there's no economic case for it," because the credit doesn't increase the incentive to work or invest.

Still, many of those supply-side benefits have yet to be realized. Alan Auerbach, an economist specializing in tax policy at the University of California at Berkeley, says that in the relatively short time since their passage, the capital-gains and dividend tax cuts have mostly rewarded business investments made years earlier, rather than spurred new investment. They won't "do much for capital formation or for economic activity generally" until many more years have passed, he says. He adds that while preserving the top tax-rate cuts and not those at the bottom may be better for long-term growth, it would aggravate the widening gap in after-tax incomes between the rich and the rest.

Treasury's estimates depend on the tax cuts being financed by lower government spending. In fact, the tax cuts have been financed by increased borrowing, which in theory "crowds out" private borrowing and investment, depressing growth. Mr. Rubin has argued the economy did well in the 1990s because after President Clinton raised taxes in 1993, the deficit fell, and that brought down long-term interest rates, "crowding in" private investment.

However, with long-term rates already so low, Mr. Berner says, "it's hard to argue that you get quite the same response."

DOJ_NMG_0098050

Furthermore, reversing Mr. Bush's tax cuts would do little to address the coming surge in spending on Medicare and Social Security benefits for retiring baby boomers. Investment banker Pete Peterson, chairman of the Peterson Institute for International Economics, says that increase over the next 35 years equals 9% of gross domestic product, while scrapping the Bush tax cuts equals 1% of GDP. "The minute you start looking at a tax increase as the primary solution, you're confronted with tax increases that are clearly beyond anything anyone can imagine."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Dem Inquiries Could Provoke Divisions (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee promises an array of oversight investigations that could provoke sharp disagreement with Republicans and the White House.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., said Democrats, who took power in the elections Nov. 7, would govern "in the middle" next year. But the veteran lawmaker has a reputation as one who has never avoided a fight, and he did not back away from that reputation Sunday.

Among the investigations Dingell said he wants the committee to undertake:

·The new Medicare drug benefit. "There are lots and lots and lots of scandals," he said without citing specifics.

·Spending on government contractors in Iraq, including Halliburton, the Texas-based oil services conglomerate once led by Vice President Cheney.

·An energy task force overseen by Cheney. It "was carefully cooked to provide only participation by oil companies and energy companies," Dingell said.

·A review of food and drug safety, particularly in the area of nutritional supplements.

The incoming chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee said his committee would not take on contentious issues, such as extending expiring tax cuts or overhauling Social Security, at the beginning of the year. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said Democrats do not want a fight with President Bush and want to prove they can govern.

"The first thing we're going to do is try to work together on things we know we can accomplish," Rangel said.

"Rather than have the committee against the president, it's not going to happen."

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., set to lead the House Financial Services Committee, said issues such as raising the minimum wage will be popular.

"In my own committee, the biggest difference you're going to see is we're going to return to try to help deal with the housing crisis that blights so many parts of our country socially and economically," Frank said.

Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott, who will become the Senate's second-ranking GOP leader, said Republicans can block legislation "if it's really bad, not in the country's best interest." He said he wanted to find areas where the two sides can compromise.

"The people, I think, sent us a message. I think we've got it," Lott said. "We're going to be working hard together."

The lawmakers appeared on Fox News Sunday.

GAO Chief Sends Long Wish List To The New Congress (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

If the next Congress follows through on Democratic leadership promises to conduct aggressive oversight of the government, a to-do list will be waiting, courtesy of Comptroller General David M. Walker, the head of the Government Accountability Office.

For the first time, Walker has sent congressional leaders a letter pointing to areas where he thinks oversight is needed. His list, drawn from years of research by the watchdog agency, is intended to give Congress "a jump-start on your planning," he said.

"We cannot afford to continue business as usual in Washington, given our current deficit and growing long-term fiscal challenges," Walker said in the letter, sent this month.

In addition, Walker wrote, most of the government's policies and programs "are based on conditions that existed decades ago," suggesting that it is time for "a fundamental review, reprioritization and re-engineering of the base of government."

Walker lists 36 topics for investigation and oversight hearings, and many of them involve daunting political issues, such as Social Security and Medicare, immigration policy, and the costs and benefits of environmental and energy policies.

DOJ_NMG_0098051

Some of his recommendations touch on how federal employees conduct the government's business and deliver services to the public. For example, Walker's letter calls for:

Â· Addressing the government's contracting problems.

The GAO estimates that about a quarter of the government's discretionary spending is for products and services from contractors (more than $338 billion in fiscal 2005).

Walker recommends that Congress require agencies to report on how they ensure that contractors "are playing appropriate roles." He also urges Congress to ensure that agencies are adequately staffed to monitor contract costs and performance, particularly at critical times, such as hurricane response and the war in Iraq.

Â· Improving federal computer security to deter identity theft. Special attention needs to be paid to protecting Social Security numbers, including the methods used to issue and replace Social Security cards, Walker says.

Â· Transforming Defense Department business methods. Billions of dollars are wasted annually because of poor management decisions in such areas as weapons acquisition, supplies and technology, GAO studies have found.

Â· Assessing the progress of the government's largest recent merger -- the consolidation of 22 agencies into the Department of Homeland Security. Attention should be paid to the department's strategic planning capabilities and the steps being taken to improve border security, Walker recommends.

Â· Reviewing coordination and information-sharing in the intelligence community, focusing on the National Counterterrorism Center and the National Counterproliferation Center.

Â· Reorganizing the U.S. Postal Service, which is under increasing pressure from the Internet and competition from private delivery companies. That raises questions about whether the Postal Service "can remain a self-financing government provider of affordable universal postal services in the 21st century," according to Walker.

Â· Modernizing federal employee performance management and compensation systems. Congress should consider market-based, performance-oriented pay systems in government, based on a "show me" test that demonstrates employees will be treated fairly when their pay raises are tied to more rigorous job performance ratings.

Â· Examining the presidential appointment process. Congress needs to look at whether some political jobs require certain qualifications and experience, such as those involved in national and homeland security, and whether other political jobs need to be given independence from the White House to ensure professionalism and objectivity.

Walker, in his letter, says oversight hearings would help agencies share ideas for innovation while holding federal officials accountable for how they spend taxpayer dollars.

"This balanced approach is likely to help accelerate progress while avoiding a further erosion of the public's trust and confidence in government," Walker wrote.

Mr. Gates' Options (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, November 27, 2006

Bob Gates is all things to all people in Washington these days. To the hard-liners who want to preserve what's left of George W. Bush's policy in Iraq, Gates is an ardent patriot, a determined anticommunist who thought the Soviet Union was an evil empire, who backed aggressive measures against the Sandinistas in Nicaragua in the early 1980s--and who during the first Bush Administration sided most often with a Defense Secretary named Dick Cheney.

To the new realists, who want to tear up this Administration's failing bid to bring democracy to Iraq and replace it with a strategy for an exit, Gates is a secret ally, an agent of change who rocked the CIA he grew up in by shifting it out of covert action and into open-source programs at the cold war's end--and then became a reformist president of Texas A&M, tossing a beloved football coach and reducing admissions.

If Gates had been talking to reporters instead of preparing for his confirmation hearings next week to become Secretary of Defense, he would have found all this amusing, if not absurd. The man with the Kansas-flat voice and a weakness for hiking, hayrides and roller coasters would have got a kick out of saying that both sides are right--and that absolutely none of it matters.

That would be the analyst in Gates talking, the man who developed a reputation during more than 25 years at the CIA and White House for making cold calculations not only about the intelligence he was poring over but also about how to choose his allies as he zipped to the top ranks of the CIA in record time. Now in a late-inning gig that no one expected--least of all Gates--he is about to take over the Pentagon and the day-to-day responsibilities for a war gone bad. He brings to the task one advantage: he was a key member of the special commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana Representative Lee Hamilton that has been cooking up options for what to do next. Gates was involved in the military end of the commission's work--which means, says a colleague, that "not only will he understand the proposals, he will know the origins of them."

DOJ_NMG_0098052

The problem facing Gates is that the options being considered may already be obsolete. The conditions on the ground in Iraq are deteriorating so rapidly that even the Baker commission is struggling to keep up, several well-placed national-security sources told TIME. October was the deadliest month yet for Iraqi civilians since the start of the war, and November seems destined to surpass it. A Thanksgiving Day onslaught by Sunni militants killed more than 200 Iraqis, wounded hundreds and spurred a round of Shi'ite reprisals. As the Iraqi capital erupted in another frenzy of sectarian violence, the U.S. lost eight service members in a span of six days, bringing its death toll to nearly 2,900.

Although Baker has said the commission will develop its proposals by consensus, there were signs last week that the group had hit some speed bumps. Sources say renewed pressure from both political flanks in the U.S. is making it difficult for the commission's center to hold. Emboldened by their takeover of Congress, Democrats have sent unmistakable signals that they favor some movement, if not reduction, of forces at the earliest possible date. Meanwhile, present and former government officials say Vice President Cheney intends to oppose any proposal that would make regional talks with Iran or Syria a key part of the U.S.'s Iraq strategy, even though Baker favors such an opening. As the commission broke for Thanksgiving, the partisan pincer movement was beginning to provoke some talk of stalemate. "The impulse toward consensus has diminished somewhat," a close panel observer told TIME. "Everything that is happening--the election, the postelection, the situation in Baghdad--makes it more difficult."

Baker and Hamilton held dozens of listening sessions this summer and fall, but members for the most part were careful not to stake out their positions. With a tentative mid-December deadline just a couple of weeks away, the decision-making process is just beginning. Commission members, said a close adviser, "are just now trying to make sense of what they heard, what the choices are and who stands where on those choices." While a Baker-led deal is still a good bet, several sources said, the odds that the commission will be unable to provide a clear user's guide for cleaning up Iraq are narrowing. And that means Gates may need to sort out the options on his own.

So, what are they? No matter who is running the tabletop exercise, the choices are almost always the same. And practically the only thing everyone agrees on is that none are great. Here are the big four:

Get out fast. This option is the most tantalizing--and least likely--of all those under consideration by the armies of experts trying pick the Iraqi lock. While some Democrats, like Senator Barack Obama, have called on Bush to begin troop withdrawals within four to six months, there is almost no support for the idea within the Administration. The biggest problem is that the Iraqi army isn't ready to take over. U.S. Central Command boss John Abizaid told Congress two weeks ago that none of the Iraqi combat units are ready to operate independently of U.S. forces, and he says it will be a year to 18 months before the army is fully operational.

Without an army to keep the peace, a quick withdrawal would doom the country to chaos at best, and several years of violent civil war at worst. The balance of power inside Iraq is such that a withdrawal in the short term would strengthen the Administration's other nemesis in the region, Iran, at a time when Tehran is ignoring the world's objections and is suspected of steaming ahead with plans to build a nuclear bomb. "If the U.S. withdraws, Iran takes over," says Medhi al-Hafedh, one of Iraq's most respected politicians. "The Americans have to ask themselves if such an outcome is acceptable to them." So far, at least, the answer is no.

Surge forward. Among some active and retired generals, as well as some officers inside Baghdad's Green Zone, there is support for the idea of a temporary surge--boosting U.S. troops levels by 20,000 to 30,000 to stabilize the country. Under this plan, the extra U.S. forces would be deployed to try to quell the sectarian slaughter in Baghdad as well as subdue the jihadists of Anbar province. It is a step that, almost everyone agrees, should have been taken years ago.

The question is whether it is simply too late. There is, for starters, the zero-sum problem. Yes, the more troops we send, the more stability we can buy. But when the troops are withdrawn, instability will return. The second problem is logistics. The U.S. does not have the kinds of reserves that would allow it to beef up its Iraq forces for very long without a further decline in readiness, morale and troop retention. The Army's brigade combat teams are already ragged from fighting two wars; speeding their rotations back into battle would put some units at unacceptable risk. The new Marine Corps commandant said in effect last week he could not maintain the current "operating tempo" without increasing the corps' size--something the Bush Administration has opposed.

Even if the troops were available, there are formidable political barriers to sending them. The Democrats have made it clear that the idea is a nonstarter. While that sentiment could change if Baker and Hamilton support a surge, Abizaid has said he opposes more troops because it would discourage Iraqis from taking responsibility for their own security. "Iraqis will decide Iraq's future," says Major General William Caldwell, the top Army spokesman in Iraq. "Additional coalition troops may produce short-term effects, and we may execute that option, but they are not a long-term solution."

Train and retreat. Quietly gaining favor in military circles, this approach is designed to balance the need for more U.S. forces with a desire to decrease the rate of U.S. casualties. Here's how it would work in theory. First, Washington would boost the number of troops in Iraq and, more specifically, increase the number of G.I.s on military-training teams. The goal is to get the Iraqi army--which is beset by a weak officer corps, weapon shortages and an almost total inability to move around--ready to take over the country as the Americans start to pull out.

DOJ_NMG_0098053

If all goes as planned, the U.S. could reduce troops levels as much as 60% within a year. Even if that were possible, "train and retreat" still envisions leaving some 50,000 U.S. troops in Iraq for years. These forces would be dispersed into four or five large garrisons or cantonment zones, far from urban areas. While U.S. troops patrolled the perimeter and guarded against mortar attacks from outside, Iraqi recruits would be trained inside. "You train 'em up and push 'em out," says a well-placed Baker-commission source. "That's what's happening."

No one knows whether, with all the military trainers in the world, the Iraqis will ever be ready to take on the militias. But the plan has political advantages. It relieves some of the pressure for withdrawals but boosts the overall footprint temporarily. Abizaid told lawmakers he is considering the "repositioning of forces in different ways," something Bush has hinted at as well. "It's a face-saver," says a foreign policy expert who has been involved in the Baker commission from the start. "It says, Let's go in hard, and if we can't solve Baghdad, we're going in the other direction."

Dig in. Although the military and political establishments are desperate for a new approach in Iraq, it's also possible that little will change. If the Baker commission falters or political stalemate ensues after the group reports, the U.S. may well keep troop levels the same, continue training Iraqis--and hope for the best. Sticking it out is the preferred course not just of the Commander in Chief but also of many of the top generals who report to him. To them, Iraq remains a fight that can be won--as long as political support for the enterprise doesn't bottom out completely. "I believe in the mission," says Lieut. General Peter Chiarelli, commander of the coalition forces, who ends his second tour of duty in Iraq this month. "It is what it is, and it's not going to lend itself to a timetable."

It is difficult to say where Gates willÂ come down among these options. His years working for Bush's father can be read two ways. Gates often took the hardest line in internal debates about how to manage the end of the cold war, pushing for radical change when the President; his top adviser, Brent Scowcroft; and Baker, then Secretary of State, favored more moderate steps. As the U.S.S.R. teetered on the brink of collapse, Gates (along with Cheney) usually argued for the fastest route to bring it about. They almost always lost out to Baker and Scowcroft, who argued that the Gates-Cheney approach was bad policy and worse politics. Gates can be bold, but bold isn't always wise.

That instinct helps explain why Gates thinks of himself as a transformational leader. After the CIA missed the fall of the Soviet Union, Gates launched reforms of 14 parts of the agency's operations, from analysis to satellite imagery to language study. Although not all these reforms bore fruit, CIA spending on Soviet collection and analysis shrank from 60% of its budget to less than 15%. Gates tried the same thing at Texas A&M, a school with an almost stubborn resistance to change--ending admissions preference for children of alumni, hiring hundreds of new faculty members and firing veteran football coach R.C. Slocum.

Still, compared with what waits for Gates, those challenges were small. He will probably follow Baker's lead in emphasizing regional diplomacy and will support any commission proposal to open direct talks with Damascus and Tehran. But that will immediately put him at odds with Cheney. One who has worked at Gates' side says the old analyst in Gates will overrule the old ideologue. "He knows that you cannot solve this problem within the four corners of the country," said this former hand. "It's going to take a regional approach. I don't think he's going to look for the most graceful way to exit. That won't be his approach."

The last time Gates faced a confirmation hearing, he took his son Brad to the Blue Ridge Mountains for a weekend of camping. He said later that was "better preparation for the battle that was about to begin" than anything else he could have done. But the battles he faces now are more likely to be with his new bosses at the White House--and perhaps with his own instincts. The Bush team has only a limited amount of time to decide what to do about Iraq. Sooner rather than later, Bob Gates will cease being all things to all people. With reporting by With reporting by Mike Allen, SALLY B. DONNELLY, Elaine Shannon, MARK THOMPSON, Douglas Waller / Washington, Aparisim Ghosh, Mark Kukis / Baghdad

Getting Out (USNEWS)

By Linda Robinson

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

James A. Baker III delights in delivering the long-ball play. In his newly released memoir, he describes the "sweet payoff" of getting Syria and other recalcitrant Arab nations to attend the 1991 Madrid peace conference. After putting together a broad Arab and international coalition to wage the first Gulf War, Baker, secretary of state for President George H.W. Bush, wanted to "capitalize on the momentum of this first-ever experience with regional cooperation in the Middle East." In many ways, Baker is taking up old business again today in his job as cochair of the Iraq Study Group that is soon to present its formula for stopping the bleeding from the sucking chest wound that the Iraq war has become.

DOJ_NMG_0098054

The difficulties are even more daunting this time as violence threatens to spiral out of control. The Iraq Study Group--10 former cabinet officials, senators, counselors, and retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor--is evenly divided between Democrats and Republicans and is "at loggerheads" in its deliberations, says a Baker aide. But Baker and his cochair, longtime Democratic legislator Lee Hamilton, remain committed to reaching a bipartisan consensus on their recommendations to find a way to end the 3 ÃÂƒÂÂƒÃÂ‚ÂÂ‚ÃÂƒÂÂ‚ÃÂ‚Â½-year-old war that has cost nearly 3,000 American lives and taken tens of thousands of Iraqi lives. President Bush has said he looks forward to the group's report, and he has launched his own review of Iraq policy. The Pentagon is also conducting a review of its military options.

The debate over Iraq has spawned a welter of proposals for new policies, but something like a consensus position has begun to emerge on some key issues, including the need for a political settlement and diplomatic overtures to Iraq's neighbors. On the hot-button issue of U.S. troop levels, however--whether, when, and how many should be withdrawn from Iraq--sharp disagreement remains. Yet even there, a middle-ground position might be fashioned to win support from moderates on both sides of the aisle and from the White House. With a new Iraq policy, almost inevitably, will come new faces. The Pentagon is getting a new boss, and replacements for the U.S. ambassador and top military commander in Iraq are being discussed. Even with a new policy, however, one sober-minded former U.S. official cautions, "it may be too late for any strategy to work."

If the Baker group fails, it won't be for lack of trying. For the past six months, dozens of academic experts provided proposals and analysis to the group. The experts lined up behind two main options and wrote papers titled "Stability First" and "Redeploy and Contain." According to experts interviewed by U.S. News, the former paper called for a focus on stabilizing Baghdad and an effort to reach an accommodation with the insurgents rather than defeating them. The latter favored withdrawing U.S. troops on a timetable and taking military and diplomatic steps to contain Iraq's violence within its borders.

When word of the two papers leaked, Baker and Hamilton reacted immediately. The experts were cut out of the loop and thereafter used as a resource to provide further information to commissioners in writing. Baker, who had been out promoting his memoir, stopped granting interviews. The rest of the panel also stopped talking to the press. The cochairs and their aides wrote their own draft report and guarded its contents closely. Nonetheless, in several dozen interviews, U.S. News has pieced together this account of the group's deliberations, the evolving search for an alternative policy, and the administration's response to the mounting pressure for an exit strategy.

Why We Need To Talk To Iran (TIME)

By Walter Isaacson

Time, November 27, 2006

Iran last week decided to play power broker. It invitedÂ Iraq's President to visit Tehran to discuss regional stability, and it sought to bring Syria into the process as well. This was not greeted with glee in Washington. But it should have been. One of America's top strategic interests is to get Iran to behave less like a revolutionary cauldron and more like a traditional nation-state. For the mullahs and their mad President to express a desire for a stable neighborhood is a good first step.

Step two should involve the U.S. talking, directly and seriously, to Iran. Our current conceit, which is that Iran should be denied the honor of our direct discourse until it suspends its nuclear-enrichment programs, hurts us more than it hurts Iran. For 27 years we have relied on unilateral sanctions and diplomatic chilliness to persuade Iran to moderate its behavior and forsake its nuclear ambitions. That hasn't exactly worked.

Direct talks with Iran will not persuade it to abandon its nuclear dreams right away. Even the slightly saner predecessors of President Ahmadinejad surreptitiously proceeded down the nuclear path despite pledges to do otherwise. Given Persia's precarious location and imperial impulses, I dare say that even our late unlamented friend the Shah was and would be doing the same.

When a problem is for the moment unsolvable, then enlarge it. (O.K., this is a Donald Rumsfeld maxim, but that doesn't make it inoperative.) One precedent is the opening to China negotiated by Henry Kissinger, which did not try to settle such intractable issues as the status of Taiwan but instead created a framework for a realistic long-term relationship involving both cooperation and contention.

Talks with Tehran should begin, without preconditions, by discussing such a framework while getting Iran involved in keeping the chaos in Iraq from ripping apart the region, just as Iran helped stabilize Afghanistan after the defeat of our mutual enemy the Taliban. We should then permit commercial deals with Iran's small private sector, which could build a middle-class constituency for stability and greater integration into the world economy. Who knows? Perhaps this could even lead to accession talks with the World Trade Organization. In the process, Iranians will see more clearly the benefits of being treated as a responsible global player. Only then might we have enough leverage to convince the nation's leaders that there's a downside to flouting the world on the nuclear issue.

DOJ_NMG_0098055

President Ahmadinejad has the advantage of looking like a poet, sounding like a lunatic and not caring whether the West likes him. But Iran has multiple power centers. There's an election next month, for example, in which a reformist former President is challenging a fundamentalist cleric to join the Assembly of Experts that oversees Supreme Leader Ayatullah Ali Khamenei. About 70% of the population is under 30, and there are at least 70,000 active blogs expressing all sorts of aspirations of a diverse people, including ones by the President (ahmadinejad.ir) and Supreme Leader (khamenei.ir).

That is why, in addition to government talks, it's useful to have informal contacts with the Iranian people. I was with President Bush in New Orleans a month ago, and he got to talking about the ravings of Ahmadinejad, but he knows not to personify relations the way he once did with Russia's Vladimir Putin. That is why he has called for, and Congress has funded, citizen exchanges with Iran. A delegation of health experts from Iran, whose AIDS program is one of the best in the region, will soon visit the U.S. under the auspices of the State Department's international visitors program and the Aspen Institute, where I work.

Engagement with Iran should be done in partnership with our allies in the region, namely Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. They can help keep the Iranians (and Syrians) in check and look after Sunni interests. That requires one other ingredient: reigniting efforts to reach an Israeli-Palestinian peace, if and when the Palestinians form a new government willing to deal with Israel. The Israelis understand this; Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has informally talked to the Saudis about relaunching their Arab peace plan.

Who best to choreograph all this? Jim Baker. The Iraq Study Group, which he chairs with Lee Hamilton, plans to recommend a process along these lines, and his associates say that Baker would be willing to help implement it as a special envoy if the President offers him enough authority. That might be resisted by Elliott Abrams, the National Security Council staffer who coordinates Middle East policy, and Baker would not accept the job unless this is resolved. But Condoleezza Rice, who has pushed for a comprehensive diplomatic approach to the region, might be supportive, even enthusiastic. She knows that the Administration needs to salvage a foreign policy legacy beyond the botched war in Iraq.

Writings Reveal Cautious Gates (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates in the past decade opposed big changes at the CIA in the face of terror attacks and expressed doubt that Washington could assemble an alliance of nations against al Qaeda.

His writings, mostly in the op-ed pages of the New York Times, also revealed a former CIA director who was protective of the agency and opposed to intelligence inroads by the Pentagon at the behest of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. He opposed creating a budget line for the White House Office of Homeland Defense after al Qaeda's September 11 attacks on the United States.

The writings show Mr. Gates to be more cautious and pragmatic than his predecessor, Mr. Rumsfeld, who has transformed the military and aggressively hunted al Qaeda members.

The Senate Armed Services Committee convenes confirmation hearings on Mr. Gates next week. The central questioning promises to focus on how Mr. Gates will change policy in Iraq. The bogged-down war is the reason President Bush nudged Mr. Rumsfeld aside after six years and turned to the Texas A&M University president for a "fresh perspective."

A sample of Mr. Gates' views after leaving Washington in 1993:

· He advocated military action against Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in 1997 after his regime continued to block U.N. inspectors.

"Surely, we know now that force is the only thing Mr. Hussein understands," Mr. Gates wrote in the New York Times, a frequent venue for his opinions. "We have known since 1990 that faintheartedness disguised as reasonableness in dealing with him is an invitation to further depredations." The next year, President Clinton ordered five days of bombings against suspected weapons sites.

· After al Qaeda bombed two American embassies in East Africa in 1998, Mr. Gates warned against a transformation of counterterror agencies, including the CIA.

"The great deficiency in American counterterrorism efforts in the summer of 1998 is not strictures against assassination, nor inadequacies in intelligence and law enforcement," he wrote in the New York Times. "The deficiency is political and strategic."

He added, "In truth, Americans can take pride in already existing C.I.A. and F.B.I. counterterrorism capabilities."

After the September 11 attacks, congressional and independent inquiries found widespread inadequacies in intelligence collection and analysis.

DOJ_NMG_0098056

· In the same 1998 New York Times piece, Mr. Gates doubted other nations would join the U.S. in a violent retaliation against terrorists.

"Another unacknowledged and unpleasant reality is that a more militant approach toward terrorism would, in virtually all cases, require us to act violently and alone," he wrote. "No other power will join us in a crusade against terrorism -- in fact, some 'friendly' governments protect their countries against terrorism by cutting deals with the groups, allowing them operational freedom."

The Bush administration contends it has arrayed a long list of allies for fighting al Qaeda, including most European nations as well as predominantly Muslim countries, such as Pakistan.

· A month after the September 11 attacks, he wrote in the New York Times that he opposed giving the homeland security office its own budget. Congress went a lot further, creating a new Cabinet post, with a budget and thousands of employees.

"Some in the executive branch suggest that the office be given its own special budget line," Mr. Gates wrote. "As a veteran of interagency warfare under six presidents, I believe this wouldn't work."

· In May 2006, he wrote an op-ed in The Washington Post in which he criticized Mr. Rumsfeld's initiatives to get the military more involved in intelligence. "More than a few CIA veterans -- including me -- are unhappy about the dominance of the Defense Department in the intelligence arena and the decline in the CIA's central role," Mr. Gates wrote.

Mr. Gates, a career CIA analyst who rose to be its director under the administration of the first President Bush, was so protective of the agency that he opposed Congress' decision to create a director for national intelligence, who now oversees the CIA.

"I publicly opposed the establishment of the DNI position," he wrote. "But the change has been made, and we who were in the CIA during its halcyon days must adjust to a new world."

New perspectives on Iraq are already coming from what could be competing ideas on Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, Indiana Democrat, is due to meet this week to discuss the first draft of a report on Iraq options. But at the same time, the Pentagon is doing its own separate review culminating in Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, making proposals to the president.

Defense: The Pentagon Handoff (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - It's "The Long Goodbye"—Pentagon style. Donald Rumsfeld's successor as Defense secretary, Robert Gates, is due to have his confirmation hearing in early December—a process Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada predicted would be swift. "We want the change to take place very quickly," Reid said.

Not so quickly, after all. A White House spokesperson confirms that Gates will be sworn in as the new Defense secretary "in the new year," a good two weeks after his confirmation. According to the White House, Gates needs extra time to wind up affairs as president of Texas A&M University. But that's news in College Station, Texas, where Gates has been handing everything over to the man he calls "my strong right arm," the executive vice president and provost, David Pratt. Gates has publicly announced that he will quit A&M on "completion of the confirmation process and a Senate vote."

The mixed messages have fueled speculation over the delayed departure. One source close to the White House, who spoke anonymously in order to keep his job, believes President George W. Bush has decided to wait until after Dec. 29 "as a personal gesture to Rumsfeld." On that date Rumsfeld would become the longest-serving Defense secretary, beating Robert McNamara's record of 85 months. At the Pentagon, a senior official who admits that he doesn't know "what the president's intentions are" insists that Rumsfeld pays no heed to such things. "I know the secretary has said he thinks Mr. Gates ought to be sworn in as soon as possible after he is confirmed, and that they should not wait for some arbitrary date on his behalf," he says, speaking anonymously due to the sensitivity of White House matters.

Elliott Abrams: The Last Neocon Standing (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Dan Ephron

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - It's been a rough season for neoconservatives, the group that has dominated U.S. foreign policy since the attacks of September 11. They've been largely run out of the Bush administration, beset by infighting, and mocked by a foreign-policy establishment that hailed their power just a few years ago. Last month was particularly brutal. They looked on helplessly as Democrats took both houses of Congress. They had to grit their teeth when President Bush met with Washington dealmakers James Baker and Lee Hamilton, whose bipartisan group is charged with extricating America from the mess the neocon-influenced policy created in Iraq. Then, insult to injury: they watched their cold-war nemesis in Central America circa 1986, Daniel Ortega, rise again to be president of Nicaragua.

The neocons are reeling, but they're not dead yet. A few stalwarts are digging in their wing-tips. And there's already a small backlash against the backlash. At the State Department, supposedly the bastion of realism, some officials are sounding defiant. "There are a lot of people throughout the ranks who believe in the democracy agenda," says one senior official who would only discuss policy issues anonymously. "If the result of the Baker report is that we have to make any deal necessary ... to get out of Iraq, I don't think that's going to fly." Their hopes, and the hopes of neocons everywhere, may rest on the shoulders of Elliott Abrams, the number-two official at the National Security Council—who remains in charge of promoting democracy in the Middle East, a linchpin of the neocon agenda.

Abrams, who declined an interview request from NEWSWEEK, has his work cut out for him. A Harvard-trained lawyer, Abrams handles the Middle East, though not Iraq. Earlier this year, Abrams pushed for an $85 million expansion of TV and radio programming beamed into Iran to gently promote regime change. Now, toppling the mullahs might be off the table. The same goes for the policy of pushing reforms on Arab allies like Egypt's Hosni Mubarak, who has kept a key opposition figure in jail for more than 11 months and scaled back rights. Michael Gerson, who served until recently as Bush's speechwriter (and who is now a NEWSWEEK contributor), says Abrams must be troubled by the swing. "People who support the democracy agenda are deeply concerned that Mubarak is significantly backtracking," Gerson says. And Abrams has to cope with the fallout of his push for Palestinian elections—the rise of Hamas, and the breakdown of the peace process. But Abrams has one powerful advantage. "Bush has enormous regard for him," says a senior administration official who would not speak about their relationship on the record. "One, because he knows Elliott is keeper of the flame. And also, he's the only one who doesn't draw any attention to himself." (Abrams has been somewhat press-shy ever since he admitted to withholding information from Congress about the Iran-contra affair two decades ago; he was later pardoned.)

The biggest dogfight is still ahead: whether to cut a deal with regimes like Iran, North Korea and Syria. Bush's approach has been to counter threats from oppressive regimes by trying to change them. Bill Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard and the punditocracy's best-known neocon, says it's hard to imagine the president turning his back on all that. "I think Bush is the last neocon in power," he says. "The truth is, it was always Bush."

Kristol acknowledges the neoconservatives are turn-ing on each other. Francis Fukuyama, the "End of History" sage, has broken with the neocons publicly and believes that they are discredited. Richard Perle, the former Pentagon adviser, now says he probably wouldn't have invaded Iraq at all (Perle refused to talk to NEWSWEEK). Kristol dismisses what he calls the "confessional mode" of his old friend Perle. But Kristol also believes the infighting is natural. "Every intellectual group, every political group, goes through a period of mini crackup and reassembles in slightly different ways," he told NEWSWEEK. "For a group that's discredited, an awful lot of people are spending an awful lot of time discrediting us." Kristol's allies are looking to Abrams to pick up the pieces.

Back To The Future (USNEWS)

By Fouad Ajami

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

The sin of George W. Bush, to hear his critics tell it, is that he unleashed the forces of freedom in Arab-Islamic lands only to beget a terrible storm. In Iraq and in Lebanon, the furies of sectarianism are on the loose; and in that greater Middle East stretching from Pakistan to Morocco, the forces of freedom and reform appear chastened. Autocracy is fashionable once again, and that bet on freedom made in the aftermath of the American venture into Iraq now seems, to the skeptics, fatally compromised. For decades, we had lived with Arab autocracies, befriended them, taken their rule as the age-old dominion in lands unfit for freedom. Then came this Wilsonian moment proclaimed in the course of the war on Iraq. To the "realists," it had been naive and foolhardy to hold out to the Arabs the promise of freedom. We had bet on the Cedar Revolution in Lebanon, thrilled to these young people in Beirut's plazas reclaiming their country from Syrian tyranny. But that promise, too, has been battered, and in the shadows, the old policy of ceding Lebanon to the rule of Syria's informers and policemen now claims a measure of vindication. On the surface of things, it is the moment of the "realists," then: They speak with greater confidence. The world had lived down, as it were, to their expectations. And now they wish to return history to its old rhythm.

But in truth there can be no return to the bosom of the old order. American power and the very force of what had played out in the Arab-Islamic lands in recent years have rendered the old order hollow, mocked its claims to primacy and coherence. The moment our soldiers flushed Saddam Hussein from his filthy spider hole, we had put on display the farce and swindle of Arab authority.

Primacy and power. We can't shy away from the very history we unleashed. We had demonstrated to the Arabs that the rulers are not deities; we had given birth to the principle of political accountability. In the same vein, we may not be comfortable with all the manifestations of an emancipated Arab Shiism--we recoil, as we should, from the Mahdi Army in Iraq and from Hezbollah's Hassan Nasrallah in Beirut--but the Shiite stepchildren of the Arab world have been given a new claim on the Arab political order of primacy and power. In the annals of Arab history, this is nothing short of revolutionary. The Sunni Arab regimes have a dread of the emancipation of the Shiites. But American power is under no obligation to protect their phobias and privileges. History has served notice on their world and their biases. We can't fall for their legends, and we ought to remember that the road to all these perditions, and the terrors of 9/11, had led through Sunni movements that originated in Egypt and Saudi Arabia. Terror and ruin can come in Sunni and Shiite drapings alike.

DOJ_NMG_0098058

It was not naive idealism, it should be recalled, that gave birth to Bush's diplomacy of freedom. That diplomacy issued out of a reading of the Arab-Muslim political condition and of America's vulnerability to the disorder of Arab politics. The ruling regimes in the region had displaced their troubles onto America; their stability had come at America's expense, as the scapegoating and the anti-Americanism had poisoned Arab political life. Iraq and the struggle for a decent polity in it had been America's way of trying to extirpate these Arab troubles. The American project in Iraq has been unimaginably difficult, its heartbreak a grim daily affair. But the impulse that gave rise to the war was shrewd and justified.

Nowadays, more and more people despair of the Iraq venture. And voices could be heard counseling that the matter of Iraq is, for all practical purposes, sealed and that failure is around the corner. Now and then, the memory of the Vietnam War is summoned. America had lost the battle for Vietnam but had won the war for East Asia. That American defeat had brought ruin to Vietnam and Cambodia, but the systems of political and economic freedom in Asia had held, and the region had cushioned the American defeat, and left a huge protective role for American power. Fair enough: There was Japan in East Asia, providing political anchorage and an example of economic success. There is no Japan in that arc of trouble in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf. Saudi Arabia and Egypt are poor pillars, themselves prey to forces of radicalism--the first weak in the scales of military power, the second a brittle, crowded land with immense troubles of its own. That overall strategic landscape, too, should be considered as we debate and anguish over Iraq.

Reign Clouds (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Air Force One was briefly grounded in Ho Chi Minh City last week because of a brake malfunction-not the most auspicious way for President Bush to end his first trip to Vietnam. But to many in Washington, the metaphor of a presidency stuck in place had a telling ring of truth.

The problem is that, in one area after another, Bush appears to be bogged down with no clear path out of the political swamp. The feisty new Democratic majority in Congress is preparing to challenge him on everything from Iraq policy to the minimum wage, and many Republicans are setting their own course as Bush's job-approval ratings hover below 40 percent.

To be sure, Bush isn't quite a lame duck. He plans to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan this week to bolster the Baghdad government and perhaps generate some good news, and his aides are casting about for fresh ideas to rejuvenate the president's second term. But many in official Washington and around the world are ready to turn a page on the Bush presidency. His trip to Asia last week didn't accomplish much of substance. And, to the chagrin of White House officials, his visit to Vietnam generated a rash of news stories comparing the Iraq war to America's quagmire in Southeast Asia three decades ago.

As usual, Iraq is Job 1. But as sectarian violence spreads, two developments further unsettled U.S. policymakers last week. Syria re-established diplomatic relations with Iraq, even as the Bush administration accused the Damascus regime of fueling the Iraqi insurgency. And the Shiite-dominated government of Iran-once described by Bush as part of an "axis of evil"-offered to help "stabilize" Iraq by convening an international conference. This came as the Bush administration was trying to isolate Tehran because of its growing nuclear program. If nothing else, these moves showed that the Mideast remains a complicated region, often resistant to U.S. influences. And all this comes as the new Democratic majority in Congress prepares hearings into Iraq policy early next year, as the Pentagon formally reviews its options, as the bipartisan Iraq Study Group readies its own report, and as incoming Defense Secretary Robert Gates tries to find a way out of the morass.

Assault. Bush's approach--which he framed last week as "We'll succeed unless we quit"--is now under assault as never before, even among senior Republicans. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a hawk on Iraq and a front-runner for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, says he still favors sending thousands more troops into the war zone in one last attempt to stabilize the country. But McCain now concedes that the war as it is being fought is unwinnable. Even former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who advocated nothing short of victory, has changed his tune. Kissinger, an architect of the Vietnam policies under Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford, said the goal as envisioned by President Bush--creation of a democratic government without sectarian warfare--is no longer achievable.

The Pentagon's internal review apparently involves three options, none of which the president was willing to consider a year ago: "go big" with a large infusion of U.S. troops, perhaps tens of thousands, to win the conflict outright; "go long" with a modest addition of 20,000 to 30,000 troops to improve training of the Iraqis while continuing a lengthy American occupation; and, finally, "go home." Bush said he hasn't decided future troop levels.

DOJ_NMG_0098059

History Offers Post-Midterm Survival Tips For President (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

The president was in a funk. Morose from midterm elections that handed Congress to the opposition, he stewed in private, vented to friends, turned on aides and summoned self-help gurus to help him understand just what went wrong. He was left to argue with reporters that he was still "relevant."

It took Bill Clinton months to get his feet planted again after the 1994 defeat. But he did recover and went on to win reelection two years later. So too did Ronald Reagan bounce back from the 1986 midterm elections, which cost his party the Senate. As President Bush struggles to recover from a similar thrashing, his advisers are studying the Clinton and Reagan models for lessons to revive his presidency.

Historical comparisons are always fraught with peril, since each president faces his own distinct challenges and brings unique faculties and flaws to the task. But veterans of past administrations see patterns that offer hope even to badly weakened presidents such as Bush. Adversaries who assume that Bush has been permanently crippled by the Democratic takeover of Congress, they say, misunderstand the opportunities still available to him.

Both Reagan and Clinton found that the power of the bully pulpit still gave them an advantage over a Congress controlled by the other party. Both Reagan and Clinton used a mix of cooperation and confrontation, moving to the middle on selected issues to pass legislation while standing firm on others that touched on core principles. Both pounced when the other side overreached.

Whether Bush could emulate those examples is an open question. He points to his time as Texas governor, when he worked with Democratic legislators. But since winning the White House, he has only sporadically reached out to the other side. And unlike Reagan or Clinton, he presides over an unpopular war with no end in sight.

"He really has to make a fundamental decision, and if he hasn't made it by now, it may be too late," said Leon E. Panetta, who was Clinton's chief of staff in 1994 and now serves on a bipartisan commission on Iraq. "He has to decide whether he's going to be willing to sit down with the Democratic leadership and cut deals and get things done. And he has to decide whether Iraq is going to be his whole legacy, good or bad, or whether he wants to get other things done."

Bush's opening message since the election has been one of conciliation, in firing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, as many critics had urged, and in reaching out to incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.). "Let's let the election go," White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove said in a recent interview. "Let's say, 'Okay, where are some places where we can work together?' "

At the same time, Bush may wait for the right moment to take on Democrats. He has issued only one veto in six years in office but would be eager to veto Democratic spending bills. "The question is if they want to test him on the veto," said a senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss strategy. "If I were them, I wouldn't. If they're trying to present themselves as the party of fiscal discipline," it would be a mistake to let a spending bill be vetoed.

Another senior official said Reagan and Clinton showed that carefully choosing battles is a fruitful strategy after a midterm defeat. "The broad lesson is that presidents can come back from setbacks," he said. "There are some things you control and some things you can't control, and you have to try to take advantage of both."

While Democrats controlled the House throughout Reagan's presidency, Republicans held the Senate for six years, and the 1986 loss was a sharp blow. Even worse, it was followed by revelations that the White House sold arms to Iran to gain the release of hostages and diverted some proceeds to contra rebels in Nicaragua. "The president was very down," recalled John C. Tuck, an aide at the time. Reagan's approval rating plummeted. "It was south, south, south in the spring of '87. It was scary south, and it wasn't improving," Tuck said.

Reagan dumped Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan and brought in former senator Howard H. Baker Jr. (R-Tenn.) and deputy Kenneth Duberstein. Baker insisted on a new agenda for Reagan -- any agenda -- to allow him to seize the initiative again.

Reagan accommodated congressional Democrats. "I don't think Reagan consciously said, 'I've got to become more moderate,' but the goals became different," said Frank J. Donatelli, his White House political director. "I don't think there was any thought after '87 that we were going to get any new major conservative social legislation through."

Reagan turned his attention overseas, and overtures to Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev led to a thaw in the Cold War and a major arms-control treaty. By 1988, Reagan was ready to challenge Congress, showing up at his State of the Union address with 3,300 pages in budget bills and vowing to veto any more like them. He left office with his popularity, and presidency, resurrected. "There's no question Reagan was buried by a lot of people," Donatelli said, "and it's pretty remarkable where he was a year and a half later."

DOJ_NMG_0098060

Clinton's trial by ballot box came earlier in his tenure and sent him into a tailspin. "He really took it very personally," said Harold Ickes, who was his deputy chief of staff.

Not only did Clinton seek out self-help experts, he reopened a secret channel to an old adviser, Dick Morris, without telling his aides. He groped for a strategy as new Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) dominated Washington. Five months after the election, Clinton was still on his heels, insisting at a news conference that "the Constitution gives me relevance."

If that was the low point, the recovery arguably began the next day. After a federal building was bombed in Oklahoma City, Clinton gave voice to the nation's grief and resolve, serving as chaplain-in-chief. "In my view, he really became the president at that point," Ickes said. "He really struck a chord with the country that crossed party lines."

His confidence restored, Clinton began to maneuver with Gingrich, reaching a handshake deal in New Hampshire to review campaign finance and lobbying rules. Clinton wanted a budget deal, too, but Gingrich rejected him. Finally, Clinton called his bluff and the government briefly shut down. Clinton ended up looking strong again, while Gingrich was hurt by his complaints that he was made to disembark from Air Force One from the rear.

"That was a real turnaround for Bill Clinton," Panetta said. "Not only did it send the message to the American people about the real differences . . . but it gave him real momentum to move into the reelection effort." Clinton hit the campaign trail and crushed GOP Sen. Robert J. Dole (Kan.) to win a second term.

In the weeks since the Nov. 7 elections, Bush has already started down the paths forged by Reagan and Clinton. Just as Reagan fired Regan, Bush deferred to the Washington elite by ousting Rumsfeld and choosing Establishment favorite Robert M. Gates to replace him. He has left town to focus on foreign policy; he just got back from Asia and leaves today for Europe and the Middle East. By design or happenstance, he will have slept in the White House just 10 nights out of the first 25 after the elections.

Like Clinton, he has identified issues on which he thinks he can meet the opposition in the middle, including the minimum wage, education, immigration, energy and lobbying. But Bush has also signaled that he will fight over issues such as judicial nominations.

"Clinton had an imperative in '96 to get reelected," said Steve Elmendorf, a top House Democratic strategist at the time. "Bush, his imperative is more about his legacy. That gives him more running room to move to the center if he wants to and leave his party behind, because he doesn't have to run for reelection."

And yes, the Constitution gives him relevance. Now Bush's future depends on how he uses it. "You can never underestimate the power of the presidency because the president has the bully pulpit," said former representative Robert S. Walker (R-Pa.), a Gingrich ally. "And no matter how powerful you are on Capitol Hill, you can't really match that."

New Congress Unlikely To Rush Toughest Issues (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

Democratic lawmakers vow to come roaring out of the blocks when they assume control of the next Congress, passing several top-priority bills in the first 100 hours. Absent from that list, however, are the knottiest problems that bedeviled the outgoing Congress, including immigration, domestic surveillance and the war in Iraq.

Voters handed Democrats a mandate for change on Nov. 7, politicians and analysts agree. But party leaders are drawing a sharp distinction between popular, comparatively simple issues, such as raising the minimum wage, and more complex matters for which they have yet to propose solutions or even outline a plan for hearings.

The go-slow strategy carries some risks, the analysts say, because restless voters may see the new Congress as having no more boldness or problem-solving skills than the "do-nothing Congress" denounced in many political ads this fall. But Democratic leaders probably are correct in sensing that Americans will give them several months to tackle the stickiest issues, such as Iraq and immigration, provided something is done before the next election, these observers said.

Moving deliberately and cautiously on difficult issues "is a reasonable game plan," said Norman J. Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, co-author of the book "The Broken Branch," a critical assessment of Congress. "You've got to come in and signal that you're about change," he said, but "you also want to show that you have your own agenda."

Congressional Democrats seem to be following that strategy with their plan for the 110th Congress's first 100 hours. The items include raising the minimum wage, enacting the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations, cutting interest rates on college loans and ending what the speaker-elect called "tax giveaways for Big Oil."

All those goals appear simpler than unraveling the nation's most contentious issues, chief among them Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0098061

"I think the Democrats are right to proceed cautiously on issues they cannot possibly resolve on their own," said Thomas E. Mann of the Brookings Institution. "The public wants a change of course in Iraq but is far from settling on a clear alternative."

Congressional hearings, debates and reports are needed as a means of "leveraging public unhappiness and expert opinion to put enormous pressure on the president for a change of course in Iraq," said Mann, co-author of "The Broken Branch."

The Democrats' "Six for '06" campaign agenda included proposals for Iraq, but only in general terms. "Require the Iraqis to take responsibility for their country," it stated, "and begin the phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq in 2006." Party insiders said top Democrats are unlikely to make more specific proposals until next month's scheduled release of findings by the Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III.

Immigration is another area in which Democrats are proceeding cautiously even though the Nov. 7 elections appeared to remove a major roadblock. The current Congress reached an impasse on illegal immigration, with the House Republican majority insisting on an approach that strongly emphasizes enforcement, while a bipartisan Senate group -- backed by President Bush -- sought broader changes, including guest-worker programs and pathways to legal status for illegal workers.

With Democrats poised to take over both houses -- and Bush in office for two more years -- the Senate approach would seem to have momentum. But party leaders have made no promises about when or how they might move an immigration package, which would involve at least five House committees. Moreover, it is clear that the election did not eliminate the nation's deep divisions over what to do about illegal immigrants.

"The elections definitely have raised expectations in immigrant communities that real reform is possible," said Josh Bernstein of the National Immigration Law Center, which supports broad-based changes to help illegal workers. "But it's still too early to say whether that will translate into actual legislation."

A major rewrite of immigration laws "is enormously complicated," Bernstein said, "and has deep effects on our economy, our identity, the kind of country we're going to be. There are a lot of interests that are very legitimate, whether it's business, worker unions or immigrants from different countries. . . . It's highly emotionally charged on all sides."

Congressional Democrats also are moving carefully on Bush's policy of allowing the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without obtaining warrants on communications between the United States and abroad in the name of combating terrorism. Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), who will chair the Senate intelligence committee, recently said he will have the panel sift through information and arguments before taking any legislative steps.

"We must insist on full access to the NSA warrantless surveillance program and the CIA detention and interrogation program," Rockefeller said. "Only then can we conduct thorough oversight of these programs and determine whether they are legal, appropriate and effective and what, if any, legislative action must be taken."

But Rockefeller is not ready to schedule hearings, draw up witness lists or indicate who might be subpoenaed, said his spokeswoman, Wendy Morigi. "We're not there yet," she said.

"There is a frustration level" about the lack of information provided by the administration to the Republican-led 109th Congress, Morigi said, adding that in the next Congress, "you'll see a much greater push for information."

But she indicated it will be consistent with the step-by-step, deliberative approach that congressional Democrats -- though flush with victory -- are adopting for the nation's most difficult issues.

Ex-agents OK Guest-worker Plan (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

The National Association of Former Border Patrol Agents says it could support a guest-worker program to let foreigners work in the U.S., if the program is limited, tightly controlled and available only to those aliens who have entered the country legally.

"We support a guest-worker program in principle, believing it can serve the national interest," said Kent Lundgren, the association's coordinator. "However, we also believe guest workers must be limited in what they may do, what they may benefit from under immigration law, and the program must be tightly controlled.

"No alien in any illegal status should be allowed to participate," said Mr. Lundgren, a former Border Patrol assistant chief. "Application for the program must take place outside the United States, and the applicant must remain outside the country while the application is pending."

Mr. Lundgren, in a telephone interview, called immigration reform "an issue that arises periodically in the national consciousness" but said Congress and the White House are attempting to pass reform efforts that have failed in the past.

His organization has circulated a position paper signed by 250 former Border Patrol senior executives, supervisors and field agents, saying that while prior efforts at reforming immigration law -- including the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 that granted amnesty to 2.7 million illegal aliens -- "may have changed immigration for this country, it neither reformed nor controlled it.

DOJ_NMG_0098062

"It appears there is a move under way to saddle the nation once again with law containing the same flaws found in the 1986 act, but now on scale unimagined at that time," he said. "We believe the result for the nation will be disastrous if anything is passed that resembles what has been under debate in the Senate.

"The nation has made demonstrable mistakes in the past in its efforts to control immigration," he said. "Let us, who were there to see them, remind the nation of the outcome and make suggestions for change."

President Bush pledged earlier this month to join with Democrats to pass an immigration bill with a guest-worker program his own party blocked this year. His Republican opponents say they cannot stop such a bill from passing.

The Senate passed a broad immigration bill that included a guest-worker program and citizenship rights for some of the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens now in the United States. House Republicans blocked the bill, calling it an offer of amnesty. Instead, they forced through a bill to erect 698 miles of fences along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Several veteran law-enforcement authorities, including immigration agents and inspectors, have told The Washington Times that passage of a guest-worker or amnesty program will open the country to an even greater flood of illegal aliens than the 1986 law did.

That law, in addition to granting legal status to 2.7 million illegal aliens, paved the way for hundreds of thousands of their relatives to join them. Although the law contained increased enforcement and sanctions aimed at ending illegal immigration, the illegal alien population in the U.S. today has been estimated at more than quadruple the 1986 total.

In its position paper, the association said:

·Aliens now in the United States must be here with permission or they should leave or be removed. It said that can be achieved only by securing the borders and passing legislation establishing "meaningful processes" for the screening of those who wish to enter legally.

·It "absolutely opposes" any legislation giving legal status to those who entered the country illegally or who entered legally and remained in the country illegally.

·It supports "meaningful employer sanctions," adding that current laws are adequate although their use "has been subverted to meaninglessness through political and legal pressure initiated by those who benefit from the presence of illegal aliens."

·Congress and the White House need to direct the Homeland Security and Justice departments to aggressively enforce existing immigration laws.

Why A Texas Lawmaker Is Facing A Runoff (WSJ)

By Joel Millman

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

SAN ANTONIO -- Are Hispanics so angry at the Republicans' tough line on immigration that one of the party's most prominent Hispanic lawmakers may go down to defeat in a heavily Latino district?

That's the question in Texas' 23rd District, where Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla has been forced into a runoff against former Democratic Rep. Ciro Rodriguez, set for Dec. 12, which was triggered by state election rules after he failed to get a majority of votes on Election Day.

Mr. Bonilla's seat is one of five House races nationwide -- the others are in Florida, Louisiana, Ohio and North Carolina -- that remained unresolved, due, respectively, to a legal challenge, another runoff, uncounted ballots and a recount.

Two years ago, Mr. Bonilla won his seventh term with 69% of the vote. He ran up the big margin with the help of then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who had guided the Texas legislature in rejiggering Mr. Bonilla's district to remove some Democratic strongholds -- including a large number of Democratic-leaning Hispanics. In the 2004 election, Democrats made up about 40% of the voters in the district, and about half of the households were Latino.

But the Supreme Court rejected the map this summer, saying it violated the Voting Rights Act by disenfranchising Hispanics. The new district drawn after the high-court ruling left Mr. Bonilla with a district that was 50% Democratic and 61% Latino.

The high number of Hispanics isn't an advantage for the 52-year-old Mr. Bonilla, who has had a complicated relationship with low-income Hispanics in South Texas, even though many are proud of their shared ethnicity. Some voters "call him Henry Vanilla," says Ruben Espronceda, a Latino activist and publisher of an alternative newspaper in San Antonio. The congressman has had to rely on wealthier, predominantly Anglo voters to carry him to victory. Mr. DeLay's re-engineering of Mr. Bonilla's district boundaries in 2003 was seen as an attempt to protect a Hispanic incumbent by removing Hispanic constituents. In his 2002 re-election campaign, just 8% of Hispanic voters favored him.

DOJ_NMG_0098063

For years, Mr. Bonilla has been one of the Texas Republican Party's celebrity Latinos. Together with Alberto Gonzales, a former Texas Supreme Court justice now the U.S. attorney general, he put a public face on a party that historically has been shunned by Latinos, just as cabinet members Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell helped to soften hostility to the party among African-American voters. Mr. Bonilla, the grandson of Mexican immigrants, is the lone Mexican-American Republican in the House.

Since at least 1994, when George W. Bush became governor of Texas, the state's Republicans have been building ties to Hispanic voters, a strategy that helped Mr. Bush increase his party's share of Spanish-speakers to more than 50% when he was re-elected governor in 1998.

As president, Mr. Bush hoped Republicans would make further progress by appealing to church-going Latinos' religious values and by promoting an overhaul of U.S. immigration laws that would legalize millions of undocumented immigrants from Mexico. The strategy reaped dividends: The Republican share of Latino voters jumped to 44% in 2004, from about 30% in the previous cycle.

Mr. Bonilla benefited from the party's Latino drive, and he helped corral some new Hispanic voters for Republicans. He won a coveted seat on the House appropriations committee, where he in chairman of the agriculture panel and has a seat on the defense subcommittee. Both are important perches for his heavily agricultural district, which includes several military bases. The congressman was featured prominently at three Republican national conventions.

But the Republican gains among Latinos were reversed this year, when party hard-liners scuttled the president's immigration overhaul, and chose to reach out to a mostly Anglo base with a law-and-order, "protect the border" appeal. As a result, Democrats took about 70% of the Latino vote in the midterm elections, leaving Republicans with their worst showing among Hispanics in two decades.

That may hurt Mr. Bonilla, who faces a tough fight from a re-energized Democratic Party. His opponent is Mr. Rodriguez, a 59-year-old former congressman, who also is Mexican-American and who represented South San Antonio for four terms. Mr. Rodriguez lost that seat in 2004 after the DeLay-engineered redistricting. "Any time an incumbent can't get above 50%, he's in trouble," Mr. Rodriguez told a roomful of supporters last week.

Mr. Bonilla still has formidable advantages. Aside from his well-established campaign machinery, he has $1.4 million in his coffers. In rural counties, where he has delivered millions of dollars in projects for roads and other improvements, his name is ubiquitous on billboards. "Community Health Centers Thank Rep. Henry Bonilla," reads a sign on Highway 90, paid for by a group calling itself the Committee for Accessible Health Care. "Runoffs are different," he says, because voter turnout is low, and incumbents can often turn out supporters more easily than challengers.

Indeed, independent handicappers say Mr. Bonilla has the edge. "Rodriguez isn't known for his campaign proficiency," says Nathan Gonzales of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report. "He'll need to step it up significantly to pull it out."

Democrats say another factor that could aid Mr. Bonilla is the fact that the runoff coincides with Dia de la Virgen de Guadalupe, a holy day on the Mexican Catholic calendar. "You have to question the Republicans' decision to not only schedule the election with just a few days notice, but also to schedule it on a day of worship celebrated by thousands of Mexican-Americans throughout the district," Mr. Rodriguez says.

In the primary, Mr. Rodriguez was one of seven Democrats running and managed to raise just $125,000. Now, the 21-member Hispanic Caucus, all of them Democrats, is pressing incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to make winning the district a priority, says California congresswoman Loretta Sanchez. "If Democrats want that seat, the national money base can turn on a dime," she says.

Mr. Rodriguez figures ethnicity will play to his advantage. Speaking to a group of Hispanic elected officials at the Mi Pueblo restaurant in Uvalde, he switches back and forth between Spanish and English, emphasizing his 2002 vote against the Iraq war and a record of supporting the poor. He paints his opponent as a friend to bankers who reap higher interest payments on student loans, and to pharmaceuticals companies, "who don't allow you to go to Mexico" to buy medicine.

The reference stirs the group, with one man asking why Mr. Bonilla's vote authorizing a 700-mile border fence to keep Mexicans out isn't a bigger issue in the campaign. "That whole fence vote was offensive," says Ronnie Garza, a local junior-college administrator who says he comes from a family of Bonilla supporters, but who is working this year for Mr. Bonilla's defeat.

Mr. Bonilla says his stance will be a plus, given voters' concerns about crime spilling over from Mexico. "People in my district are for border security," he says.

Alcee Hastings: Out Of The Running? (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi is exploring compromise candidates to resolve the furious lobbying fight over who should chair the House intelligence committee. Pelosi has agreed to meet this week with Rep. Alcee

DOJ_NMG_0098064

Hastings, who has been pressing hard for the post despite his 1988 impeachment as a federal judge over an alleged bribery scheme. But advisers have warned Pelosi that naming Hastings could be a public-relations "disaster," especially after ethics questions were also raised about Rep. John Murtha, whom she unsuccessfully backed to be majority leader, according to congressional aides who asked not to be identified talking about internal matters. Even Hastings, who insists he is innocent of the dated charges (he was acquitted in a criminal case), now concedes it's unlikely he'll get the post.

"I still have hope, but it's diminishing," he tells NEWSWEEK. (Hastings still wants Pelosi to make a public statement absolving him of any wrongdoing.) But Pelosi also remains resistant to giving the job to the other main contender, Rep. Jane Harman, in part because she thinks Harman got "rolled" by the White House over Iraq-war oversight, says one leadership aide who also asked not to be identified talking about sensitive matters. (A Harman aide did not respond to requests for comment.) That leaves Pelosi looking at two compromise picks. One is Rep. Norm Dicks, a onetime strong Iraq-war backer who has since joined ranks with Murtha and now wants a phased troop withdrawal. The other is Rep. Silvestre Reyes, a quiet Texas lawmaker and former Border Patrol official who opposed the Iraq war from the outset. The aforementioned leadership aide notes that Reyes may now have the upper hand for "political" reasons: the Hispanic Caucus is angry because it has no members in the new House leadership or chairing major committees. Pelosi appears to be "leaning toward" Reyes, the aide says, but "the truth is, nobody knows what she is going to do."

The Lady Of The House (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Women recognize that kind of smile: pasted, forced, painful. When it appears-say, to hide heartbreak or sadness-there's a natural sympathy, even admiration, for the spirit of the woman wearing it. But when the soon-to-be Madame Speaker emerged from a closed-door Democratic caucus recently wearing that anguished grin, there was none of that friendly sense of embrace. None whatsoever.

Instead, there was mostly this question: What was the woman thinking? That we would simply accept the toothy smile as evidence of her newfound comity with Steny Hoyer, the new majority leader whom she had just attempted to knock off? That we would think it was a good idea to make her maiden leadership power play-in supporting Jack Murtha over her foe Steny Hoyer for the job-an act of revenge instead of reconciliation? That the woman about to become the first female speaker of the House was smart to look like a girl eager to "get back" at the guy she didn't like? That stepping on your own big story by trying to big-foot your membership is inspirational bridge-building? Or even good politics?

The facts: Nancy Pelosi is making history. As a woman, she will be held to a different standard, so she needs to set her standards high. It's not fair, but that's the way it is, and we all know it. And it's why choosing Murtha (over a well-regarded man already in place as her No. 2) was ultimately so self-defeating-and more revealing than she probably intended. A Pelosi ally told me that she was just playing by the tough rules of the old male pols in trying to deep-six her antagonist, Hoyer. If so, she forgot something: You might be forgiven if you employ a low tactic in the service of higher purpose. But threatening committee assignments so freshmen vote for Jack Murtha just doesn't qualify.

Pelosi's main job is to tee up the Democrats for 2008. It's a tough task, largely because she's a leader of a party perpetually at war with itself. The unity the Democrats found in the last election was rooted in one simple truth: They weren't the Republicans running the Congress or the White House. There was no national Democratic conversion, just a sense that the other guys ought to get a shot at governing. So while the Democrats won, they still remain a motley crew: rich and poor, culturally conservative and liberal, big spenders and budget-balancers.

Tacky. And divided on the best way to end the war. Pelosi has taken sides: She supports the Murtha withdraw-now scenario. And she's about to demote her more moderate fellow Californian, Jane Harman-denying her the chairmanship of the House Intelligence Committee, even kicking her off the panel. Why demote Harman? If it's a policy dispute over the war, why not welcome Harman's voice-generally regarded as credible, even if it veers from the liberal line? If it's a personal dispute, get over it. Any member of the California delegation will tell you that the two women don't get along-and that both have probably been right over the years. But if you're speaker, why demean your exalted position by engaging in a publicly ugly, even tacky, fight? Particularly when the possible alternative to Harman is Alcee Hastings of Florida, once impeached by the Senatefor ethical lapses. "If Pelosi starts acting like the second coming of George McGovern," says one top Democratic strategist, "we will lose much of what we have gained."

There are some hopeful signs: Despite the suggestion by Rep. Charles Rangel that Congress ought to reinstitute the draft, Pelosi made it clear the idea is a nonstarter. It might actually be an interesting debate that would engage the nation, but it's never going to happen-so Pelosi is wise to avoid it. Then there's the decision to roll out a bunch of ethics reform measures at the start of the next Congress. It's the issue that tipped the balance towards the Democrats-and they're going to take their time debating it.

DOJ_NMG_0098065

Each proposal-whether it's a gift ban, lobbying reform, or eliminating pork-barrel-spending "earmarks"-will be in a separate bill, providing plenty of votes and attention for an issue that mattered to the public.

That's smart. And it's an agenda House Democrats want. So far, in fact, it's the flock that has been serving the leader well: pushing for reforms and refusing to rubber-stamp Murtha because he's Pelosi's friend. If they begin to actually get something done, the smiles may finally be for real.

Will: How Speaker Pelosi Could Restore Congressional Values (NSWK)

By George F. Will

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - There has been an admirable absence of chivalry in assessments of Nancy Pelosi's stumbling steps toward the speakership. She dismayed colleagues by saying that in order for her to be an effective leader she needed John Murtha as majority leader. Try to imagine Speaker Sam Rayburn confessing such dependency. And a columnist in The Economist says that "often she talks drivel" (the speaker's gavel "is in the hands of special interests, and now it will be in the hands of America's children") couched in "clumsy alliteration" (Democrats have "idealism, intellect and integrity.") Says the columnist, "It's like listening to a cross between a Stepford wife and Jesse Jackson." Or like listening to Rumpelstiltskin discuss economics: Pelosi sees increased taxes on oil companies as part of a program of "energy independence."

What the House needs from Pelosi, however, is not rhetorical flair or scintillating thought, but statesmanship, which often, and in this instance, means not fully pressing an advantage. Many Democrats are eager to pay Republicans back for their overbearing behavior when they were in the majority—behavior that Republicans say was retribution for Democrats' behavior before 1994. Last year, Michigan Rep. John Dingell, the most senior House member (he just won a 26th full term), told The Washington Post's Juliet Eilperin that when Democrats regained control, some of them would say: "We're not going back to the fair way of doing things. Democrats will say to [Republicans], you did it, now you bastards enjoy it."

But in her new book "Fight Club Politics: How Partisanship Is Poisoning the House of Representatives," Eilperin notes that before Republicans captured the House in 1994, Dingell's "fair way" was to give Democrats 82 percent of the staff and 77 percent of the budget of his Energy and Commerce Committee. So Republicans, having won 52.4 percent of the House seats in 1994, retaliated by giving themselves about two thirds of all committee seats.

In the 1980s, says Eilperin, Speakers Tip O'Neill and then Jim Wright began bullying House Republicans "even when it did not make the difference between winning or losing a vote. They limited opportunities for debate, publicly mocked members of the minority and frequently denied Republicans the chance to make their mark on legislation." In 1987, Wright passed a budget bill by adjourning the House and then calling it back into session a few minutes later, and calling it a "new" legislative day. Republicans were enraged when Wright held open a vote for 10 minutes longer than the normal 15 minutes. But in 2003, Speaker Dennis Hastert, needing time to browbeat reluctant Republicans, held open the vote on the prescription-drug entitlement for two hours and 51 minutes, until almost 6 a.m.

Democrats began the practice of routinely bringing bills to the floor under closed rules, meaning the legislation could not be amended. Republicans smoldered when in the 103rd Congress (1993-94) 70 percent of all rules were partly or completely closed. But in the Republican 108th (2003-4), 78 percent were. Some Republicans have disregarded the tradition of allowing the minority party to select the members it sends to conference committees that resolve differences between House and Senate versions of a bill.

"The House of Representatives, as controlled in recent years by the Republican party, has ceased to be a deliberative and legislative body, responsive to the will of a majority of its members, but has come under the absolute domination of the Speaker, who has entire control of its deliberations and powers of legislation." So read the Democratic Party platform in 1908.

Recently, the House has been run the way presidential campaigns have been run, by the politics of mobilization rather than persuasion. That is, by energizing one's base of true believers rather than attracting persons who might be temporarily attracted by compromises that blur partisan clarities. Hence Hastert's "majority of the majority" rule: No bill should pass unless it is supported by a majority of the party that controls the chamber.

This marginalizes the minority as a legislative force, so its members pour all their energies into the bitter politics of bringing down the majority. The House often works Tuesday to Thursday, and many members do not move their families to Washington, so there is less of the socializing that leavens partisanship with friendship.

Mickey Edwards, former GOP congressman from Oklahoma, says that in today's polarized Washington, House members "tend to see themselves less as members of a separate and equal institution, with its own oath of office and obligations, and more as either a part of the president's team or a part of the opposition to the president." By restoring some of the procedural civilities that both parties have traduced, Pelosi could revive the House to fulfill its intended role as a rival to the executive. Her interests, and those of her institution, converge.

DOJ_NMG_0098066

As Drug Benefit Tottered, A Veteran Buckled Down (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 26 — Early this year, while top Bush administration officials were boasting about the success of the new Medicare drug benefit, a middle-level manager named Abby L. Block held a telephone conference call with insurance companies.

"We have a real crisis situation looming here," Ms. Block told the insurers, noting that many Medicare beneficiaries had been unable to fill prescriptions at their pharmacies. "We truly cannot let this situation go on much longer. I cannot stress enough how urgent this is."

Ms. Block, a 75-year-old civil servant, is director of the Center for Beneficiary Choices at the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. While some officials toured the country as cheerleaders for the drug benefit, Ms. Block stayed at her desk in Washington and made it work.

She solved many problems that plagued the program in its first weeks, when low-income people were often overcharged and some were turned away from drugstores without getting their medications. By September, according to several market research firms, three-fourths of the people receiving drug coverage through Medicare said they were satisfied.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, former administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said that recruiting Ms. Block had been one of his priorities after he took charge of Medicare in the spring of 2004. "No one on the planet has as much experience providing access to a full range of health plan choices under a government program," Dr. McClellan said.

For 25 years, Ms. Block had worked at the federal Office of Personnel Management, running the health insurance program for federal employees. Despite some criticism, the federal employee program is generally popular with government workers, and Congress used it as a model for Medicare's drug benefit.

Janice R. Lachance, who was director of the personnel agency under President Bill Clinton, said: "Abby is the ultimate public servant. I don't know her politics. I was always very careful not to ask."

"When Abby took the Medicare job," Ms. Lachance said, "many wondered why she would do this at her age, when most people are going off into retirement. That's who she is. If there's a big, thorny problem, Abby wants to be part of the solution."

If Congress directs Medicare to negotiate with drug companies and seek lower drug prices, pharmaceutical executives could find themselves dealing with Ms. Block, as insurers already do.

The Federal Employees Health Benefits Program is, in effect, a supermarket through which more than 280 private health plans are offered to more than eight million federal employees, retirees and dependents.

Many insurers, like Humana, participate in Medicare and the federal employee program. They respected Ms. Block, so when she expressed alarm about the operation of Medicare's drug benefit, they paid heed.

"We called on the plans to take extraordinary steps to meet the needs of beneficiaries," Ms. Block said in an interview.

The government told insurers they must provide a temporary supply of any prescription that a person was taking prior to the start of the Medicare drug benefit on Jan. 1. The transition period was originally 30 days, but when problems persisted, Ms. Block extended it through March 31.

"When I was at the Office of Personnel Management," Ms. Block said, "I viewed myself as a purchaser, like any other employer buying health insurance for its employees. Congress set up the program to offer choice. We never had standardized benefits. People could choose a plan that met their needs.

"In the federal employee program," Ms. Block said, "the primary focus is to get the best deal for federal employees and retirees. In Medicare, the primary focus is to get the best deal for beneficiaries. The key, I think, is to treat the plans as partners, rather than adversaries, and to establish a mutual goal. This is a business relationship."

That represents a radical change. For 40 years, Medicare has been a regulator and a payer but has not been seen as a reliable business partner.

Some observers suggest that the government may be too cozy with insurers, in Medicare and in the federal employees' health program.

Jacqueline Simon, policy director at the American Federation of Government Employees, a union representing 600,000 federal workers, said Ms. Block could have obtained better benefits at lower cost had she taken "a more adversarial position" in negotiating with insurers.

"Our impression is that she was very indulgent and very inclined to let them have their way," Ms. Simon said.

If Ms. Block has an aptitude for insurance, she may have inherited it. She grew up in Brooklyn and in Merrick, N.Y., on Long Island. Her father, Irving Barbanell, was in the insurance business.

DOJ_NMG_0098067

A first cousin, Alexander S. Barbanell, recalled recently that her father “sold life insurance and went door to door collecting premiums of 25 to 50 cents a week in the Depression.”

Alexander Barbanell’s wife, Gloria Feldt, a former president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said: “I related to Abby as one feminist to another. We both had to assert our abilities at a time when our society did not welcome women as executives.”

At the Medicare agency, Ms. Block’s job is ordinarily held by a political appointee, but she is a civil servant, a member of the Senior Executive Service.

“Sometimes a career civil servant can do the job better than a political appointee,” said Kay Coles James, who directed the Office of Personnel Management from 2001 to 2005.

Behind her desk, Ms. Block has several busts of Theodore Roosevelt, a champion of the Civil Service. She received them for outstanding performance in her prior job.

Medicare drug coverage, like health benefits for federal employees, is offered through private plans. But Medicare beneficiaries are, on average, older, sicker and more vulnerable. Insurers are more tightly regulated under Medicare, which has a much higher political profile than the federal employee program.

The 2003 Medicare law says that Medicare officials can negotiate with insurers on the “terms and conditions” of the drug benefit, just as the government negotiates with insurers on behalf of federal employees.

But it appears that Medicare has made only limited use of this authority in the first year of the drug benefit. “Under Medicare,” Ms. Block said, “some negotiations do occur, but there were only a few situations where the final price was different from the bid price.”

More than half of federal employees are in Blue Cross and Blue Shield.

Stephen W. Gammarino, senior vice president of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, said: “What’s impressive about Abby is that she listens. She really wants to understand the industry she’s working with. She does not assume that the government always knows best. She sets out her expectations. How plans get there is less important to Abby than the overall objective, which is to provide better value and better service for beneficiaries.”

Lawmaker Leaves Judge Nominee In Limbo (AP-Y)

AP, November 27, 2006

A conservative Republican lawmaker is considering whether to stop blocking a judicial nominee over concerns her appearance at a lesbian commitment ceremony betrayed her legal views on gay marriage.

Sen. Sam Brownback, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, said Michigan Court of Appeals Judge Janet T. Neff should not be disqualified automatically for having attended the ceremony. But Brownback, R-Kan., made clear it raised doubts in his mind.

"But what I want to know is what does it do to her look at the law? What does she consider the law on same-sex marriage, on civil unions, and I'd want to consider that," Brownback said Sunday.

President Bush nominated Neff, who has a liberal reputation, to be a U.S. District Court judge as part of a compromise struck with Democrats.

Neff's nomination is pending before the full Senate; Brownback has stalled it because of her attendance at the 2002 ceremony in Massachusetts.

"I'm still looking at the Neff situation, and I will in the future," Brownback said.

Neff has said she attended as a friend of one of the two women, a longtime neighbor.

Neff has declined to answer Brownback's queries on whether the Constitution guarantees a right to same-sex marriage or civil unions, saying it would be improper to address questions that might come before her as a federal judge.

Brownback called gay marriage a developing area of the law best not left to the judiciary anyway.

"To me these issues should be decided by the legislative bodies, not by the judicial bodies, and it seems to me this may indicate some view of hers on the legal issue. And that's what I'm concerned about here, is her view of the legal issue involving same-sex marriage," Brownback said.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., urged taking a step back, away from "the political agenda," in considering judicial appointees.

"You know, these are important lifetime appointments. These men and women who serve on the bench, we really trust their judgment and their wisdom and giving these political litmus tests I don't think is in the best interest of justice in America," said Durbin, who will be the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate.

In an Oct. 12 letter to Brownback, Neff said a minister presided over the ceremony and she insisted her attendance would not affect her ability to act fairly as a federal judge.

DOJ_NMG_0098068

"The ceremony, which was entirely private, took place in Massachusetts, where I had no authority to act in any official capacity and where, in any event, the ceremony had no legal effect," Neff wrote.

Brownback and Durbin appeared on "This Week" on ABC.

On Deck Again: One Of Democrats' Favorite Clinton Foes (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

Outgoing Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) got a rousing ovation recently from the conservative Federalist Society when he said he would push for confirmation next month of a group of stalled Bush judicial nominees.

But Specter had to acknowledge that he was "not optimistic" about securing approval for most of the controversial names President Bush kicked back to the Senate -- a White House move that rankled Democrats.

Part of the problem is that when Congress waddles back for a quick lame-duck session next month, consensus nominations, not contentious ones, are the ones that are likely to get through.

Yet one of Bush's nominees, a former House member from California and a "manager" in the effort to impeach and remove President Bill Clinton from office, could very well be confirmed to a federal judgeship, even under a Democratic Senate next year.

James Rogan, who lost his seat in 2000 because of voter unhappiness over his impeachment efforts, was later confirmed by the Senate to head the Patent and Trademark Office. He's now a Los Angeles lawyer.

And, oddly enough, Rogan's got support from an unusual group of Clinton backers, including a California judicial vetting committee with members picked by liberal Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer.

Rogan even lists as references two of Clinton's lawyers in the impeachment battle, Lanny J. Davis and Lanny A. Breuer, who worked in the White House counsel's office.

Asked about this most unusual "kumbaya" spirit -- something long missing in this town -- Breuer said Rogan is "basically a good guy and a good public servant. Jim Rogan was dead wrong on the impeachment, but over the years I've gotten to know him and he's a fair and decent man, and I think he'll be a fine judge."

Davis, who was one of Clinton's most vociferous defenders back then, said Rogan called him "early on, not recently, and I said I would help him and I volunteered to call" the Judiciary Committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick Leahy (Vt.), on his behalf. Rogan showed "poor judgment" on impeachment, "I haven't changed my mind on that," Davis said, but "he's a good Republican with unquestionable integrity, and I'm willing to step up."

On the other hand, there's a senator named Clinton who's going to have to approve the nomination. No word on her views; spokesman Philippe Reines said, in what the New York Daily News called "an icy statement," only that she'd take a look at it.

But even in the heat of House impeachment action seven years ago, we received a fine photo, we recall, of the Clintons and the Rogans getting close during a White House Christmas party. Look at all those grins.'Now That We're Relevant . . .'

Despite all their talk about global warming, enviros are just this month coming in from years in a frigid political winter. And they're discovering that they are in need of some serious refresher drills if they hope to play in the big leagues.

Consider an internal e-mail to "Environmental Communications Professional" from Peter A. Rafle Jr., a communications director at the Wilderness Society, to his counterparts at a couple dozen organizations that form what's called the Green Group. The e-mail, titled "Lessons Learned," results from some apparent unhappiness with a Nov. 13 enviro news conference "resulting in less-than-ideal headlines."

Enviros need to understand they are "now viewed as relevant," Rafle said, something "we haven't been for more than a decade." That means smoother news conferences, coordinated messages and so on.

"As a result of the elections, the press is more interested than ever in what we have to say," he wrote, noting huge reporter turnout at media events. "We no longer have the luxury of hiding our quotes in the 10th paragraph of a newspaper article," he said.

So "message discipline" is critical, and "improvising or ad-libbing can cost us friends on the Hill and in the public," Rafle said. "The press will leap on the least hint of conflict or inconsistency," he predicted, "and the resulting story is unlikely to be helpful."

You can count on that.Turks, Kurds Have Something in Common

Remember retired Gen. Joseph Ralston, the former NATO commander who was named a few months back as special envoy to try to work through Turkey's concerns that Kurdish separatists are being supported by their cousins in Iraqi Kurdistan?

The Turkish press has been reporting that there doesn't seem to be much happening from his efforts and that the Turks are unhappy.

DOJ_NMG_0098069

A Loop Fan who was in Lebanon the week before last reports that Ralston was back in the news because the Kurds are also unhappy with him. Seems he's a member of the board of Lockheed Martin, which, it appears, is supplying nifty new combat jets to the Turks, who may well use them on the Kurds.

Medicaid Spending Sees First Decline (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, November 27, 2006

Medicaid spending has declined unexpectedly this year, the first drop since the health program for the poor was created in 1965.

The historic reversal will free up billions of dollars in state budgets. Medicaid has been the fastest-growing expense for states over the past 10 years.

Medicaid spending fell 1.4% in the first nine months of the year compared with the same period a year ago, according to the Bureau of Economic Analysis. The drop was even greater — an unprecedented a 5.4% decline — after adjusting for the rate of health care inflation.

The spending has been reduced by cost-controlling efforts and a shift of some prescription-drug expenses to Medicare, the federal health program for the elderly.

"States have made really aggressive changes in how care is managed in Medicaid," Arizona Medicaid Director Anthony Rodgers said. "Every state has taken a different approach, but the success can be seen almost everywhere."

Medicaid provides health care to 56 million poor Americans. The federal government sets broad rules for the program and pays 57% of the expense. States run the program and pay 43% of the cost.

The program is on track to spend $300 billion in federal and state money in 2006, the Bureau of Economic Analysis reports.

Medicaid is separate from Medicare, which insures 42.5 million elderly and disabled. That program — run entirely by the federal government — will spend about $384 billion this year, up 15.6%.

Some Medicaid savings are the result of shifting costs to the federal government's Medicare program. The new Medicare prescription-drug benefit pays most pharmaceutical costs for 6 million elderly poor who used to have their bills paid by Medicaid. Under the new drug plan, states reimburse Medicare for some money saved, but not all.

This complicated cost shifting between the two programs makes it impossible to know precisely how much Medicaid cost cutting is simply shifting expenses to the federal program. A USA TODAY analysis estimates that Medicaid spending would have been about flat — or down 4% after adjusting for inflation — without the new federal drug benefit.

Substantial Medicaid savings resulted from many small cost-containment policies adopted in recent years. The changes include shifting the elderly from nursing homes to less-costly home health care, cracking down on fraud, refining the management of high-cost patients (such as those with AIDS or hemophilia) and cutting some payments to hospitals and doctors.

"This is a unique event. No doubt about it. And there are a lot of reasons for it," said Vic Miller, senior fellow at the Federal Funds Information for States, a research group sponsored by states.

Key examples:

·Ohio spent about 10% less on Medicaid from July through October than a year earlier. The $310 million reduction includes $37 million less paid to nursing homes and $32 million less to hospitals. "It's many things, not one sea change," Ohio Medicaid spokesman Jon Allen said.

·Michigan spent $1 billion less than budgeted and $311 million less than it spent a year earlier.

·New York planned for a 7% spending increase this year but now predicts a 3.8% increase.

A Fix For Social Security? (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

The next six months could be a productive time for economic policy. After a wasted 2005-06 cycle, in which the Bush administration approached entitlement reform too confidently and Democrats refused to talk, both sides may return to the table. The administration, now led by a practical Treasury secretary with the heft to sideline ideologues, may be willing to make concessions. The Democrats, faced with the challenge of living up to their unexpectedly clear election victory, may decide it's time to make policy rather than just block it.

The most interesting debate will revolve around retirement. This will start with a rerun of the Social Security argument of 2005; but it could easily blossom into a discussion about the inequality and income volatility that's grown with globalization.

DOJ_NMG_0098070

Top administration officials have already signaled that they want to return to the question of Social Security. They no longer regard "privatization" -- the diversion of payroll taxes into personal accounts -- as the starting point for negotiation. The solvency of Social Security, not a desire to promote an "ownership society," is their main concern.

A solvency fix will involve some cuts in future benefits. Democrats won't love this, but there are ways to do it progressively. During the 2005 debate, President Bush endorsed an idea that would inflict no cuts whatsoever on low-income workers and would allow the value of middle-class retirees' benefits to rise, albeit less quickly than now scheduled. Because this formula (devised by a Democrat named Robert Pozen) spreads the burden fairly, Democrats who worry about rising inequality should be open to it.

The solvency fix will also require increases in revenue. Again, during the last Social Security debate Bush left open the possibility of doing this in an extremely progressive way -- by lifting the cap on the payroll tax, which currently exempts income above $90,000. This reform would raise revenue exclusively from the richest 6 percent of taxpayers. It's hard to see how Democrats could object to that.

The next question is where to put the extra revenue: into the notional Social Security trust fund or into personal accounts. The administration will prefer private accounts, partly because it would like a face-saving link to the president's 2005 proposal but also because personal accounts provide a way of walling the revenue off from the general budget and so reduce the government's tendency to spend it. Meanwhile, Democrats will prefer to put the money into the trust fund. They reason that any personal account created as part of a reform that cuts Social Security benefits is headed the wrong way: toward replacing the security of the traditional guaranteed benefit with the uncertainty of 401(k)-type investments.

Judging from the hints flying around Washington, the administration sees how to bridge this divide. Democrats may be allergic to personal Social Security accounts, but they are enthusiastic about other ideas for personal retirement accounts that just don't have "Social Security" in the title. For example, Gene Sperling, a former Clinton adviser, has called for a "Universal 401(k)" that would extend the benefits of 401(k) saving to workers whose companies don't offer such accounts. In Sperling's vision, everyone would get the chance to contribute to an account and receive a government contribution as a match, with the most generous match going to low-income workers. To pay for this program, the government could prune the existing $150 billion patchwork of tax breaks for saving. This patchwork is extraordinarily, scandalously regressive: 90 percent of the tax breaks go to the richest 40 percent of taxpayers.

Sperling is motivated by a desire to help low-income people. As he writes in his book, "The Pro-Growth Progressive," 85 percent of workers in the bottom fifth of the labor force have no access to a company 401(k), nor do 75 percent of Hispanic workers or 60 percent of black workers. Globalization, which has boosted the volatility of family incomes, makes it especially important to help workers build assets that can cushion them against job loss, illness or the financial fallout from divorce. Although the Universal 401(k) would be primarily aimed at retirement security, there could be limited earlier withdrawals at times of misfortune.

So while Republicans have been pushing personal retirement accounts as part of an entitlement fix, Democrats have been pushing personal retirement accounts because they worry about worker insecurity. By enlarging the debate so that it's about savings in the era of globalization rather than just Social Security, negotiators can conjure up the common ground that was missing during the 2005 train wreck. Personal accounts need not be merely the alternative to the traditional Social Security benefit. They can simultaneously be the alternative to the nation's outrageously regressive system of tax breaks for saving and a way to help ordinary people build nest eggs. When personal accounts become both of these things, perhaps Republicans and Democrats alike will back them.

Up From The Depths (WP)

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

THE BUSH administration has signaled that it wants to discuss Social Security reform with the incoming Democratic majority in Congress. This may sound quixotic: President Bush failed to secure reform when his own party controlled the legislature, so what hope does he have now? But the president's top economic advisers, including his Treasury secretary, his chief of staff and his budget director, appear ready to drop what Democrats call privatization -- the diversion of payroll tax revenue into personal retirement accounts. Unless they want to define themselves as unbendingly partisan, the Democrats should accept the administration's invitation to discuss reform.

Democrats who want to avoid such talks will assert that the administration is not acting in good faith. In a news story in Wednesday's Post, Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of a House subcommittee on Social Security, cited the nomination of Andrew G. Biggs, a proponent of personal accounts, to the No. 2 slot at the Social Security Administration. "The president is sending signals that what he's really after is privatization," Mr. Levin asserted. "And that's just a non-starter." But Mr. Biggs is respected and liked by Democratic economists, who have no trouble discussing reform ideas with him. The administration has recently acquired a pragmatic, deal-oriented Treasury chief. Refusing even to discuss reform with him would be to pass up an opportunity to fix a pressing problem.

DOJ_NMG_0098071

Some Democrats dispute the urgency of the problem, arguing that the notional assets in the Social Security trust fund are sufficient to pay all the benefits promised to retirees for the next 40 years. But a retirement system needs to make credible promises that last longer than that: A worker who is 30 can't entrust her retirement to a program that will run short of money as she turns 70. Moreover, a solvency fix for Social Security requires a long lead time. Cuts in benefits must be signaled years ahead so that workers have time to plan for them. Any increase in the payroll tax needs to be implemented soon in order to keep the size of the increase to an acceptable level.

Another argument against addressing Social Security is that health care is more pressing. It's true that the budget challenge Social Security presents, which is the result of the retirement of the baby boomers plus rising life expectancy, pales next to the budget challenge Medicare presents, which is the result of those two factors multiplied by galloping inflation in health-care costs. But it makes sense to start with whichever part of the entitlement problem can be tackled most readily, and that is likely to mean Social Security. The administration has indicated that it is ready to do a deal on the retirement system, and much of the technical groundwork has been done. There is nothing to stop Democratic leaders from advancing health proposals too, but for the moment neither they nor the administration have a plausible blueprint for reining in Medicare costs.

If the Democrats engage on Social Security, they may find themselves discussing some form of personal retirement accounts. This should not be confused with "privatization": Personal accounts that are added to the Social Security system are different from ones that are funded with money carved out from existing payroll revenue. Creating such add-on accounts could boost national savings, allow workers to build nest eggs and cushion them from the benefit cuts that are inevitably part of a reform. As they respond to the administration's overtures, Democrats should not foreclose this option.

Winning Personality (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

A staple Republican tactic for several years has been to get Chuck Schumer on television. His whiny New York accent exhaling liberal dogma was music to GOP ears. Yet his omnipresence on TV since the midterm elections has not been cause for Republican jubilation.

That's because Schumer, for once, has not been talking -- just beaming. In every televised tableau of victorious Democrats, the long, smiling face of Sen. Charles Schumer has been positioned beside the next House speaker or Senate majority leader. He deserved the place of honor for his paramount role as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) in achieving a Senate majority that nobody expected.

Because of his soaring ambition, Schumer had been in danger of becoming a comic figure and the subject of a cliche: The most dangerous place to be in Washington or New York is caught between Schumer and a TV camera. But far from the attention hog or reflexive liberal he often has seemed in a 32-year legislative career, Schumer at the DSCC was a coolly pragmatic decision maker. He far outdid his Republican counterpart, Sen. Elizabeth Dole, in fundraising, recruitment and strategy.

After easily winning Senate reelection in 2004, Schumer considered a race for governor of New York as integral to his dream of becoming the nation's first Jewish president. But state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer stood in the way, and Schumer instead agreed to head the DSCC.

He faced a daunting task. Of the three Senate election cycles, 2006 was easily the most hazardous for Democrats. Far from achieving the net gain of six seats needed to take control, Democrats were in danger of losing seats in Nebraska, Florida, West Virginia, Washington, Minnesota and North Dakota.

Schumer, using his New York connections, raised $23 million from the metropolitan area alone. For the first time, the DSCC outraised the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) in both years of the election cycle. As of mid-October, the DSCC had outspent the NRSC, $94.6 million to $70 million.

Ending the old DSCC practice of sending money to incumbents in safe seats, Schumer said to donors: "I've told Ted [Kennedy] and Hillary [Clinton] that they're getting nothing." He stressed fundraising for Democratic senators from states carried by George W. Bush. Early war chests built by Sens. Ben Nelson in Nebraska, Bill Nelson in Florida and Robert Byrd in West Virginia frightened off serious contenders.

While Dole was striking out in recruiting, Schumer succeeded in preventing the retirement of incumbent Democrats, which had led to many losses in 2004. He also displayed pragmatism in candidate selection that belied his left-wing stereotype. Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell (D) told Schumer that he didn't think Schumer would want the best candidate against Republican Sen. Rick Santorum -- because he was pro-life and pro-gun. "If he can win, I don't care," Schumer replied. He also took the unusual step of intervening in the Virginia primary by endorsing Jim Webb against liberal stalwart Harris Miller, even though Webb had backed Bush and Republican Sen. George Allen in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0098072

Fundraising and recruitment have been traditional duties for DSCC chairmen, but Schumer also entered the realm of overall strategy. Here, too, he contradicted his image of the panting ideologue demanding a litmus test for judicial nominees and grossly exaggerating the Valerie Plame leak. He pressed Democratic candidates not to flatly oppose extension of the USA Patriot Act but to work for a bipartisan compromise. Earlier, he threatened to cut off funds to Democratic candidates if they crippled each other in bloody, negative primaries, as they had done in Florida in 2002.

While Schumer takes credit for helping make the Tennessee Senate race competitive, the DSCC at the end pulled the plug on Democratic candidate Harold Ford Jr. because the money could be used more effectively elsewhere. The endgame strategy of concentrating on Montana, Missouri and Virginia produced a Democratic majority.

While he agreed to continue heading the DSCC in the 2008 cycle, Schumer's role in his party's leadership was enhanced. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, by tradition chairman of the Democratic Conference, created the role of conference vice chairman for Schumer. He no longer is the GOP's favorite television personality.

D.C. Notebook: Matheson Is Moving On Up; Reid Loses His Direction (SLT)

By Thomas Burr And Robert Gehrke

The Salt Lake Tribune, November 27, 2006

It has long been rumored that Rep. Jim Matheson has aspirations for a higher office.

Now he has one.

One floor higher, to be exact.

With retirements and election casualties, House office space got shuffled recently, and Matheson is moving from the second floor of the Longworth House Office Building to the third.

He will be moving into the space now occupied by Washington Rep. Doc Hastings, which has 10 square feet more space and a window view . . . of Interstate 395.

Maybe in another 15 years he could get former Rep. Jim Hansen's old office, which was one of just a few with a balcony and a stunning view of the Capitol. When Hansen retired, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay moved in. Now he's gone, and the swank pad will have a new tenant come January.

Follow the Leader

It appears that incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid may need to work on his leadership skills.

Shortly after a Senate hearing on the Washington County and White Pine County, Nev., land-management bills got going this week, senators were summoned to a vote. So Nevada Sen. John Ensign strolled out of the committee room, followed by Sen. Bob Bennett, Reid and a herd of staffers and reporters.

They got about halfway down the hall when Ensign stopped and realized they were headed the wrong direction. "Why are we going this way?" he asked. "Are you guys just following me?"

"Don't I always follow you?" asked Reid.

Rude Rudy

Sometimes digs are so obvious you can't let them go by. For example, a New York magazine profile of presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani this month opens with the former mayor in a swank hotel room: "The television is tuned to CNN. Giuliani laughs at Sens. Orrin Hatch and Chris Dodd. 'Look at Hatch's tie!' he says, pointing at a particularly garish combination of orange, gold, and blue. The aides in the shadows laugh, too."

Seems a little cruel, doesn't it? Obviously, the Utah senator sometimes wears bad ties. OK, horrendous ties. But we didn't make fun of Hizzonah when he was still sporting that ridiculous hairpiece . . . at least not in anything that ever appeared in print.

Um. Until now.

No Comment

Utah's Peter Watkins, who was one of President Bush's message men for the past year, is leaving the White House.

Watkins, a native of Davis County, is one of a small group of regional spokespeople who respond on behalf of the White House to hundreds of newspapers around the globe, including The Tribune. Watkins was peppered with calls every day from reporters in 16 or 17 states, trying to pin down the president on this stand or that. But after six years working at the White House, including several as a spokesman for first lady Laura Bush, Watkins is hanging up his spokes-hat and leaving Washington. The newly married Watkins is returning to Utah and starting a consulting business.

One would think that a former Bush spokesman will do pretty well in the reddest state in the nation.

Bush's Bizarre Appointment (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0098073

The Los Angeles Times, November 27, 2006

Erick Keroack is too extreme to head the federal office for family planning.

PRESIDENT BUsh made some winningly conciliatory remarks the day after his party's Nov. 7 electoral drubbing, saying he looked forward to governing in a more bipartisan fashion. Then he turned around and started naming kooky ideologues to key posts.

The latest recess appointment, Eric Keroack as head of the federal government's family planning office, is an extremist so out of line with scientific thought that it is difficult to describe his views without laughing.

As medical director of A Woman's Concern, a small chain of nonprofit pregnancy counseling clinics that offer no information on birth control, Keroack has agitated against abortion and even contraception — including for married women. The organization continues to push the discredited nonsense that abortion increases a woman's chances of breast cancer and is more dangerous during the first eight weeks of pregnancy (when, in fact, the risk of complication is actually at its lowest). Birth control, according to A Woman's Concern's tortured logic, is somehow "demeaning to women." And Keroack has argued that women who have sex with multiple partners alter their brain chemistry in the process, making it harder for them to form close relationships.

This is the man who will oversee $283 million in annual Department of Health and Human Services grants for providing access to family planning education and contraceptives "to all who want and need them."

The administration is still wasting $158 million a year on abstinence-only education programs that the Government Accountability Office concluded this month have not been shown to work and at times put forth misleading information about condoms and AIDS.

Keroack does not need Senate confirmation, so there is little Congress can do about a president who continues to select anti-scientific ideology over basic competence, aside from making it clear that funding for these programs depends on HHS using the money as intended.

But the real check on Bush's silliness comes from voters. On Nov. 7, efforts to limit women's reproductive rights were routed not only in California and Oregon but in South Dakota and Kansas. Appeasing social conservatives is not just bad policy, it's becoming losing politics as well.

The Test Of Time (NYT)

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

The Postal Service announced recently that it was cutting the length of time between a person's death and his or her eligibility to appear on a stamp from 10 years to 5. This is one case where we think delayed gratification is a virtue.

Americans love to dedicate and commemorate. Whether for plates, pens, pins or hats, there is an entire industry devoted to commemorative items. If it doesn't have a corporate sponsor, like Citigroup for the new Mets stadium, chances are that it has someone's name in front of it or face plastered on it.

While placement on a postage stamp is hardly of earth-shattering import (there are stamps of ducks, motorcycles and antique toys, after all), American society has made it a high honor for a person. As Postmaster General John Potter noted when he announced the change, the 10-year rule was to ensure that a person's legacy "stood the test of time." The test just got a lot shorter. Now candidates can be considered just three years after they die.

The first few years after the deaths of prominent people are rife with revelations, often unflattering. Tongues loosen. Memoirs are written, archives unsealed, letters published. The shorter the window, the more likely a regrettable choice will be made.

Dedicating something to a living person is particularly fraught with peril. Ohio University learned this the hard way when an advisory panel recommended that Representative Bob Ney's name be removed from a university building. While a member of the State Legislature, Mr. Ney helped steer funds to the project. That was before he pleaded guilty to corruption charges in the Jack Abramoff scandal.

A prohibition on legislators' putting their names on their own pork products strikes us as an excellent idea. In the meantime, we wish that the Postal Service's advisory committee would be content with honoring historical figures. If anyone is desperate to put a particular face on a stamp, Stamps.com does custom jobs, provided they aren't "obscene, offensive, blasphemous" and so on. It's a useful stopgap for a truly impatient era.

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs For College Grads Plentiful (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0098074

By Stephanie Armour
USA Today, November 27, 2006

College graduates are experiencing the best job market in four years as a stronger economy leads more employers to ramp up hiring.

Employers expect to hire 17.4% more new college graduates in 2006 and 2007 than in 2005 and 2006, according to a new survey by the Bethlehem, Pa.-based National Association of Colleges and Employers (NACE).

Signing bonuses range from $1,000 to $10,000, with the average at $3,568. And employers reported plans to boost their starting salary offers by 4.6% over last year, nearly a full percentage point higher than increases for the classes of 2006 and 2005.

"This is the fourth year in a row that employers have predicted an increase in hiring," says Andrea Koncz at NACE. "It really is because of the economy and more demand. Companies are growing."

For example:

·Companies are ramping up hiring. Accounting and tax firm KPMG typically hires about 2,500 new graduates, but they expect to boost that by about 10% in 2007. Manny Fernandez, national managing partner-campus recruiting, says competition for students is intensifying. Signing bonuses are being used in some markets, he says.

·Some colleges and universities are also seeing more employers offering internship programs for current students: Employers extended job offers to more than 70% of their interns, according to a separate study by NACE.

At St. Olaf College in Northfield, Minn., students are landing internships at large companies such as General Mills.

"It's optimistic," says Sandy Amy, assistant director of internships in the center for experiential learning at St. Olaf. "They're finding opportunities. (Internships) give them the background they need."

·Some soon-to-be graduates are finding they can be pickier about the jobs they accept and can take into account other priorities such as flexible work schedules or similar benefits.

Ashley Hall, 21, is graduating in May from Boston College with a B.A. in accounting and already has a full-time position lined up with KPMG. She earlier had an internship with the company and was drawn there in part because she says they value work-life balance.

"As long as you are willing to put in the effort to interview and network, there's definitely a job market out there," Hall says.

Stephanie Lee, 20, of Milwaukee, is a junior at Marquette University who has already gotten some contacts from potential employers. She expects to graduate in May 2008 with a major in information technology and marketing.

"The outlook for IT grads is going to be great. I get numerous e-mails from IT professors with opportunities," Lee says. "It's very positive."

Commercial Boom Softens Housing Bust (WP)

By Nell Henderson
The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

To understand why the housing slump hasn't dragged the economy into a recession, it helps to visit the Smoketown Plaza in Woodbridge, where the thumping of hammers signals the healthy pulse of a building boom that's still going strong.

Just two miles off Interstate 95, hard-hatted construction workers clamber up dusty ladders and scaffolding, hanging wallboard, laying bricks and drilling metal frames in a buzz of activity aimed at completing a new Arby's drive-through restaurant in time to open by mid-December.

Inspecting the progress as she crosses the bare concrete floor, stepping around the pipes and exposed wires and pointing with pleasure to the gleaming metal frame where the menu board will hang, Christy Gilligan envisions how the place will look when hungry commuters rush in after work for a quick bite, entering through a glass foyer with a two-story cathedral ceiling into a dining room seating 84.

"I see opportunity," said Gilligan, vice president of development with ACW Corp., of Wilmington, Del., a family-owned Arby's franchiser building the restaurant, its fourth in Prince William County.

Many other executives are making similar calculations across the Washington area and throughout the country, boosting non-residential construction enough over the past year to more than offset the decline in home construction. That boom is helping to cushion the impact of the housing slump on the economy.

The nation's harshest housing downturn in 15 years has unquestionably inflicted pain on many homeowners, builders and their suppliers. The plunge in new home construction was severe enough alone to slice a full percentage point off the nation's economic growth in the July-through-September period, depressing the increase in total economic output to a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate. And the housing market hasn't hit bottom, according to the figures since then.

DOJ_NMG_0098075

But the rest of the economy outside of housing remains largely healthy. With unemployment low, wages and stock prices rising and fuel prices ebbing, consumers continue to boost their spending. And businesses are increasing their capital investment, spending more on buildings, equipment and providing new fuel for the economic expansion.

Builders of non-residential projects say they are simply playing catch-up. So many new neighborhoods filled up during the housing boom that they're still building the stores, offices, restaurants, bank branches, hotels and hospitals needed to serve the influx of residents.

In Prince William County, for example, the population surged by 23 percent in the past five years, during the peak of the home-building boom, to 374,678 people. Now, many residents complain they have to drive too far, often to Fairfax County, for basic business services.

The companies that provide those services "don't build until they see the rooftops" over new customers, said Bill Fairchild, president of R.W. Murray Co., a construction contractor in Manassas that's overseeing the Arby's on Minnieville Road and a dozen other non-residential projects in Northern Virginia. "People have got to get groceries. They've got to get their hair cut. They need to go to the cleaners."

Nationwide, building contractors are expanding factories to crank out more exports to meet rising demand from overseas. Others are modernizing refineries to squeeze more fuel out of oil. And the recent volatility in world oil prices has spurred a wave of investment in alternative fuel plants, said Kenneth Simonson, chief economist of the Associated General Contractors of America. Scores of ethanol plants are under construction or being planned across the country.

The money spent on private non-residential construction nationally rose a sizzling 19.2 percent over the 12 months that ended in September, according to Census data. In addition, state and local governments are building roads, schools and other public buildings. Public construction rose a robust 11.6 percent in the year ended in September.

Add it all up and the increase in non-residential work more than offset the 6.7 percent decline in home building over the same period, so the value of all construction rose a net 2.9 percent.

These figures have heartened many analysts, who predict the housing slump will continue to dampen economic growth through next year but will not lead to a recession.

"The expected further weakening in housing activity is likely to be largely offset by business capital spending," Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, said in a speech last month.

More pessimistic analysts say it is too soon to know how far or for how long the housing market will slide, or how much it might hurt the rest of the economy. They note that total construction spending fell 0.3 percent from August to September, a trend that would be worrisome if it continued. But so far, they agree, the economy is holding up pretty well.

"The problems in housing have not bled into the rest of the job market, at least not yet," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

On the contrary, job growth has been so strong that the national unemployment rate fell in October to 4.4 percent, the lowest in more than five years. The Washington area job market is even tighter, with a jobless rate of 3 percent in September, the latest month for which figures are available.

And "if you're any kind of construction worker in the Washington area, it's not hard to find work," said Gene Pinder, business manager for the Baltimore-Washington Laborers' District Council, which represents 7,000 laborers, the workers who pour concrete and asphalt, prepare sites and handle building materials for both residential and non-residential construction projects. "The industry is still red-hot."

At general contractor R.W. Murray, for example, "we never stop hiring," Fairchild said. "There's just a shortage in our industry, nationally" of skilled workers.

Lacker, the Richmond Fed President, whose territory includes metropolitan Washington, predicted that "further increases in non-residential construction will allow many workers to simply change construction jobs rather than become unemployed."

That is at least partly true, builders said. Some, but not all, residential construction workers can shift to non-residential projects, which typically pay more and require higher skill levels. Among those who can make the change are project managers, site supervisors, accountants and other office workers involved in design, engineering, legal and financial work.

For example, R.W. Murray's site supervisor on the Arby's project, Scott Merryman, previously worked for a home-building company.

But much of the work in non-residential construction is more specialized and more complicated than in housing. Such tasks include electrical wiring, installing heating and air conditioning systems, operating multi-story tower cranes and erecting metal frames.

Even installing wallboard in a fast-food restaurant requires different skills than doing so in a house, Merryman said.

Companies, too, are suffering different fates depending on how strongly they specialize in housing compared to commercial work.

DOJ_NMG_0098076

Home builders KB Home and Ryland Group Inc. have cut hundreds of jobs. Mortgage lenders Countrywide Financial Corp., Washington Mutual Inc. and Ameriquest Mortgage Co. are laying off thousands.

Masco Corp. reported a 4 percent decline in its third-quarter profits because of lower sales of its cabinets, faucets, bathtubs, windows, doors and other home fixtures.

Weyerhaeuser Co. said its third-quarter earnings fell 26 percent because of lower wood product sales, lumber prices and log prices.

The companies feeling a little less pain are those that also supply or transport materials for non-residential construction.

In Chicago, for example, USG Corp., the nation's largest maker of gypsum wallboard, suffered a 3 percent drop in earnings in the third quarter because of the housing slowdown. But the results would have been worse if not for the non-residential market, which accounts for about 40 percent of the company's business, said spokesman Robert Williams.

The growing commercial market "certainly does cushion the impact of the softening of the residential market," Williams said.

Many people who live in the neighborhoods that arose during the boom say they're happy to see commercial construction catch up, bringing more services to their neighborhoods.

"I remember when I was growing up, it was nothing but houses being built," said Melissa Rook, 20, of Manassas, a college student tapping on her laptop in a Panera restaurant at the Signal Hill Shopping Center. "Now they're always building another restaurant, another place to go."

And Rook said she wants more places to go. "I would definitely be happier if there was a bigger mall in Manassas," Rook said, explaining that she often treks to the malls in neighboring Fairfax County for serious shopping.

It was consumers like Rook who prompted Arby's corporate marketing people to advise Gilligan's company to move into Northern Virginia in the late 1990s as the population was expanding.

"There was definite potential here," Gilligan said, recalling what she found when she moved to Manassas in 1998.

Gilligan said she chose the site at Smoketown Plaza because it is near both new homes and new workplaces, full of hungry suburbanites. She is already planning two more Arby's elsewhere in the county -- jobs that will help keep the construction industry busy.

"We're doing very well," Gilligan said. "We're seeing growth."

How Housing Slump Is Risk To Big Three Rebound (WSJ)

By Mike Spector, Jeffrey C. Mccracken And Neal E. Boudette

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

DETROIT -- Detroit's beleaguered Big Three auto makers face a new risk to their turnaround plans: After a string of strong years, U.S. auto sales are slowing and an increasing number of forecasts say sales could fall next year to their lowest level in nearly a decade.

Slowing growth in the overall U.S. economy and the slump in the housing industry, particularly in big markets such as California, are hitting at a bad time for General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group. All three are losing money in North America at current sales volumes. A downturn in vehicle demand would make it even more difficult to regain profitability -- and to clear out bulging inventories of unsold vehicles without costly production cuts or discounts.

"A softer market really stresses the Big Three out," said David Cole, president of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Mich. "For them, lower volume is not good."

But even some strong Japanese and European players face pressure. Toyota Motor Corp. and BMW AG, for example, could be hurt by any downturn in California, where they control a large chunk of the market.

Toyota has spent billions of dollars building a plant in Texas to assemble a new full-size pickup truck due to hit showrooms early next year. But the housing slowdown and high gas prices have damped pickup-truck sales in the past few months. That could make it harder for Toyota to hit its sales targets with its new truck, the Tundra.

IRN, a Michigan market researcher, is now forecasting U.S. 2007 sales of 16.3 million light vehicles, or cars and trucks. That would be the lowest level since 1998 and a drop of 300,000 from this year's expected sales of 16.6 million vehicles.

"To be honest, there is a lot more downside risk to that than there is a chance it gets better," said Erich Merkle, IRN's director of forecasting.

Some auto makers are more optimistic. Both GM and Toyota are forecasting sales of 16.5 million cars and trucks in 2007. The market "feels a little soft right now, but our forecasts say [sales] will get better through [2007]," especially if gasoline prices and interest rates remain stable, said Troy Clarke, GM president for North America.

Analysts at Bank of America, Wachovia Corp. and Citigroup are expecting a sharper decline, as is investor Wilbur Ross, who has spent hundreds of millions of dollars in the past 18 months buying battered auto suppliers.

DOJ_NMG_0098077

Mr. Ross thinks 2007 sales will be about 16.2 million light vehicles, noting that U.S. consumers bought 50 million cars and trucks in the past three years. "How many more can you sell?" he said.

The Detroit auto makers are also now less willing to use expensive rebates to prop up demand than they were a few years ago, Mr. Ross said, adding that "these deals went on for longer than I expected, frankly, but I think they are done now."

A big factor, most forecasters said, is the decline in home values and the recent string of U.S. interest-rate increases.

In California, where many people have adjustable-rate mortgages on pricey homes, the interest-rate increases have saddled them with higher monthly mortgage payments, leaving them with less disposable income to spend on new cars.

Auto sales in California plunged 16% in the third quarter and show little sign of bouncing back soon. Bert Boeckmann, owner of a huge Ford dealership in North Hills, Calif., said he sold about 300 fewer cars and trucks in October than a year ago. It is "a case of just not having the traffic," he said.

For 2007, the California Motor Car Dealers Association is forecasting a 2.5% drop in new-car registrations.

In addition to California, big dealer groups say south Florida, Arizona and other areas where home values are down are also seeing declines in vehicle sales.

The impact of the housing slump is likely to be hard on the Big Three because slower housing starts cause builders to defer purchases of pickup trucks, which are Detroit's most profitable models.

GM, Ford and Chrysler have also seen their collective market share slip a few points to 54% so far this year. If their share remains steady and 2007 sales come in under 16.6 million vehicles, the Big Three would end up selling fewer than nine million cars and trucks next year.

On Black Friday, Fewer People, More Spent (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

Fewer consumers turned out for the post-Thanksgiving shopping bonanza this year, but they spent more than last year as they stocked their carts with expensive electronics, according to a retail trade group.

The National Retail Federation estimated that 140 million people hit the stores and shopped online over the past four days, down about 5 million from last year. Black Friday, the symbolic kickoff of the holiday season for retailers, drew about 58.9 million people, down more than 1 million.

Thanksgiving weekend has become an important marker for retailers, as they battle to offer the biggest discounts to shoppers and, in the process, generate the most buzz. This year, many stores opened at midnight on Thursday. CompUSA beat that, opening for three hours Thanksgiving night.

Shoppers responded by pulling out their wallets. People spent an average of $360.15 this year, up 18.9 percent from last year, according to a survey conducted by BIGresearch. Scott Krugman, a spokesman for the National Retail Federation, said spending was driven by high-priced technology items such as flat screen TVs.

"This year, stores did not disappoint, as deals on high definition televisions and apparel were just too good to pass up, bringing millions of people out of their Thanksgiving cocoons," said the retail federation president, Tracy Mullin.

The credit card company Visa USA also reported strong sales in electronics on Friday, along with furniture and home furnishings. Average spending, including gasoline and restaurant purchases, was up 8.7 percent, the company said.

The retail research firm ShopperTrak estimated total spending on Friday reached $8.96 billion, up 6 percent from last year. It attributed the boost in part to declining energy costs and extended discounts that day.

"Retailers need to remain cautious," said Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak. "But undoubtedly this type of a season opening is a nice shot in the arm for the industry."

The National Retail Federation predicts retail sales during November and December to grow at a modest 5 percent compared to last year, reaching $457.4 billion. As of Sunday, consumers reported having completed about 35 percent of their holiday shopping, according to the BIGresearch survey. Just less than 9 percent said they were finished.

When The Democrats Take Back K Street (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, November 27, 2006

The reception thrown by Nancy Pelosi at the Capitol a week after the Democrats prevailed in congressional elections was a party some power players had been waiting more than a decade to attend. The fÃªte was for newly elected freshmen lawmakers, but Pelosi's invited guests included big-name Democratic lobbyists like Jack Quinn, Tony Podesta and Steve Elmendorf. Said a partygoer: "I thought to myself, they're all back, all the same old faces. It was just like old times."

DOJ_NMG_0098078

For 12 years, Democratic lobbyists lost influence--and money--as Republicans tightened their hold on power. G.O.P. leaders amplified the effect by launching an overt effort to push Democrats out of trade associations and lobbying firms, with the aim of increasing the G.O.P.'s share of campaign contributions from the groups' clients. G.O.P. leaders also punished firms that were too Democrat-friendly by excluding them from meetings on the Hill. The combined effect of power and persuasion added up to a decade of Republican domination in the business of influence peddling.

But the Democrats are making their comeback on K Street, the metonymic home of Washington's $2.36 billion lobbying business. A gold rush is under way for lobbyists who have an in with the winning team. Firms are hiring away key Democratic congressional staff members and bidding up the salaries of Democrats already in the business. And companies that tilt Democratic are signing clients from industries that previously relied on Republican outfits.

There's one hitch. It's not supposed to be like old times. In an election in which exit polls identified corruption as the No. 1 voting issue and Washington's biggest corruption scandal involved lobbying, Democrats won in part by promising to curtail K Street's excesses. Pelosi has said her first act as Speaker of the House in January will be to pass new rules limiting contact between lobbyists and lawmakers. Later in 2007, Pelosi plans to rewrite the laws on pork-barrel spending. She promises that the overall effect of her reforms will be "to break the link between lobbyists and legislation" in Washington.

Who will win the coming battle between reformers and revanchists? The market is betting against reform. Demand for anyone with access to powerful Democrats on the Hill is soaring. Lobbyists who couldn't get a meeting are suddenly a hot commodity. "I've gotten a lot of calls from headhunters in the last two months," says Florence Prioleau, a lobbyist who has maintained close ties with her former boss, New York's Charles Rangel, incoming chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Pelosi's former chief of staff, George Crawford, has just been hired by Amgen, a biotech company, to represent its interests with the new Congress. Toby Moffett, a former Democratic Congressman from Connecticut now with the Livingston Group, says he recently told a Republican lobbyist desperate to hire Democrats that he had two options: "One is to go after [congressional] staff members who are thinking of leaving, maybe someone with tuitions to pay. The second is to overpay for people who weren't thinking of leaving."

Lobbying firms can gross multimillions-- Livingston takes in some $10.9 million a year--by winning annual contracts worth $180,000 to $600,000 from businesses, individuals, churches, universities, states and municipalities. Those clients are willing to pay because of the large sums of money that lobbyists can help them obtain from Congress. Earmarks, the targeted handouts that have dramatically expanded over the past decade, now total in the tens of billions a year. And everyone wants a piece. "The key thing for me," says a Democratic lobbyist at a top K Street firm, "is don't miss the moment. It's a big opportunity here."

All that money will be working against Pelosi's link-breaking efforts. The Speaker's proposed rule changes would ban lobbyist-paid meals, gifts and travel for lawmakers of the sort that made superlobbyist Jack Abramoff a household name. She also proposes to double to two years the cooling-off period during which former staff members are barred from lobbying their ex-bosses. And Pelosi has pledged to open the earmarking process to public scrutiny so that tax money could no longer be funneled secretly to special interests. Reform-minded Republican Representative Jeff Flake of Arizona says the Democrats' plans, if fully implemented, would in fact be "definitive" and "preferable" to the changes the G.O.P. pushed through Congress in the wake of the Abramoff scandal.

But even if Pelosi delivers the particulars of what she has so far pledged, it's not exactly a revolution she's offering. The gifts, free meals and travel she proposes to ban are largely symbolic perks to lawmakers. Serious oversight, of the kind proposed by some reformers, would include a new office of public integrity and an independent investigator to shine a light on greedy congressional rule breakers. And Pelosi's promised transparency on earmarks is a step down from Democratic campaign vows to ban earmarks sponsored by a lawmaker if the spending benefits the member, his or her spouse, relatives or firms that employ any of them. What's more, Pelosi has tapped Wisconsin's David Obey, a 37-year veteran of the House who is the top Democratic appropriator, with drafting the actual earmark reforms, a troubling choice given that Obey was responsible for approximately 40% of the past earmarks under an informal system established by both parties, according to Scott Lilly, Obey's former chief of staff.

Some Democrats have openly resisted even mild reform. Representative Jim Moran of Virginia announced at a campaign stop in June that he would "earmark the [expletive]" out of spending bills if he got the chance. John Murtha, a Pelosi confidant, told centrist lawmakers the week after the election that he thought her reform measures were "total crap." Democratic lobbyists are doing what they can to fuel the naysaying. "Republican lobbyists have been writing legislation that needs to be reformed, so are we just going to cut off lobbying completely now that we have the chance to fix things?" asks a top Democratic lobbyist.

But the biggest obstacle to lobbying reform may be that in an electoral system almost entirely dependent on campaign donations, lawmakers and wealthy interests will always find a way to connect. Members of Congress know their job security depends on the money they raise before each election, and much of that comes from K Street. "The dirty little secret is that the biggest lobby in town is members of Congress lobbying us," says the Livingston Group's Moffett. Moffett says he bumped into a powerful Senator last spring. They sat on a bench overlooking the city and talked about Moffett's clients. After a few minutes, Moffett gave the Senator his card. By the time the lobbyist got back to his office, the Senator's campaign staff had sent him an invitation to a $1,000-a-plate fund raiser. "When you're holding the chum," says Flake, the Arizona Representative seeking reform, "you can't complain about the sharks."

DOJ_NMG_0098079

Democratic Gains In Suburbs Spell Trouble For GOP (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats made large gains in suburbia in this month's elections, pushing Republican turf to the outer edges of major population centers in a trend that could signal trouble for the GOP, an analysis shows.

Democrats carried nearly 60% of the U.S. House vote in inner suburbs in the nation's 50 largest metropolitan areas, up from about 53% in 2002, according to the analysis by the Metropolitan Institute at Virginia Tech.

They received nearly 55% of the vote in the next ring of "mature" 20- and 30-year-old suburbs, with 45% going to Republicans and third-party candidates. In 2002, the last midterm election, Democrats received 50% of the vote there.

"Republicans are getting pushed to the fringes of the metropolis," said sociologist Robert Lang, director of the institute. "They simply have to be more competitive in more suburbs," he said, to win statewide and presidential races.

The line between blue Democratic and red Republican territory used to be drawn at the outer boundaries of close-in "streetcar suburbs" with older housing and signs of decline, Lang said. They've become steadily more Democratic in the four elections since 2000, he said, and now are "solid blue."

Well-established or "mature" suburbs increasingly are turning Democratic, Lang said. He said the trend probably is permanent because such suburbs have become denser and have drawn more foreign-born residents as Republicans have moved farther from urban cores.

Republicans this year continued to win in small cities up to 50,000, as well as fast-growing exurban and rural areas. Lang called the exurbs and "emerging suburbs" volatile, noting Democrats had been losing ground there but cut GOP victory margins in half this year.

Suburban strength helped Democrats win House and Senate seats across the country. Democrat Patrick Murphy's win over GOP Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick in Pennsylvania's Bucks County is one example.

In 2002, the Democratic candidate won 36.9% of the vote against Republican Rep. Jim Greenwood in the county, an emerging Philadelphia suburb. This year, Democrat Murphy received 49.8% of the vote to Fitzpatrick's 50.2%. Fitzpatrick, a 10-year county commissioner, won the House seat in 2004.

Murphy also raised the Democratic victory margin by 14 percentage points in slivers of two other counties in the district. The gains allowed him to squeak to a 1,521-vote victory in unofficial returns.

Neil Newhouse, a GOP pollster whose firm handled more than 75 House and Senate races, said Republicans lost all kinds of voters, not just suburbanites. The main reason was Iraq, he said, and "I assume by the next midterm election in 2010 this will be resolved."

Democratic pollster Geoffrey Garin said Republican appeal is waning in the inner suburbs, due in part to socially conservative positions, while Democrats are getting better at reaching suburban voters. They have "doubled, tripled and quadrupled" their efforts to be competitive in exurbs and emerging suburbs, Garin said, since the "huge shock" of losing 97 of the country's 100 fastest-growing counties in 2004.

A G.O.P. Breed Loses Its Place In New England (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 26 — It was a species as endemic to New England as craggy seascapes and creamy clam chowder: the moderate Yankee Republican.

Dignified in demeanor, independent in ideology and frequently blue in blood, they were politicians in the mold of Roosevelt and Rockefeller: socially tolerant, environmentally enthusiastic, people who liked government to keep its wallet close to its vest and its hands out of social issues like abortion and, in recent years, same-sex marriage.

But this election dealt the already-fading New England Republican an especially strong blow, one that some fear will increase the divide between the two parties nationally by removing a longstanding bridge between them.

Of 22 members of the newly elected House of Representatives from New England, only one is a Republican: Christopher Shays of Connecticut, who eked out a victory while two other Republicans from his state, Representatives Nancy L. Johnson and Rob Simmons, lost to Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0098080

In Massachusetts, where the Statehouse in Boston had been steeped in Republican governors for 16 years, voters threw the party overboard like so much tea.

In Rhode Island, exit polls gave Senator Lincoln Chafee, a popular moderate Republican from a long-admired political family, a 62 percent approval rating. But before they exited the polls, most voters rejected him, many feeling it was more important to give the Democrats a chance at controlling the Senate.

In New Hampshire, the state's two congressmen, Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley, both Republicans, were ousted; Mr. Bradley was defeated by a virtual unknown with a virtually empty bank account. And for the first time since 1874, both houses of the state legislature now have Democratic majorities.

"That to me is one of the most astounding things that happened on Election Day," said Warren Rudman, the former New Hampshire senator who embodies the essence of the New England Republican. "What that tells me is that huge numbers of people in New Hampshire who are either moderate Republicans or independents voted a straight Democratic ticket. They turned out people who had served long and well in the New Hampshire legislature."

Yankee Republican is "a label that's almost lost its meaning in 2006," said Gary L. Rose, a professor of politics at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn. "The Republican Party has lost a very important voice internally, too, and that only further exacerbates the polarization between the parties. Something's going to be lost here in American politics without their voice."

In New England, Republican losses were partly because of the filtering down of anti-Bush and antiwar sentiment, but other factors played a role as well, including some that had been simmering for years, experts and local Republicans say.

Walter Peterson, a former New Hampshire governor and lifelong Republican, this year became the co-chairman of Republicans for John Lynch, the incumbent Democratic governor.

"What the people want is basically to feel like the candidates of a political party are working for the people, not just following some niche issues," Mr. Peterson said. "The old traditional Republican Party was conservative on small government, efficient government; believed in supporting people to give them a chance at life but not having people on the dole; wanted a balanced budget; and on social issues they were moderate, tolerant, live and let live. They didn't dislike somebody from other religious viewpoints."

He continued, "That was the old-fashioned conservative, but the word conservative today has been bastardized."

Of course, not all elected Republicans in New England are moderate. New Hampshire's senators, John E. Sununu and Judd Gregg, whose terms were not up this year, are more to the right of their counterparts in the region. The departing governor of Massachusetts, Mitt Romney, was elected in 2002 as a moderate, but has emphasized more conservative views in the last year as he considers a run for president.

Other remaining Republicans include Maine's senators, Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins, both moderate mavericks. The Republican governors of Vermont, Rhode Island and Connecticut, all of whom were returned to office, are not considered conservative.

Even so, in Rhode Island, city council members across the state lost longtime Republican seats, and in the Connecticut legislature, Democrats achieved a veto-proof majority for the first time in 25 years.

"Several states in New England have fairly high numbers of independent voters, and those folks broke 2 to 1 for Democrats," said Constantine J. Spiliotes, director of research for the New Hampshire Institute of Politics at St. Anselm College in Manchester, N.H. "They usually split pretty evenly."

At their height, New England Republicans wielded powerful political influence, "dominating the Northeast at the turn of the 20th century, just as Democrats used to dominate the South," said Julian E. Zelizer, a history professor at Boston University.

Prominent examples of their brand of independent-minded pragmatism included senators like Lowell P. Weicker Jr. of Connecticut, William S. Cohen of Maine, James M. Jeffords of Vermont, and Mr. Chafee and his father, John Chafee, who served in the Senate for more than 20 years.

But in recent decades, the ranks of such Republicans have gradually thinned. Professor Rose dates it to the "historic 1964 national Republican convention when Goldwater won the presidential nomination against Rockefeller."

Professor Zelizer cites a "strategy since the 1970s when the Republicans went South, went after the core Democratic voters and began to be very closely allied with the conservative moment, which wasn't rooted in the Northeast at all."

People like Mr. Weicker and Mr. Jeffords left the Republican Party. Mr. Chafee said he was weighing whether to do the same.

"I'm caught between the state party, which I'm very comfortable in, and the national party, which I'm not," said Mr. Chafee, adding that he was considering the merits of "sticking it out and hoping the pendulum swings back."

In Massachusetts, Deval L. Patrick, a Democrat, was elected governor, defeating Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey in what was partly considered a rebuke of Governor Romney.

DOJ_NMG_0098081

The executive director of the Massachusetts Republican Party, Brian Dodge, said New England Republicans often faced challenges because the region had many centrists.

"Moderate Republicans tend to represent moderate districts," Mr. Dodge said. "Therefore they're more susceptible to the varying inclinations of independently minded voters. If there is a national perception that all things Republican are bad, you're going to have a hard time convincing independents to come your way."

Jody Dow, the Republican national committeewoman for Massachusetts, said she thought the scope of the Republican defeat this month came as a surprise to many in the party. "People are looking and saying to themselves, we need to have a moderate approach to things," Ms. Dow said. "We need to find people who really can win races," she continued. "We need to go back and do more grass roots."

In New Hampshire, before the election, the State House of Representatives had had a majority of Democrats only once in 132 years, in 1922; the Senate had been Democratic only twice, in 1912 and 1998. Registered Republicans still outnumber Democrats, but increasing numbers of voters are independent, and the election results were shaped not just by the war and the national party's conservative bent, experts and Republicans said.

Mr. Lynch, the Democratic governor, appealed to a broad spectrum of voters because of his opposition to raising taxes. Demographic changes also played a role, especially the influx of people from out of state, mostly retirees and employees of New Hampshire's burgeoning technology industry.

Most newcomers are independent, "trying to figure out which party is more welcoming, and that's clearly the Democratic Party right now," Mr. Peterson said. "If the national party doesn't make a home for independents, the Republicans are going to start losing. I don't think they realize it yet, but I think they're going to have to throw out their whole playbook."

Wayne Semprini, chairman of the Republican Party in New Hampshire, said he planned to travel the state on a listening tour, holding focus groups with independents.

"We really have to get our arms around those people," Mr. Semprini said. "The Yankee Republican may be slipping away to some degree. There's no question right now that the Republicans are going to have to stand up and step up to the plate and try and turn this around immediately."

Election '06: Lessons Learned By Dissecting Votes (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

Political scientists and campaign strategists are studying voting returns and exit polls for lessons from the election this month that upended 12 years of predominantly Republican rule on Capitol Hill.

In this seismic campaign, the ground really did shift — establishing a solidly Democratic Northeast to counter the Republican South and propelling a new battleground region in the Mountain West.

The results demonstrated the limits of President Bush's strategy of appealing to base voters: This time, there was a revolt in the center of the electorate. And even as the stock market set records and unemployment fell, unease about the economy rivaled opposition to the Iraq war as a voting issue in some key states.

USA TODAY's Susan Page looks at what we learned in 2006 — and what it might mean for next time.

Lesson 1 The Center Didn't Hold (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

The last midterm election that brought upheavals in Congress was in 1994, when Republicans ousted Democrats from control of the House and Senate courtesy of a voter pundits dubbed "the angry white man." This time, election foment was driven by independents and moderates who had supported Republicans, particularly in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks, but now turned against the GOP. Republican pollster Frank Luntz calls them "Republican Rejecters," about 15% of the electorate.

They included a broad swath of the nation's demography, among them younger people, women, the liberal-leaning and less-religious voters — that is, those who attend church no more than occasionally.

"The people who made the biggest difference overall were the least ideological and partisan people," says Andy Kohut, director of the non-partisan Pew Research Center. Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf, who spent 12 years as a top House aide, calls it "a triumph of the center."

One victim: The approach successfully pursued by Bush's top strategist, Karl Rove, in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections — driving up turnout among the economic and social conservatives who make up the GOP's base. Nine of 10 Republicans still supported the party's candidates for the U.S. House. But independents, who make up a quarter of the electorate, swung decisively toward Democrats, 57%-39%.

That's a drop of 9 percentage points for the GOP compared with the last midterm election, in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0098082

Those voters-in-the-middle, not tethered to either party, are likely to be the focus of attention for candidates in both parties in 2008.

Partisans Were Loyal; Independents Swung Left (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

Source: Exit polls Nov. 7 conducted for the Associated Press and TV networks

Lesson 2 Reaching Out Is Hard To Do (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

George W. Bush appealed to Hispanic voters as the two-term governor of Texas, and he has made a concerted effort to do the same as president. In an effort to cut into Democrats' solid support among African-Americans, the GOP with some fanfare nominated black candidates this year for governorships in Ohio and Pennsylvania and a U.S. Senate seat in Maryland.

Even so, Republican support among black voters didn't budge. Republican candidates for the U.S. House received 10%, one percentage point lower than when Bush was first elected in 2000. Among Hispanics, Republican support fell by nearly a third compared with 2004. Republicans received 44% of the support among the nation's fastest-growing ethnic group then; it dropped to 30% this year.

For these voters, actions spoke louder than words, says Republican strategist Scott Reed, who ran Bob Dole's presidential campaign in 1996. Resistance among African-Americans "was 100% related to Katrina," he says, amid dismay at the Bush administration's faltering response to victims of the 2005 hurricane, many of whom were black. Reed sees a backlash among Hispanics to GOP actions on immigration, including legislation Bush signed two weeks before the election to build a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexican border.

The outgoing Republican national chairman, Ken Mehlman, notes that some Republicans, including California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, garnered significant support from Hispanics. But Mehlman acknowledges the GOP share generally was disappointing — and worrisome. With an increasingly diverse population in the United States, he says of Republicans, "we rely too much on white guys for our voters."

Lesson 3 It's Not Your Father's USA (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

The nation's political geography is shifting.

The East and West coasts continue to be mostly Democratic, and the South is still Republican territory. But the Northeast became a Democratic stronghold this year as Republicans lost nearly a third of their U.S. House seats in those 12 states. Connecticut's Christopher Shays is now the only Republican House member from New England.

And the Mountain West, so Republican that President Bush carried all eight of its states in 2004, now has four Democratic governors. In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester's victory over three-term GOP Sen. Conrad Burns helped clinch Democratic control of the Senate.

Those regional changes alter some of the strategic calculations in the 2008 presidential race.

"Democrats consolidated their hold on the Northeast so firmly that it now provides a greater building block for the Democrats than the South provides for the GOP," says Rhodes Cook, a non-partisan analyst who studies voting trends.

Thomas Schaller, a political scientist at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, argues in his book Whistling Past Dixie that Democrats now can win a presidential election without carrying a single Southern state — something that has never happened.

Lesson 4 Economic Statistics Didn't Persuade Voters (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

The Democratic Senate challengers who won — Sherrod Brown in Ohio, Bob Casey in Pennsylvania, Claire McCaskill in Missouri, Jim Webb in Virginia and Jon Tester in Montana — all struck populist themes in their campaigns. Particularly in the nation's heartland, anxiety about slow-rising wages, outsourced jobs, imperiled pensions and the rising costs of health care and college tuition overwhelmed relatively good economic news on corporate earnings, productivity and employment.

"There was more money spent on campaign ads painting Big Oil and Big Pharma as enemies than painting (Osama) bin Laden as a threat — and that's when the economy is good," says Robert Borosage of the left-leaning Campaign for America's Future. "The reality of the insecurity that is very widespread in this society economically, the unraveling of the social compact with workers, is going to frame a lot of the debate in '08, I would suspect."

DOJ_NMG_0098083

Nearly four of 10 voters said in exit polls that the economy was extremely important to their vote. They favored Democratic House candidates 59%-39%. For many Americans, pollster Frank Luntz says, "a desired quality of life seems more and more difficult to attain every day."

Free-trade agreements that the Bush administration backs will now face a cooler reception in Congress. That includes a planned free-trade area of the Americas and a separate deal with Peru. In the week after the elections, House GOP leaders were unable to push through a relatively uncontroversial bill to establish permanent trading with Vietnam.

Lesson 5 A Vote For Change, But To What? (USAT)

USA Today, November 27, 2006

It was a decisive election but not an ideological sweep.

Anxious about the Iraq war and the direction of the country, voters gave Democrats their biggest congressional victory in a generation. Voters supported change, yes. But change to what? That's not so clear. "There's a large turn against where we've been and no clarity about where we're going," says Robert Borosage of Campaign for America's Future.

"Democrats basically ran as … 'We're not them,' " says Rhodes Cook, editor of The Rhodes Cook Letter, which tracks election results. Democrats prevailed by accusing the governing Republican Party of mishandling Iraq and domestic challenges but generally didn't outline clear solutions.

What's more, the nation continues to be almost evenly divided politically. Neither party has won more than 53% of the U.S. House vote since 1990, and neither has carried more than 51% of the popular vote for president since 1988.

On the rise: none-of-the-above. The proportion of Democratic voters in the 27 states with party registration has declined from 1994 to 2006, but the Republican share hasn't risen. Instead, the ranks of independents have swelled.

"The growing independent center can swing either way, and it happened to swing Democrats' way this time," Cook says. "It's still a very volatile, almost-even period where you can't say either party has the advantage — and the growth is not with either party, it's with the mass of independents. In other words: To be continued."

Returning Rookies Reflect On Lessons Learned (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — On the day nearly two years ago when they were sworn into office, liberal Democrat Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida and conservative Republican Patrick McHenry from North Carolina found themselves symbols of Congress' diversity and its potential for discord.

"We were portrayed as the yin and the yang of the 109th Congress," says McHenry, recalling a USA TODAY story from January 2005 in which the two were featured with six other newly elected members of Congress.

McHenry and Wasserman Schultz proved opposites could work together. On Nov. 15, the pair won approval for a bill they wrote on how certain assets are handled in a bankruptcy. Their measure passed, 395-0, and is on its way to President Bush's desk for his signature.

"If Patrick McHenry and I can find common ground, anybody can," Wasserman Schultz says.

As they move into the final days of their first Congress, the eight freshmen USA TODAY spotlighted on their first day in office say they remain committed to bipartisanship. It's their top piece of advice to new legislators: Make friends with your political enemies.

"In order to get something done," says Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., "you have to work across party lines."

All eight freshmen profiled on their first day in Congress last year will be returning for the legislative session that begins in January. Even though they are rookie members of a club where seniority counts, they compiled a record of accomplishment.

For example, Martinez just won Bush's backing to become the next general chairman of the national Republican Party. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois says he's thinking about running for the Democratic Party's 2008 presidential nomination and is "getting a lot of encouragement."

The Democrats' sweep of both chambers in the Nov. 7 elections elated Rep. Al Green. "This will be the first time in my life I've been in the majority," says the Texas Democrat.

He's looking forward to a chance to increase the minimum wage and expand health insurance coverage, two issues important to his Houston district, home to many low-income households.

Rep. Mike Conaway, a Texan from the other side of the state and the other end of the political spectrum from Green, is undaunted by the GOP losses.

The Republican accountant was George W. Bush's business partner when the president headed the Texas Rangers baseball team. Conaway spent much of his first term working on Bush's proposed overhaul of the Social Security system.

DOJ_NMG_0098084

"Then Katrina happened," Conaway said, referring to the 2005 hurricane that ravaged New Orleans and the Gulf Coast.

Conaway hopes the new Congress will turn its attention to Social Security's long-term solvency problems. He says he's confident he'll have allies in the new majority because he went out of his way in his first term to befriend some Democrats, such as Oklahoma Rep. Dan Boren and fellow Texan Henry Cuellar.

Like Conaway, several of the other freshmen from the 109th Congress made friends across party lines. Some used their new friendships to score legislative victories:

·Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., combined forces with Sen. Tim Johnson, a Democrat from his home state whom he once tried to unseat, to save Ellsworth Air Force Base from being closed.

·Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., joined the bipartisan group of 14 senators who struck a deal to allow confirmation of some of Bush's controversial judicial nominees.

·Obama and Sen. Tom Coburn, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, reached an agreement with House Republican leaders to require that all federal contracts be logged into a public database. The two senators believe that disclosure will help prevent the waste of taxpayer dollars. "This bill is a small but significant step toward changing the culture in Washington," Coburn said.

The Obama-Coburn friendship grew out of a freshman orientation program for senators designed by three former governors and a former state attorney general now serving in the chamber.

"All of us had our roots outside of Washington and were accustomed to working together," says Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., one of the Senate's ex-governors.

This year, Senate freshmen orientation began with a presentation by Sens. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, on how they work together on defense issues. Alexander describes them as "two World War II veterans who put the Senate and the country first." The goal, Alexander says, was to show the new senators "how the Senate is supposed to work."

Besides working across party lines, the freshmen from the 109th Congress say their other piece of advice to the newly elected is to make time for their lives outside of work. For Obama, that meant telling his staff that Sunday would be the day he devoted to his family.

"You have to lay down some very strict parameters for your scheduler if you want to have a family life," says Obama, father of two young girls.

Wasserman Shultz agrees. Her datebook includes time blocked for holiday shows, soccer games and dance classes.

"I put my kids' entire schedule on my schedule, and schedule around it," says the mother of three. "I've gotten so good that I'm my 7-year-old's Brownie troop leader, and I've only missed three meetings."

Red '08 Hopeful Targets Blue Collars (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

Rep. Duncan Hunter considers himself the Republicans' best bet to reconstitute the blue-collar coalition that helped the party win the White House in the 1980s.

Mr. Hunter, who is seeking the presidential nomination in 2008, says he can rebuild that coalition by campaigning on defense, traditional values and fair trade.

"Keeping American jobs in this country is a strong tie between the Republican Party and working America, Main Street America -- that's a portion of our constituency I aim to retrieve, because I stand strong with them," the 13-term congressman from California said in a recent interview, pointing to votes against almost every free-trade agreement during his 26 years in the Capitol.

Mr. Hunter, the first to announce officially that he is exploring a run for president, presents a curious figure among better-known candidates.

Combined with a tough stance on border security -- he was the author of the original amendment proposing 700 miles of border fence included in the House's 2005 immigration bill -- he fills a niche among the candidates lining up for a presidential run.

"I stand for a strong national defense, strong border enforcement, fiscal conservatism and traditional values, and lastly, keeping American jobs onshore," he said as he sprawled in an armchair in his Capitol Hill office during the interview, propping one foot on the edge of his cluttered desk.

Mr. Hunter said he expects the next election to turn on security. He said his experience as an Army Ranger during the Vietnam War and as the top Republican on the House Armed Services Committee puts him squarely in the middle of that debate.

"I think it's going to be a dangerous world. I think that's going to have our attention, and I think we're going to see a dangerous century," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0098085

Mr. Hunter is the most conservative candidate to enter the field so far, and is as conservative as any of the others mentioned as potential candidates. He touts his sponsorship of the Right to Life Act, which effectively would outlaw abortion by specifying that a person exists at the moment of fertilization, for the purposes of 14th Amendment protections.

Mr. Hunter easily has won re-election in his San Diego-based congressional district every election since his first, with the exception of a tight race in 1992 after redistricting and revelations of overdrafts at the now-defunct House bank.

His biggest challenges will be gaining name recognition and raising money. He has not been known as a prolific fundraiser on the scale of other announced candidates, but he has pledged to make a serious effort in early primary and caucus states.

Mr. Hunter made his preliminary announcement before the midterm elections Nov. 7 and, in the weeks since, raised his profile on television and in radio interviews.

Since the elections, both Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani have formed exploratory committees on races for president.

Mr. Hunter said he will make a formal announcement later, joking that this way he gets two press conferences out of it.

Mr. Hunter has been involved in many big defense-policy fights of the past few years. He was one of the strongest supporters of the way U.S. troops performed at the detention center at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

In one memorable press conference at the Capitol, he brought a plate with lemon chicken, rice and the rest of the food that terror-war detainees were fed.

Mr. Hunter also took on the White House over women in combat and helped lead the opposition that blocked passage of the intelligence-overhaul bill in 2004 until the White House agreed to allow the defense intelligence agencies continued latitude to operate.

He has collected the endorsement of Rep. Trent Franks, Arizona Republican, who noted the move was curious given that his home-state colleague, Mr. McCain, has formed his own exploratory bid and is widely considered the candidate to beat.

But Mr. Franks said Mr. Hunter is the right man to lead the nation in a time of war and has his "wholehearted support."

The GOP: A Latino 'Spanking' (NSWK)

By Arian Campo-Flores

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - Until recently, Jane Barbosa was as reliable a Republican as they come. A Mexican native who arrived in the United States at the age of 2, Barbosa, 60, first got involved in politics as a teenager, attending neighborhood coffee klatches in Elgin, Ill. In the decades since becoming a citizen, she has almost always voted for GOP candidates, and even worked as a precinct committeewoman for the party. "I always felt that the Republican Party stood for what Latino values are," she says. "Belief in God, belief in family, a good work ethic." But this year, Barbosa was appalled by what she considered shrill anti-immigrant rhetoric used by some GOP hard-liners. "I couldn't just sit there and let it go by," she says. So for the first time in recent memory, she voted Democratic.

Barbosa had plenty of company. After making gains among Latino voters for three election cycles in a row, the GOP suffered a sobering reversal in this month's midterm elections. Exit polls show that Republican candidates won only 30 percent of the Hispanic vote—the fastest-growing segment of the electorate—while Democrats garnered 69 percent. Compare that with 2004, when President George W. Bush captured at least 40 percent of that vote. While Latinos were just as concerned about Iraq and the economy as the electorate generally, according to surveys, they were more driven than usual by immigration. A poll by Lake Research Partners found that half of Latino voters considered immigration important to their vote this year. Many Hispanics were clearly turned off by GOP congressional candidates like Randy Graf in Arizona, who vilified illegal immigrants. "Those candidates got the spanking they needed," says Lionel Sosa, Bush's longtime Latino ad man. "We as a party got the spanking we needed."

Reeling from the results, Bush quickly named a Hispanic, Sen. Mel Martinez, as the national party's next general chairman. Martinez, who is hanging on to his Senate seat, has his work cut out for him. A president who has often promoted himself as simpático to Latinos now has worse approval ratings among them than among the public as a whole. The GOP's hard-line voices especially alienated immigrant Latinos who only recently became citizens and have yet to form fixed party loyalties. Martinez must now refocus the GOP on the positive, aspirational message that once served Bush so well, says Al Cardenas, former head of the Florida Republican Party. It helps that Martinez is Latino; but as a Cuban-American from Florida, he won't necessarily connect with, say, Mexican-Americans in the Southwest. And many conservatives decried his selection, citing his support for legalizing most undocumented immigrants. (Martinez declined repeated requests for an interview and hasn't spoken much publicly about his appointment.)

But Democrats can't assume that Latinos now form a pillar of their party's base. "It could absolutely swing again next cycle," says Cecilia Muñoz of the National Council of La Raza. "What this really reflects is a vote away from Republicans, which is not the same thing as a vote affirmatively for Democrats." The Democrats face their own internal schisms over immigration. But Simon Rosenberg of the New Democrat Network argues that Hispanics will loom large in the party's presidential nomination process for 2008: Latino-rich Nevada has moved up the primary calendar, and Hispanics like Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico will be highly visible.

DOJ_NMG_0098086

Immigration will continue to shape the parties' fates. Though lawmakers failed to strike a deal this year, they may take up the issue again next year, now that Democrats are in charge on Capitol Hill. A likely starting point: a compromise bill passed by the Senate that combines border enforcement with legalization of most undocumented immigrants. In the wake of the midterm elections, "demagoguery was soundly defeated," says La Raza's Muñoz. "But we have no illusions about immigration becoming an easy debate." Voters like Barbosa in Illinois will be watching closely—and may well cast their vote accordingly come 2008.

Generation Y Takes A Whirl With The Left (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Will Selph's family has known defeated Montana Sen. Conrad Burns for years, and Selph, a University of Montana sophomore and chair of the state's college Republicans, did everything he could to turn out the vote for the senator. Selph supported Burns's stands on national security and gay marriage, and he calls Burns "youthful" and "spry"-never mind his age, which is 71. The way Selph sees it, Burns shouldn't have been a difficult sell for younger voters.

But to hear Bryce Bennett, a senior and chair of the state's college Democrats, describe him, Conrad Burns might as well have been Mr. Burns, the scheming, century-old billionaire from the television show The Simpsons. Burns's votes to cut student loans angered Bennett, who has also seen a friend come home injured from Iraq and worries about getting health insurance after he graduates.

Judging from the recent election, there may be a lot more young people like Bennett than like Selph. In surveys and exit polls, generation Y is increasingly turning left. And with voters' earliest choices thought to be key to their future party identification, the GOP could be running out of chances to win back a generation.

Young people aren't just voting more Democratic; they're voting more in general. Over 2 million more people ages 18 to 29 voted in this election than in 2002, and their 24 percent turnout was the highest for a midterm election since 1994. Much of this turnout increase and the greater support for Democrats can be traced to the war in Iraq, but that doesn't mean either trend will disappear once the war is over, since early voting is a strong predictor of future behavior.

Leading indicators. Republicans "are looking down the barrel of a long gun because this is a demographic that will be around for a long time," says Democratic pollster Celinda Lake, who conducted an analysis of exit polls with Republican Ed Goeas. The polls show voters ages 18 to 30 favored Democrats by 50 percent to 35 percent in House races. Young voters' top concerns-including Iraq, the cost of college, and healthcare-bode well for Democrats, while issues that tend to favor Republicans, including moral values, taxes, and terrorism, scored low. Other studies tell a similar story. Results from a survey of incoming college freshmen, conducted annually by the University of California-Los Angeles and compiled last week, shows falling support for military spending and growing acceptance of homosexuality and abortion, a reversal from the conservatism seen in the years following 9/11.

But Democrats shouldn't breathe easy, says Curtis Gans, a voter participation expert at American University, who says the 2006 election signaled anger at the GOP more than long-term allegiance to the Democrats. "It really depends on what the Democrats do and whether the Republicans change," he says. To secure the youth vote, Democrats have plans to lower interest rates on student loans and restore funding for Pell grants. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean suggested the party might push for universal healthcare for all citizens younger than 25.

Boone Does D.C., Don Quixote Style (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Teen-idol-cum-aging-crooner Pat Boone comes to Washington this week for his first address to a group he has long helped fund: the conservative Heritage Foundation. Boone says it will be a welcome change of venue from his home base in Beverly Hills, where, he says, "I feel like a Don Quixote tilting at windmills." The windmills? Hollywood's entertainment studios. "They've force-fed rap music to kids," he says, "selling them the idea that if you want to be a recording artist, you have to have been to prison, worked as a pimp, and have been shot at." Boone just finished an album of R&B duets with the likes of James Brown and Smokey Robinson, but he says he steered clear of political talk during those recording sessions: "Many people say to me, 'I believe everything you say, Boone.' But the entertainment industry is overwhelmingly liberal; most artists just go with the flow."

At Heritage, Boone will talk up his memoir, Pat Boone's America: 50 years. Then the man who once battled Elvis for chart space is off to Congress to lobby for a flag-desecration ban and higher obscenity fines and check on pals like outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist and Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch. Boone is hunting for new beltway buddies, too, trying to land a face-to-face with Karl Rove, who recently sent him a thank-you note for releasing a multimedia package called For My Country: Ballad of the National Guard.

DOJ_NMG_0098087

Brownback Hints At '08 Presidential Bid (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas strongly hinted yesterday that he would run for president in 2008, saying the Republican field was open for a "full-scale conservative" and that he would make an official announcement soon.

During an appearance on ABC's "This Week," the Republican outlined what he called a "compassionate conservative" agenda, including a willingness to open diplomatic ties with Iran and Syria.

"I think there is room, on the Republican side, for somebody that's a full-scale conservative, that's an economic and fiscal and social conservative," Mr. Brownback said. "I think there's room on our side, and need on our side, to develop some new plays, particularly on the compassionate conservative agenda. So we'll be making some announcements, soon, about that."

Moderator George Stephanopoulos joked that Mr. Brownback already seemed intent on running.

"Well, I can tell from that smile that 'you're in,' " Mr. Stephanopoulos said. "That's not very coy at all."

Mr. Brownback replied: "We'll see."

While declining to endorse a timetable for withdrawal, Mr. Brownback implied that Republican electoral hopes will hinge on a substantial change of fortunes in Iraq in the next two years. He added that Iran and Syria, two nations listed as supporters of terrorism by the United States, should be included in the process.

"We cannot face the public again in 2008 with the current situation still in hand for the United States," he said. "We may have had problems or difficulties on issues in the past, but we've got to start dealing with the new realities that are here on the ground and bring everybody, including, if we can, the Iranians and Syrians, together in some sort of discussion how we deal with all of these issues in a political, a political framework."

In contrast to other Republicans seeking to cultivate the conservative base for a 2008 run, Mr. Brownback attempted a more bipartisan tone while stressing his support for conservative judges such as Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Mr. Brownback also announced that he and Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, plan to attend a conference by well-known pastor Rick Warren. Mr. Obama also is considering a 2008 presidential campaign.

"That brings together the left and the right to discuss issues of poverty in Africa and global health care issues," Mr. Brownback said. "One of the things I'm going to do is to take an AIDS test to show to people that we should be doing that particularly, if you're in particular areas that may have had the exposure."

In addition to taking an AIDS test, Mr. Brownback also plans to spend a night in jail to highlight what he calls a need for prison reform.

"This is an issue that I've dealt with for some period of time. Right now in America, if you go to prison, two-thirds of the individuals that go in once will be in a second or more times," he said. "We really need to reduce that recidivism rate, so I've been trying to highlight alternatives, particularly faith-based prisons that have got that recidivism rate down below 10 percent."

Can A Mormon Be President? (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, November 27, 2006

A mormon church official and a public relations executive shuttled recently from the Fox News Washington bureau to the Washington Post to the online political digest the Hotline. The two were engaging in a little pre-emptive rearguard action, gearing up for the impending Republican presidential campaign of Massachusetts Governor (Willard) Mitt Romney, 59, whose family has long been part of the church's Ã©lite.

Like other minorities--ethnic or religious--Mormons are proud of those among them who make it big. When Steve Young, a descendant of church leader Brigham Young and a quarterback for the San Francisco 49ers, was taking snaps on Monday Night Football in the 1990s, his fellow Mormons took to calling Family Home Evening, their weekly togetherness meeting, Family Home Halftime instead.

But church officials are wary of the impact Romney's candidacy could have on them--and on the portrayal of their faith. Yes, his campaign will bring attention and credibility to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS), as the Mormons are formally known, and give them a chance to demystify their theology and customs. But church officials also calculate that Romney's bid to succeed George W. Bush could remind some mainstream Christians just how different Mormonism is from their faith and perhaps expose their flock to more of the sort of discrimination that drove their founders west by handcart and covered wagon into the Great Salt Lake Valley.

DOJ_NMG_0098088

Although Mormons are known for family centeredness, hard work and clean living, many Americans remain suspicious of them, maybe because so many aspects of their faith remain mysterious. A poll conducted in June by the Los Angeles Times and Bloomberg found that 35% of registered voters said they would not consider voting for a Mormon for President. Only Islam would be a more damaging faith for a candidate, the poll found. That's why Michael Otterson, a Mormon convert who is now the church's director of media relations, was calling on political reporters when he visited Washington from Utah in October. He wants them to know that in its 176-year history, the church has never endorsed a presidential candidate and that much of the folklore surrounding its beliefs just isn't true. "The message in a nutshell is, Remember that we're politically neutral as an institution," he says. "The church is about preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ. Anything else is a distraction." Otterson says he has a "no dumb questions" policy and urges journalists to call his cell phone, day or night.

The church used a similar strategy successfully when Romney, who became wealthy building a venture-capital firm in Boston, was brought in as president of the Salt Lake Organizing Committee when it needed to rescue the 2002 Winter Olympics from a bribery scandal. Some critics wondered if the games would become the "Molympics," and Otterson says he met with a stream of sports reporters to try to "put some of the myths to rest--polygamy being the most enduring."

That task is never done. Even though the church has not allowed members to have multiple wives since 1890, that's not how it comes across on TV, in books or even in the courts. The popular HBO series Big Love shows a Utah family trying to "live the principle" of plural marriage; at the end of every episode, the network's defensive disclaimer informs the audience that the Mormon church, in fact, rejects polygamy. Similarly, the nonfiction best seller Under the Banner of Heaven by Jon Krakauer chronicles shocking murders within a Mormon splinter group, though it was probably lost on many readers that the sect has no connection to the church. More recently, the 50-year-old leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, a sect that has been disavowed by the LDS, has been on trial on two first-degree felony counts of rape. He is accused of helping arrange the marriage of a 14-year-old girl and her 19-year-old cousin in 2001.

Even if the church succeeds in its public relations offensive, Romney still has some explaining of his own to do, particularly to the Republican evangelical base, which now makes up nearly a third of the party's electorate and can wield huge power in primary states, most notably South Carolina. That's because some Evangelicals hold the view that Mormonism is not a Christian faith. Because Mormons acknowledge works of Scripture that are not in the Bible, believe that their prophets have received revelations directly from God and teach that God has a physical body, Evangelicals consider them heretics. The Southern Baptist Convention lists the LDS church under Cults and Sects, along with Scientology. In late October, Romney and his wife Ann, balancing lunch trays on their laps in the den of their Belmont, Mass., home, met with about 15 evangelical leaders from as far away as Alaska, including Jerry Falwell, Franklin Graham and Southern Baptist leader Richard Land. The three-hour meeting was set up by Mark DeMoss, a p.r. consultant who specializes in Evangelicals. Charles Colson, the former Nixon official and convicted Watergate conspirator who founded a prison ministry and now hosts a popular evangelical radio show, told TIME that Romney's faith should not disqualify him. "You wouldn't vote for a man just because he is a Christian, nor would you vote against a man just because he was a Mormon," Colson says.

Still, when it comes to managing the message about Romney's relationship with his church, his team has already shown vulnerability. The Boston Globe reported in October that Jeffrey R. Holland, one of the church's 12 apostles, had discussed the campaign at church headquarters with one of Romney's sons as well as with a key Romney donor and a paid consultant to his political action committee. The church says it was just a courtesy call, one of many such meetings Holland holds. But the Globe also described e-mails from two administrators of the business school at Brigham Young University, the Mormon school that is Romney's alma mater, who used office computers to solicit support for the campaign. The two were told by B.Y.U.'s counsel to knock it off, although Romney later said it made sense to raise money from people he knows, including alumni.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid rarely gets questions about his Mormonism, and Romney has tried deflect them by focusing on the broad principles of his faith, as well as family values and traditional marriage. A writer for the Atlantic Monthly asked Romney last year if he wears Temple Garments--white underclothing, with the "Marks of the Holy Priesthood" sewn in, donned with reverence by the most faithful Mormons. "I'll just say those sorts of things I'll keep private," he sensibly replied. Will that dodge work for other theological questions? Calling himself "a religious person," Romney in June used the Charlie Rose Show on PBS to test-drive an answer that keeps him from getting into the nitty-gritty of his religious heritage. "I believe that Jesus Christ is my savior," he said. "But then as you get into the details of doctrines, I'd probably say, 'Look, time out. Let's focus on the values that we share.'" That kind of high-mindedness proved effective during Romney's unsuccessful challenge to Senator Edward Kennedy in 1994 after Kennedy tried to make an issue of the Mormon's attitude toward blacks and women. Romney said he was not running "to be a spokesman for my church," and Kennedy backed off.

DOJ_NMG_0098089

Romney advisers are debating whether he will need to give a big speech in the tradition of John F. Kennedy, who told Protestant church leaders in Houston 46 years ago that he was "not the Catholic candidate for President" but instead was "the Democratic Party's candidate for President, who happens also to be Catholic." After the G.O.P.'s defeat in the midterms, that may be a speech Republicans are prepared to hear. A big tent, even one stretching all the way to Salt Lake City, could be what gets them back into power in Washington two years from now.

Obama Talks With Top Advisers In Iowa (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, November 27, 2006

Democrat Barack Obama has sought the advice of top campaign workers in Iowa and has established a seedling support network in this state as he prepares to decide whether to seek the 2008 presidential nomination.

The first-term Illinois senator has surrounded himself with advisers rich in experience in Iowa, the leadoff caucus state.

Obama has vaulted to the top tier among prospective candidates for the Democratic Party's nomination, even as the new star in the party says he has not made up his mind about running.

The Iowa connections of Obama's campaign advisers and the senator's behind-the-scenes inquiry into the Iowa caucuses are hardly an announcement that he is running for president. But they show he is visualizing the presidential campaign process, in the event he decides to run.

Obama said last month he was considering a campaign for president, as enthusiastic crowds turned out for his political appearances on behalf of other candidates and as he traveled the country promoting his best-selling book.

Shortly after the Nov. 7 election, Obama telephoned John Norris, the Des Moines Democrat who ran John Kerry's winning campaign in the 2004 Iowa caucuses.

"He basically called to talk about the lay of the land in Iowa," said Norris, who described Obama's inquiries as "earnest" and reflecting genuine uncertainty about his future.

Iowa's presidential precinct caucuses are scheduled as the first nominating event of the 2008 campaign. Several Democrats have already expressed interest in competing in Iowa, although only Gov. Tom Vilsack has declared his candidacy for the nomination.

Vilsack, who filed papers forming a campaign organization on Nov. 9, plans a public kickoff of his campaign this week, with events in Mount Pleasant, which he calls home, and in New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Nevada and South Carolina.

Besides Vilsack, the Democrats who have spent the most time courting the party's activists in Iowa include Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Kerry, a Massachusetts senator.

New York Sen. Hillary Clinton is believed to be weighing a campaign for the Democratic nomination.

However, she has steered clear of Iowa since the 2004 presidential election while she has campaigned for re-election in New York.

Clinton was re-elected handily this month, but she had not begun reaching out to Iowa activists as of last week.

Norris told Obama during their recent telephone conversation that the 2008 Iowa campaign would be lively and that Vilsack's presence in the race likely would not deter participation.

"I said I think it's obvious other candidates are going to compete," Norris said. "Other people are getting in, and Iowa will be a factor. The outcome will be a factor."

Obama did not ask if Norris would be willing to advise him, should he decide to run.

Obama's three trips to Iowa since his election to the Senate in 2004 came this fall, beginning with his appearance at U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin's annual steak fry in mid-September.

That event brought thousands of Iowa Democrats and dozens of journalists from Chicago and around the nation to Indianola, where the steak fry was held.

Obama spent little time during the visit, or the two subsequent stops this fall, meeting privately with party leaders.

Des Moines Democrat George Appleby saw Obama at Harkin's event and noted the appeal he seemed to have with the crowd of 3,000 at the Warren County fairgrounds.

Appleby had been helping former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner make the rounds in Iowa.

After Warner decided in October that he would not run for president, Appleby got in touch with Obama's people.

"I have talked with the Obama people, and I have agreed to do some initial stuff for him, pending his making the decision to go or not to go," Appleby said.

"They tell me he will make a decision within a couple of weeks."

Since acknowledging interest in the 2008 race, Obama's name has shot to the second spot, behind Clinton, on most national preference polls for the Democratic nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0098090

Iowa City Democrat Dick Myers, the former minority leader in the Iowa House, has also agreed to serve as a caucus contact for Obama, should he decide to run, aides said.

Obama also would have campaign workers at his disposal with institutional knowledge of Iowa politics.

Acting as a key contact for Obama in Iowa is Steve Hildebrand, a longtime aide to former South Dakota Sen. Tom Daschle. Hildebrand ran Al Gore's campaign for the 2000 Iowa caucuses.

Also part of Obama's team is David Axelrod, a Chicago-based media consultant who produced Vilsack's ads during his 1998 and 2002 gubernatorial campaigns.

Axelrod also produced ads for Edwards, including for his 2004 Iowa caucus campaign.

Longtime Democratic pollster Paul Harsted, who has worked for Harkin and Vilsack, is also signed on with Obama.

The group of advisers suggests that Obama could mount a credible Iowa caucus campaign, said his spokesman, Robert Gibbs, who was Kerry's national spokesman for a time during the 2004 presidential campaign.

"Obviously, should he choose to run, he'll have a team that's very talented with good knowledge of the state," Gibbs said.

Officer In Bush Motorcade Accident Dies (AP-Y)

By Tara Godvin

AP, November 27, 2006

A motorcycle officer injured last week while escorting President Bush in the islands died Sunday, police said.

Steve Favela, 30, and two other officers crashed their cycles as the presidential motorcade was traveling across Hickam Air Force Base to meet troops for breakfast early Tuesday. The other officers were treated at The Queen's Medical Center and released.

Favela, an eight-year veteran of the Honolulu Police Department and father of four, had suffered internal injuries and had been in critical condition at the medical center.

Bush said in a statement that he and the first lady were "deeply saddened" by the death, and sent their condolences.

"Officer Favela risked his life every day to protect the people of his community," Bush said in the statement. "In this time of great sadness, we give thanks for his life of service."

Police Capt. Frank Fujii said police officers across the state would place black bands across their badges in honor of Favela.

"When I received the phone call that Steve had passed away, quite frankly my heart just sank to the guts of my stomach," Fujii said.

Light rain had been falling on the partly cloudy morning of the crash, and some roads on the base were slick.

Members of the White House medical team — including an ambulance — were cut loose from the motorcade to help. Local ambulance and fire units also responded.

Bush had spent the night on the base on his way back from a trip to Indonesia and Vietnam.

In a separate incident, a fourth solo motorcycle officer crashed and injured his wrist when attempting a U-turn on loose gravel while escorting the president on Monday night. He was also treated and released.

Also during the president's 16-hour stopover, a White House staff member was hospitalized early Tuesday after being mugged by three assailants near Waikiki Beach.

Merger Of Wall Street Groups Creates A Lobbying Powerhouse (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

The organization's acronym, SIFMA, sounds like a terrible skin condition.

But the group, created through the recent merger of associations that represent the sellers of stocks and bonds, is one of Washington's most powerful lobbies.

The Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, with a budget of $80 million, is the main mouthpiece for the financial services industry, the biggest corporate player in national politics. Only organized labor donates more to candidates for federal offices.

When added together, SIFMA's political action committees gave more than $1 million during the 2006 election season, putting the organization in the top 25 of all PACs. Its combined $8.5 million in spending on federal lobbying last year placed it in the top 30.

The association will need all that and more. It's already at the center of some of the most heated, high-stakes battles on Capitol Hill. It has begun to question the regulatory requirements under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and wants to extend the temporary, multibillion-dollar tax breaks for profits garnered from stocks and bonds.

DOJ_NMG_0098091

To take on such monumental tasks, SIFMA was designed to be large, though not quite as large as it is today. For example, it has two chief executives. (Not exactly the model of corporate efficiency.) The heads of the two groups that merged -- the Securities Industry Association and the Bond Market Association -- are now co-chief executives of the combined organization.

Marc Lackritz of the Securities Industry Association and Micah S. Green of Bond Market Association said in an interview that they are happy with the arrangement. And why wouldn't they be? Headhunters have been trying all year to recruit a "big name" from Wall Street or Capitol Hill to take over SIFMA but couldn't settle on one, industry insiders said. Among the early contenders was apparently soon-to-retire Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee.

Instead, SIFMA is sticking with Lackritz and Green, a duo that may not have much star power but who have worked together well for two decades. "We finish each other's sentences," Lackritz said.

Lackritz hired Green as a lobbyist in 1987 when Lackritz headed the Washington office of the Public Securities Association, a predecessor of the Bond Market Association. When Lackritz took over the Washington office of the Securities Industry Association in 1990, Green took his job at Public Securities.

Lackritz went on to become chief executive of the Securities Industry Association in 1992, and Green became chief executive of the Bond Market Association in 2001. Clearly there is a pattern here. No one would be surprised if Green, 49, is named SIFMA's sole chief executive when Lackritz, 60, retires.

Then again, keeping up with changing times is what the SIFMA merger is all about. Recent federal laws and market forces have all but erased the old distinctions between the companies that deal in stocks and those that deal in bonds. Lots of companies now sell both instruments thanks to serial consolidations on Wall Street. By the time SIFMA was created this year, 80 major companies, including Citigroup and Merrill Lynch, belonged to both the Securities Industry Association and the Bond Market Association.

That didn't make much economic sense, of course, so negotiations were initiated to blend the two organizations. Or to be more precise, to reblend them.

The Securities Industry Association was formed in 1972 after a merger between Investment Bankers Association of America and the Association of Stock Exchange Firms. The organization that later became the Bond Market Association split off from the Securities Industry Association four years later.

Lackritz and Green said talks about reuniting the two entities started as early as the 1980s. "You saw the process beginning to chip away at the distinctions between us," Green said.

Merger negotiations were reattempted in the late 1990s and again 3 1/2 years ago. They finally clicked this year. The main driver behind the effort, financial services denizens said, was Goldman Sachs, with an assist from fellow investment banking heavyweight Morgan Stanley. Both companies wanted to wield more influence over the groups and saw the combination as a way to make that happen.

Advocates for the merger wanted to increase their influence in Washington. They wanted to establish "a large, exciting and hopefully powerful organization," Green said. They also intend to save some dues money (by paying just one organization rather than two).

By all accounts, their ambition to accumulate more clout has begun to take hold. "The two of them have been very effective working together representing the securities industry, and I think they'll be even more effective now," said Edward L. Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association.

"By forming this new organization, this sector of the financial services industry will speak with a single, shared voice, and their influence in policymaking can only grow," agreed Robert S. Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a group of 22 chief executives of the largest financial services companies.

The cost savings haven't happened yet. Lackritz and Green, who are both million-dollar executives, are keeping their jobs. They also have not yet shrunk the two staffs (which now total 250 people) or begun to consolidate office space. This will happen eventually, the chief executives said, and is a considerable source of stress for them and their employees. Trade reports indicate that the combined organization will produce savings of $14 million or more a year.

SIFMA has offices in Washington, New York, London and Hong Kong. Its members are more than 650 securities firms, banks and asset managers. And they have a lot of scratch. Last year, the securities industry raised a record $5.8 trillion of debt and equity capital in the United States and $11.4 trillion around the world.

Although stocks and bonds are very different instruments -- one tends to go up when the other goes down -- the companies that underwrite or sell them rarely diverge on matters of public policy. SIFMA's goals are to expand markets generally, to foster the development of new financial instruments and to cut costs for the industry, partly through regulatory relief.

None of that will be easy. But with a new high-octane lobby in Washington behind it, the industry clearly will have a better shot.

DOJ_NMG_0098092

"The merger simplifies things and simple is always better," said Steve Bartlett, chief executive of the Financial Services Roundtable, yet another of the dozen or so financial-services lobbying groups. "It presents an opportunity for the companies to develop stronger and more coherent policy positions and articulate them with one voice."Lobbyists' Holiday Cheer

It's that time of year again. Please e-mail examples of pro bono lobbying that you've done or that you know about for a special holiday column. Send examples early and often, and no later than mid-December, please. Thanks and cheers!

America The Charitable: A Few Surprises (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, November 27, 2006

Everybody knows Americans are big givers. But their charitable impulses keep generating surprises.

Consider just a few conclusions from recent research:

· Charitable giving plays an even larger role in the economy than is suggested by some $260 billion in annual contributions. Each dollar of giving appears to create $19 of extra national income, according to a book released this past weekend.

· Demand for nonprofit services gets proportionately bigger, not smaller, as a locality's income rises, a Federal Reserve economist finds.

· The philanthropy of the wealthy may not hinge on tax incentives to the degree many believe. In one new survey, a majority of wealthy givers say they would contribute the same amount if the estate tax were abolished. Ditto, they said, if they could no longer deduct the value of gifts from their taxable income.

These disparate studies are shedding light not just on who gives but also on why they give and what their actions mean to society. Often, the conclusions run counter to expectations.

"This is supposed to be the start of a conversation. It's the first word, not the last word," says Arthur Brooks, referring to his new book on charity, called "Who Really Cares." "We need more people thinking about [the study of charitable giving] in a serious way."

He and other experts say that by understanding charity better, Americans can learn how to encourage more giving. The result would probably be a healthier and wealthier society.

Of course, it's not as if American philanthropy has never been studied before. A number of institutions track the nonprofit sector full-time in one way or another. But the data on charity-linked activities are far less complete - and less systematically analyzed - than for areas such as government and private industry.

One thing that's long been known: The US leads the world in levels of charitable activity. The pattern runs from the rich, steeped in long tradition of philanthropy, to the poor. Those making $20,000 or less a year give away more, as a share of their income, than do higher income groups.

Americans donate their time as well as money - some $150 billion worth annually (measured by using an estimated average value of $18.04 per hour).

"I see a great commitment," says Karen Rivers, who recruits helpers for the Colorado branch of Volunteers of America in Denver. "We just were inundated with people who wanted to volunteer for Thanksgiving Day."

She had to turn volunteers away as the group served holiday meals to about 3,000 homeless and others in need.

Some experts see charity as a defining trait of the US, more than consumerism or business. But those forces may be intertwined.

For one thing, many nonprofits are selling services - from healthcare to classical music - in a marketplace alongside for-profit rivals. By many measures, they are successful.

For example: As personal incomes rise in a given county, the income of nonprofits seems to rise even faster, says Rob Grunewald, an associate economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, who has analyzed counties in 47 states. This suggests that not-for-profit activities are what economists call a "superior good," something people want to buy more of (or donate more to) as their incomes rise.

But ties between charitable ventures and the economy hardly end there.

In his new book, Dr. Brooks points to evidence that charity is no mere peripheral activity. It pays off for society in ways that may transcend the rates of return on many traditional investments. Why?

It's not just that charity helps those on the receiving end, says Brooks, an economist at Syracuse University in New York. It also strengthens the cohesion of society at large. Moreover, it appears to make the givers themselves more successful, possibly because the activity transforms them somewhat into better or happier people. Whatever the reasons, he finds that higher income tends to push up charity - and that greater charity tends to push up income.

DOJ_NMG_0098093

Another provocative conclusion is that conservatives are better givers than liberals - a theme that is likely to draw close scrutiny. This pattern is less about politics, he says, than about charity-linked lifestyles that are most common to people who call themselves conservatives: religious commitment, marriage and children, and entrepreneurship.

Still, Brooks's main point is that more Americans, regardless of ideology, should embrace giving as a tool for progress. He quotes Proverbs: "One man gives freely, yet gains even more; another withholds unduly, but comes to poverty."

Many who do charitable work can relate to that. Pier Penic works in public relations, but her passion is what she does for free as the founder of Culture at Home, a support group near Washington, D.C., for mothers who are home-schooling their kids. "I'm doing more here than I would at a corporate job," she says. "I love to see results."

Her story echoes some of the common forces that motivate people to give time or money to charity: First, she identifies with challenges facing home-school moms. In her case, the feeling is amplified because she herself is one of those moms. Second, she wants to make a difference. Third, she draws satisfaction from the effort to help.

These forces are among the core motivations that foster actions of generosity beyond the sphere of one's family circle, says Paul Schervish, who heads the Boston College Center on Wealth and Philanthropy. "There would still be a need for philanthropy, even if our economic needs were all taken care of."

The urge to make a difference, and to take satisfaction in it, outweighs monetary considerations. For example, a survey of 945 ultrarich individuals released last month by Bank of America and the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University found that slightly more than half would give the same amount regardless of whether the estate tax or deductions for charitable giving were repealed.

None of this means that tax policy is trivial for charitable giving. But the survey suggests that Americans' penchant for giving isn't driven primarily by tax breaks.

Charitable Explanation (WSJ)

By Arthur C. Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

'Tis the season to give. Our mailboxes are filling with appeals from fine organizations and worthy causes, competing for our holiday spirit and tax-deductible dollars. Millions of Americans will answer the call, donating in December as much as a third of the quarter-trillion dollars we give away each year. Per capita, Americans give more in this single month than most nations give all year long.

Before congratulating ourselves too heartily, however, note that charity is not a virtue shared by all. While 85 million American households give away money each year to nonprofit organizations, another 30 million do not. And this distinction goes beyond "formal" giving. Recent survey data reveal that people who fail to donate money to charities are only a third as likely as donors to give money to friends and strangers. Non-donors are half as likely as donors to give blood. They even are less honest: Non-donors are much less likely than donors to return change mistakenly given to them by a cashier. When it comes to charity, we are two nations.

Why does Giving America behave so differently from Non-Giving America? The answer, contrary to what you might be thinking, is not income; America's working poor give away at least as large a percentage of their incomes as the rich, and a lot more than the middle class. The charity gap is driven not by economics but by values.

Nowhere is the divide in values more on display than in religion, the frontline in our so-called "culture war." And the relationship between religion and charity is nothing short of extraordinary. The Social Capital Community Benchmark Survey indicates that Americans who weekly attend a house of worship are 25 percentage points more likely to give than people who go to church rarely or never. These religious folks also give nearly four times more dollars per year than secularists, on average, and volunteer more than twice as frequently.

It is not the case that these enormous differences are due simply to religious people giving to their churches. Religious people are more charitable with all sorts of nonreligious causes as well. They are 10 percentage points likelier than secularists to give money to explicitly nonreligious charities like the United Way, and 25 points more likely to volunteer for secular groups such as the PTA. Churchgoers were far likelier in 2001 to give to 9/11-related causes. On average, people of faith give more than 50% more money each year to non-church social welfare organizations than secularists do.

A second core value affecting charity shows up in the belief citizens have about the government's role in their lives. Some Americans (about a third) believe the government should do more to reduce income differences between the rich and poor -- largely through higher taxation and social spending. Others (about 40%) do not favor greater forced income redistribution. This is a major difference in worldview -- not just about taxation, but also about the perceived duty of individuals to take personal responsibility for themselves and others. This difference affects people's likelihood of voluntarily giving to charity. The General

DOJ_NMG_0098094

Social Survey shows that people who oppose government income redistribution donate four times as much money each year as do redistribution supporters.

Note that the charity gap is not due to anything the government is actually doing; rather, to what people think the government should be doing -- in other words, nothing more than a political opinion. This fact throws a wrench into the traditional stereotype that conservatives in America are hardhearted while liberals are the compassionate ones. In the words of one common 2004 campaign yard sign in my town, "Bush Must Go! Human need, not corporate greed." However, the General Social Survey indicates that people who opine that government is "spending too little money on welfare" -- not a viewpoint typically associated with George W. Bush's supposedly venal supporters -- are less likely to give food or money to a homeless person than people who oppose greater welfare spending. Regardless of which view on welfare is superior, ask yourself this: Who will personally do more for a poor person today?

A third key value affecting charity is reflected in family life. Couples, even when they earn the same amount as single people, are more likely to give to charity, and the simple act of raising children appears to stimulate giving as well -- children help us fill the collection plate even as they drain our wallets. Further, family life is the ideal transmission mechanism for charitable values: Data show that people who see their parents behave charitably are far likelier to be charitable themselves as adults.

As you probably noticed, the values predicting private charity in America tend to smile on the political right. Conservatives are twice as likely as liberals to attend a house of worship regularly; conservatives are one third as likely as liberals to say the government should "do more" to reduce income inequality; conservatives also have about 40% more children than liberals. Furthermore, there is a fringe on today's political left that goes beyond simple neglect of charity, and openly condemns it, claiming it lets governments off the hook from having to pay for services. So while there may be nothing inherently charitable about political conservatism, today's conservatives do outperform liberals on most measures of private giving.

What does this mean in the wake of the Democratic takeover of Congress this month? Will the new Democratic majority look for ways to protect and expand private giving? Or will they allow cultural forces to manifest themselves in policies uncongenial to private giving -- such as punitive regulation on private foundations, expanded public subsidies to nonprofits that squeeze out charity, and various schemes that lower disposable income among major givers?

But an even greater moral test is personal, not political. Left or right, secular or religious, single or married, the cultural forces of giving and non-giving are not destiny for any of us. Private charity is a choice: a choice to express our values in a private and singularly humane way. This is worth remembering as we hold requests for charitable support in our hands this month -- and make the right choice.

Mr. Brooks, a professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, is the author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism," published this week by Basic Books.

Very Rich Are Leaving The Merely Rich Behind (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

A decade into the practice of medicine, still striving to become “a well regarded physician-scientist,” Robert H. Glassman concluded that he was not making enough money. So he answered an ad in the New England Journal of Medicine from a business consulting firm hiring doctors.

And today, after moving on to Wall Street as an adviser on medical investments, he is a multimillionaire.

Such routes to great wealth were just opening up to physicians when Dr. Glassman was in school, graduating from Harvard College in 1983 and Harvard Medical School four years later. Hoping to achieve breakthroughs in curing cancer, his specialty, he plunged into research, even dreaming of a Nobel Prize, until Wall Street reordered his life.

Just how far he had come from a doctor’s traditional upper-middle-class expectations struck home at the 20th reunion of his college class. By then he was working for Merrill Lynch and soon would become a managing director of health care investment banking.

“There were doctors at the reunion — very, very smart people,” Dr. Glassman recalled in a recent interview. “They went to the top programs, they remained true to their ethics and really had very pure goals. And then they went to the 20th-year reunion and saw that somebody else who was 10 times less smart was making much more money.”

The opportunity to become abundantly rich is a recent phenomenon not only in medicine, but in a growing number of other professions and occupations. In each case, the great majority still earn fairly uniform six-figure incomes, usually less than $400,000 a year, government data show. But starting in the 1990s, a significant number began to earn much more, creating a two-tier income stratum within such occupations.

DOJ_NMG_0098095

The divide has emerged as people like Dr. Glassman, who is 45, latched onto opportunities within their fields that offered significantly higher incomes. Some lawyers and bankers, for example, collect much larger fees than others in their fields for their work on business deals and cases.

Others have moved to different, higher-paying fields — from academia to Wall Street, for example — and a growing number of entrepreneurs have seen windfalls tied largely to expanding financial markets, which draw on capital from around the world. The latter phenomenon has allowed, say, the owner of a small mail-order business to sell his enterprise for tens of millions instead of the hundreds of thousands that such a sale might have brought 15 years ago.

Three decades ago, compensation among occupations differed far less than it does today. That growing difference is diverting people from some critical fields, experts say. The American Bar Foundation, a research group, has found in its surveys, for instance, that fewer law school graduates are going into public-interest law or government jobs and filling all the openings is becoming harder.

Something similar is happening in academia, where newly minted Ph.D.'s migrate from teaching or research to more lucrative fields. Similarly, many business school graduates shun careers as experts in, say, manufacturing or consumer products for much higher pay on Wall Street.

And in medicine, where some specialties now pay far more than others, young doctors often bypass the lower-paying fields. The Medical Group Management Association, for example, says the nation lacks enough doctors in family practice, where the median income last year was $161,000.

"The bigger the prize, the greater the effort that people are making to get it," said Edward N. Wolff, a New York University economist who studies income and wealth. "That effort is draining people away from more useful work."

What kind of work is most useful is a matter of opinion, of course, but there is no doubt that a new group of the very rich have risen today far above their merely affluent colleagues.

Turning to Philanthropy

One in every 825 households earned at least $2 million last year, nearly double the percentage in 1989, adjusted for inflation, Mr. Wolff found in an analysis of government data. When it comes to wealth, one in every 325 households had a net worth of $10 million or more in 2004, the latest year for which data is available, more than four times as many as in 1989.

As some have grown enormously rich, they are turning to philanthropy in a competition that is well beyond the means of their less wealthy peers. "The ones with $100 million are setting the standard for their own circles, but no longer for me," said Robert Frank, a Cornell University economist who described the early stages of the phenomenon in a 1995 book, "The Winner-Take-All Society," which he co-authored.

Fighting AIDS and poverty in Africa are favorite causes, and so is financing education, particularly at one's alma mater.

"It is astonishing how many gifts of $100 million have been made in the last year," said Inge Reichenbach, vice president for development at Yale University, which like other schools tracks the net worth of its alumni and assiduously pursues the richest among them.

Dr. Glassman hopes to enter this circle someday. At 35, he was making $150,000 in 1996 (about $190,000 in today's dollars) as a hematology-oncology specialist. That's when, recently married and with virtually no savings, he made the switch that brought him to management consulting.

He won't say just how much he earns now on Wall Street or his current net worth. But compensation experts, among them Johnson Associates, say the annual income of those in his position is easily in the seven figures and net worth often rises to more than $20 million.

"He is on his way," said Alan Johnson, managing director of the firm, speaking of people on career tracks similar to Dr. Glassman's. "He is destined to riches."

Indeed, doctors have become so interested in the business side of medicine that more than 40 medical schools have added, over the last 20 years, an optional fifth year of schooling for those who want to earn an M.B.A. degree as well as an M.D. Some go directly to Wall Street or into health care management without ever practicing medicine.

"It was not our goal to create masters of the universe," said James Aisner, a spokesman for Harvard Business School, whose joint program with the medical school started last year. "It was to train people to do useful work."

Dr. Glassman still makes hospital rounds two or three days a month, usually on free weekends. Treating patients, he said, is "a wonderful feeling." But he sees his present work as also a valuable aspect of medicine.

One of his tasks is to evaluate the numerous drugs that start-up companies, particularly in biotechnology, are developing. These companies often turn to firms like Merrill Lynch for an investment or to sponsor an initial public stock offering. Dr. Glassman is a critical gatekeeper in this process, evaluating, among other things, whether promising drugs live up to their claims.

What Dr. Glassman represents, along with other very rich people interviewed for this article, is the growing number of Americans who acknowledge that they have accumulated, or soon will, more than enough money to live comfortably, even luxuriously, and also enough so that their children, as adults, will then be free to pursue careers "they have a hunger for," as Dr. Glassman put it, "and not feel a need to do something just to pay the bills."

DOJ_NMG_0098096

In an earlier Gilded Age, Andrew Carnegie argued that talented managers who accumulate great wealth were morally obligated to redistribute their wealth through philanthropy. The estate tax and the progressive income tax later took over most of that function — imposing tax rates of more than 70 percent as recently as 1980 on incomes above a certain level.

Now, with this marginal rate at half that much and the estate tax fading in importance, many of the new rich engage in the conspicuous consumption that their wealth allows. Others, while certainly not stinting on comfort, are embracing philanthropy as an alternative to a life of professional accomplishment.

Bill Gates and Warren Buffett are held up as models, certainly by Dr. Glassman. "They are going to make much greater contributions by having made money and then giving it away than most, almost all, scientists," he said, adding that he is drawn to philanthropy as a means of achieving a meaningful legacy.

"It has to be easier than the chance of becoming a Nobel Prize winner," he said, explaining his decision to give up research, "and I think that goes through the minds of highly educated, high performing individuals."

As Bush administration officials see it — and conservative economists often agree — philanthropy is a better means of redistributing the nation's wealth than higher taxes on the rich. They argue that higher marginal tax rates would discourage entrepreneurship and risk-taking. But some among the newly rich have misgivings.

Mark M. Zandi is one. He was a founder of Economy.com, a forecasting and data gathering service in West Chester, Pa. His net worth vaulted into eight figures with the company's sale last year to Moody's Investor Service.

"Our tax policies should be redesigned through the prism that wealth is being increasingly skewed," Mr. Zandi said, arguing that higher taxes on the rich could help restore a sense of fairness to the system and blunt a backlash from a middle class that feels increasingly squeezed by the costs of health care, higher education, and a secure retirement. The Federal Reserve's Survey of Consumer Finances, a principal government source of income and wealth data, does not single out the occupations and professions generating so much wealth today. But Forbes magazine offers a rough idea in its annual surveys of the richest Americans, those approaching and crossing the billion dollar mark.

Some routes are of long standing. Inheritance plays a role. So do the earnings of Wall Street investment bankers and the super incomes of sports stars and celebrities. All of these routes swell the ranks of the very rich, as they did in 1989.

But among new occupations, the winners include numerous partners in recently formed hedge funds and private equity firms that invest or acquire companies. Real estate developers and lawyers are more in evidence today among the very rich. So are dot-com entrepreneurs as well as scientists who start a company to market an invention or discovery, soon selling it for many millions. And from corporate America come many more chief executives than in the past.

Seventy-five percent of the chief executives in a sample of 100 publicly traded companies had a net worth in 2004 of more than $25 million mainly from stock and options in the companies they ran, according to a study by Carola Frydman, a finance professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Sloan School of Management. That was up from 31 percent for the same sample in 1989, adjusted for inflation.

Chief executives were not alone among corporate executives in rising to great wealth. There were similar or even greater increases in the percentage of lower-ranking executives — presidents, executive vice presidents, chief financial officers — also advancing into the $25 million-plus category.

The growing use of options as a form of pay helps to explain the sharp rise in the number of very wealthy households. But so does the gradual dismantling of the progressive income tax, Ms. Frydman concluded in a recent study.

"Our simulation results suggest that, had taxes been at their low 2000 level throughout the past 60 years, chief executive compensation would have been 35 percent higher during the 1950s and 1960s," she wrote.

Trying Not to Live Ostentatiously

Finally, the owners of a variety of ordinary businesses — a small chain of coffee shops or temporary help agencies, for example — manage to expand these family operations with the help of venture capital and private equity firms, eventually selling them or taking them public in a marketplace that rewards them with huge sums.

John J. Moon, a managing director of Metalmark Capital, a private equity firm, explains how this process works.

"Let's say we buy a small pizza parlor chain from an entrepreneur for $10 million," said Mr. Moon, who at 39, is already among the very rich. "We make it more efficient, we build it from 10 stores to 100 and we sell it to Domino's for $50 million."

As a result, not only the entrepreneur gets rich; so do Mr. Moon and his colleagues, who make money from putting together such deals and from managing the money they raise from wealthy investors who provide much of the capital.

By his own account, Mr. Moon, like Dr. Glassman, came reluctantly to the accumulation of wealth. Having earned a Ph.D. in business economics from Harvard in 1994, he set out to be a professor of finance, landing a job at Dartmouth's Tuck Graduate School of Business, with a starting salary in the low six figures.

DOJ_NMG_0098097

To this day, teaching tugs at Mr. Moon, whose parents immigrated to the United States from South Korea. He steals enough time from Metalmark Capital to teach one course in finance each semester at Columbia University's business school. "If Wall Street was not there as an alternative," Mr. Moon said, "I would have gone into academia."

Academia, of course, turned out to be no match for the job offers that came Mr. Moon's way from several Wall Street firms. He joined Goldman Sachs, moved on to Morgan Stanley's private equity operation in 1998 and stayed on when the unit separated from Morgan Stanley in 2004 and became Metalmark Capital.

As his income and net worth grew, the Harvard alumni association made contact and he started to give money, not just to Harvard, but to various causes. His growing charitable activities have brought him a leadership role in Harvard alumni activities, including a seat on the graduate school alumni council.

Still, Mr. Moon tries to live unostentatiously. "The trick is not to want more as your income and wealth grow," he said. "You fly coach and then you fly first class and then it is fractional ownership of a jet and then owning a jet. I still struggle with first class. My partners make fun of me."

His reluctance to show his wealth has a basis in his religion. "My wife and I are committed Presbyterians," he said. "I would like to think that my faith informs my career decisions even more than financial considerations. That is not always easy because money is not unimportant."

It has a momentum of its own. Mr. Moon and his wife, Hee-Jung, who gave up law to raise their two sons, are renovating a newly purchased Park Avenue co-op. "On an absolute scale it is lavish," he said, "but on a relative scale, relative to my peers, it is small."

Behavior is gradually changing in the Glassman household, too. Not that the doctor and his wife, Denise, 41, seem to crave change. Nothing in his off-the-rack suits, or the cafes and nondescript restaurants that he prefers for interviews, or the family's comparatively modest four-bedroom home in suburban Short Hills, N.J., or their two cars (an Acura S.U.V. and a Honda Accord) suggests that wealth has altered the way the family lives.

But it is opening up "choices," as Mrs. Glassman put it. They enjoy annual ski vacations in Utah now. The Glassmans are shopping for a larger house — not as large as the family could afford, Mrs. Glassman said, but large enough to accommodate a wood-paneled study where her husband could put all his books and his diplomas and "feel that it is his own." Right now, a glassed-in porch, without book shelves, serves as a workplace for both of them.

Starting out, Dr. Glassman's $150,000 a year was a bit less than that of his wife, then a marketing executive with an M.B.A. from Northwestern. Their plan was for her to stop working once they had children. To build up their income, she encouraged him to set up or join a medical practice to treat patients. Dr. Glassman initially balked, but he was coming to realize that his devotion to research would not necessarily deliver a big scientific payoff.

"I wasn't sure that I was willing to take the risk of spending many years applying for grants and working long hours for the very slim chance of winning at the roulette table and making a significant contribution to the scientific literature," he said.

In this mood, he was drawn to the ad that McKinsey & Company, the giant consulting firm, had placed in the New England Journal of Medicine. McKinsey was increasingly working among biomedical and pharmaceutical companies and it needed more physicians on staff as consultants. Dr. Glassman, absorbed in the world of medicine, did not know what McKinsey was. His wife enlightened him. "The way she explained it, McKinsey was like a Massachusetts General Hospital for M.B.A.'s," he said. "It was really prestigious, which I liked, and I heard that it was very intellectually charged."

He soon joined as a consultant, earning a starting salary that was roughly the same as he was earning as a researcher — and soon $100,000 more. He stayed four years, traveling constantly and during that time the family made the move to Short Hills from rented quarters in Manhattan.

Dr. Glassman migrated to Merrill Lynch in 2001, first in private equity, which he found to be more at the forefront of innovation than consulting at McKinsey, and then gradually to investment banking, going full time there in 2004.

Linking Security to Income

Casey McCullar hopes to follow a similar circuit. Now 29, he joined the Marconi Corporation, a big telecommunications company, in 1999 right out of the University of Texas in Dallas, his hometown. Over the next six years he worked up to project manager at $42,000 a year, becoming quite skilled in electronic mapmaking.

A trip to India for his company introduced him to the wonders of outsourcing and the money he might make as an entrepreneur facilitating the process. As a first step, he applied to the Tuck business school at Dartmouth, got in and quit his Texas job, despite his mother's concern that he was giving up future promotions and very good health insurance, particularly Marconi's dental plan.

His life at Tuck soon sent him in still another direction. When he graduates next June he will probably go to work for Mercer Management Consulting, he says. Mercer recruited him at a starting salary of $150,000, including bonus. "If you had told me a couple of years ago that I would be making three times my Marconi salary, I would not have believed you," Mr. McCullar said.

DOJ_NMG_0098098

Nearly 70 percent of Tuck's graduates go directly to consulting firms or Wall Street investment houses. He may pursue finance later, Mr. McCullar says, always keeping in mind an entrepreneurial venture that could really leverage his talent.

"When my mom talks of Marconi's dental plan and a safe retirement," he said, "she really means lifestyle security based on job security."

But "for my generation," Mr. McCullar said, "lifestyle security comes from financial independence. I'm doing what I want to do and it just so happens that is where the money is."

Separate Truths (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

For two women, so much comes down to this: a fragment of bone and the lick of a love letter.

Military scientists recently compared the bone recovered in a North Vietnamese jungle where an Air Force pilot's plane went down 40 years ago to saliva on letters he had sent his wife. It was a DNA match, they announced. At last, they said, the remains of Col. Charles J. Scharf had been found.

What they couldn't have known, however, was how differently that announcement would affect two women he left behind.

His widow, Patricia Scharf, 72, of Northern Virginia, has never remarried, has never had children and still considers the Vietnam War officer the love of her life. For her, the announcement was the gentle rub across the shoulder she had waited four decades to feel, one that let her know it was all right to let go.

For Barbara Scharf Lowerison, 72, his sister in California, the announcement was a slap. It meant she was losing -- if she had not already lost -- her fight to convince officials that her brother is alive, a prisoner of war.

The remains of more than 1,300 lost U.S. service members have been identified over the years, with 850 of those from the Vietnam War alone, according to military officials. Usually when remains are identified, relatives emotionally embrace the finding, said Larry Greer of the Department of Defense POW/Missing Personnel Office. And among the few who reject it, most eventually come around "because the science is so overwhelming," he said.

"One of the things it does do for all of us, and we hope for the families, is it helps write the closing chapters of this story that has been painfully open for 40 or 60 years," Greer said.

If that is true, then the story of Charles Scharf, it seems, has two endings.'What Kept You?'

Patricia Scharf wears the same shade of vibrant red lipstick as in the photos of her youth. After "Chuck" didn't come home with the rest of the POWs, she spent years fantasizing about how he might swoop back into her life.

"If he was to walk in that door right now, I could love him like when I was young," Scharf said. "And I'd say, 'What kept you so long?' "

But the proof that he is gone, really gone, lay across her Falls Church dining room table one recent night, separated into small plastic bags labeled with black marker.

There was the burnt, tattered wallet he was carrying the day his plane was shot down in October 1965. A singed identification card, with his name decipherable, was inside. There were his dog tags. His silver captain's bars. (He was promoted posthumously to colonel.) The torn, worn scapular, or cloth religious pendant, he received on their wedding day. Scharf has an identical one.

"Nobody has that. What other pilot has that? That is ours. That is ours," she said.

The items, officials said, were found during several excavations of the crash site.

"Now I'm convinced," Scharf said. "I really am."

They met when she was 16 and married two years later. They had 13 years together before he left for war. She remembers standing among the other Air Force wives on a runway in Florida the day the men flew away. She waved a scarf so Chuck would see her, and he saluted back. A pilot's pregnant wife stood next to her, crying.

"She was saying she knew she wasn't going to see her husband again," Scharf said. "I said: 'Yes we are. We're going to meet them with champagne when they come back.'

"Well," she started, then stopped.

"It was a beautiful life," she said. "It had glory in it. It had strength in it. It had romance in it."

The love letters he sent, about 75 over three months, are addressed to "Mrs. Charles Scharf" outside and to "darling" and "sweetheart" inside. In one, he talks about the family they would start when he returned. They had lost a baby, a girl, at birth.

If she had lived, she would have been almost 50 today, Scharf said. "I would have been a grandma."

After her husband disappeared, Scharf said, she had to learn to take care of herself. She sells jewelry in the Pentagon, and the people there are her family, she said. But when she comes home, she is alone. She talks about her life with Chuck separately from her life without him.

DOJ_NMG_0098099

She said that, unlike his sister, she had to let him go.

"I was the wife. It was our life. It was us who lived together. She still has a family. She has everybody there," she said of his sister.

Scharf first held a memorial for her husband in 1978, when the Air Force technically declared him dead. It was a memorial with an empty box. When she buries him Thursday at Arlington National Cemetery, the coffin will carry the bone fragment and a uniform, complete with badges and medals, as if he were wearing it. She also will place the items from the crash site and the love letters in the coffin.

She plans to be buried there with him eventually.

"I now know where I'll be," she said.'Not My Brother'

Barbara Scharf Lowerison would stop the funeral if she could. And she certainly won't be there for it, she said.

"I don't know what they are burying," she said. "That is not my brother."

Charles Scharf was older by a year-and-a-half, and he was her protector before he was his wife's.

"I'll never forget when I had my first baby. I was 18 years old, and he wanted to take over," she said, laughing. "We had a brother-and-sister rivalry at times, but there was nothing I wouldn't do for him."

About 25 boxes sit in her Hemet, Calif., home filled with letters, witness statements and scientific reports. She thinks he survived the crash, and if he isn't alive, he was until this year. For four decades, she fought to bring him home.

"I think I've been a pain in a neck to everybody. But that's okay. I'm fighting for my brother," she said.

Before he disappeared, Lowerison was a housewife raising five boys and had no involvement in politics.

Since then, she has established sources in Vietnam and Russia whom she has asked for help. She has lobbied presidents from Richard M. Nixon on, giving each a POW bracelet with her brother's name. And for every piece of evidence Pentagon officials have put forth to prove they found Scharf, she has fired back questions:

Why were the items at the excavation site not burned beyond recognition like the bodies?

Why did he have anything on him when most Air Force officers had to store personal effects in a locker before a mission?

Why was the bone fragment not good enough to establish a match with the blood sample she gave in 1992 but now can be matched with the letters?

"No one is telling the truth in this story," she said. "That's the bottom line. No one is telling the truth."

Her proof, she said, includes statements from a former POW who was in her brother's squadron. He told her that he saw photographs of Scharf after the crash. There is also a propaganda film in which a man can be seen for only seconds but walks exactly like her brother, she said.

"I used to say he swiveled when he walked," Lowerison said. "He had a little bit of a sway to him."

About two weeks before he disappeared, she received a letter from him. In it, he told her that he was sending her a ring for her birthday and that he had "some good war stories" to tell her boys when he got home, she said.

She thinks he would appreciate the fight she has launched in his name. "He would have a smile on his face and give me a thumbs-up sign," she said.

If she had never seen the evidence, never heard from others who think he didn't die in the crash, she said, she might have gone along with the military's version, might have been able to bury him long ago. She still might be able to, she said, but not this way.

"If they come and tell me he died six months ago, I'd go along with it," she said. "I would go to that burial."

Lowerison and Patricia Scharf don't speak ill of each other. They don't speak much of each other at all, each dismissing the other's beliefs in short, neutral sentences. "That's her prerogative," Lowerison said of Scharf. "Everyone has different ways of grieving," Scharf said of Lowerison.

So on Thursday, Scharf will stand before her husband's plot at Arlington, content that she has a place now to lay flowers. Lowerison will remain in California, not saying goodbye, not letting go.

Atheists Agonistes (NYT)

By Richard A. Schweder

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

Chicago

ONE of the surest ways to bring a certain type of dinner party to a halt is to speak piously about “God.” Earnest reference to sinners, apostates or blasphemers, or to the promise of salvation offered in evangelical churches, is likely to produce the same effect. Among the cosmopolites who live in secular enclaves, religion is automatically associated with darkness, superstition, irrationality and an antique or pre-modern cast of mind. It has long been assumed that religion is opposed to science, reason and human progress; and the death of gods is simply taken for granted as a deeply ingrained Darwinian article of faith.

Why, then, are the enlightened so conspicuously up in arms these days, reiterating every possible argument against the existence of God? Why are they indulging in books — Daniel Dennett's "Breaking the Spell," Sam Harris's "Letter to a Christian Nation," and Richard Dawkins's "God Delusion" — in which authors lampoon religion or rail against the devout under the banner of a crusading atheism? Books dictated or co-written by God sell quite well among the 2.1 billion self-declared Christians and 1.3 billion self-declared Muslims of the world. What explains the current interest among secularists in absolutely, positively establishing that the author is a fraud?

The most obvious answer is that the armies of disbelief have been provoked. Articulate secularists may be merely reacting to the many recent incitements from religious zealots at home and abroad, as fanatics and infidels have their ways of keeping each other in business.

A deeper and far more unsettling answer, however, is that the popularity of the current counterattack on religion cloaks a renewed and intense anxiety within secular society that it is not the story of religion but rather the story of the Enlightenment that may be more illusory than real.

The Enlightenment story has its own version of Genesis, and the themes are well known: The world woke up from the slumber of the "dark ages," finally got in touch with the truth and became good about 300 years ago in Northern and Western Europe.

As people opened their eyes, religion (equated with ignorance and superstition) gave way to science (equated with fact and reason). Parochialism and tribal allegiances gave way to ecumenism, cosmopolitanism and individualism. Top-down command systems gave way to the separation of church from state, of politics from science. The story provides a blueprint for how to remake and better the world in the image and interests of the West's secular elites.

Unfortunately, as a theory of history, that story has had a predictive utility of approximately zero. At the turn of the millennium it was pretty hard not to notice that the 20th century was probably the worst one yet, and that the big causes of all the death and destruction had rather little to do with religion. Much to everyone's surprise, that great dance on the Berlin Wall back in 1989 turned out not to be the apotheosis of the Enlightenment.

Science has not replaced religion; group loyalties have intensified, not eroded. The collapse of the cold war's balance of power has not resulted in the end of collective faiths or a rush to democracy and individualism. In Iraq, the "West is best" default (and its discourse about universal human rights) has provided a foundation for chaos.

Even some children within the enclave are retreating from the Enlightenment in their quest for a spiritual revival; one discovers perfectly rational and devout Jews or Hindus in one's own family, or living down the block. If religion is a delusion, it is a delusion with a future, which it may be hazardous for us to deny. A shared conception of the soul, the sacred and transcendental values may be a prerequisite for any viable society.

John Locke, who was almost everyone's favorite political philosopher at the time of the founding of our nation, was a very tolerant man. In his 1689 "Letter Concerning Toleration," he advocated a policy of live and let live for believers in many faiths, even heretics. But he drew the line at atheists. He wrote: "Lastly, those are not at all to be tolerated who deny the being of God. Promises, covenants and oaths, which are the bonds of human societies, can have no hold upon an atheist. The taking away of God, though but even in thought, dissolves all."

Instead of waging intellectual battles over the existence of god(s), those of us who live in secular society might profit by being slower to judge others and by trying very hard to understand how it is possible for John Locke and our many atheist friends to continue to gaze at each other in such a state of mutual misunderstanding.

What, No Tipping The People's Servants? (NYT)

By Dorothy Samuels

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

If you think Washington's culture of corruption is bad now and couldn't get appreciably worse, my hunch is you don't know about United States v. Valdes. This pending federal case could end up making it legal for public officials to accept gratuities for granting certain types of favored government treatment.

I know, you're thinking that I must be exaggerating. Stuffing the pockets of government officials with cash to gain some sort of edge is plainly against the law, right? I've always thought so. That is, I did until last February, when a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals in Washington, splitting 2 to 1, overturned the conviction of a former District of Columbia police detective named Nelson Valdes.

The basic facts are not in dispute. In an effort to cover influence-peddling that may not rise to bribery, the federal gratuities law makes it a crime for a public official to seek or receive "anything of value personally for or because of any official act performed or to be performed."

DOJ_NMG_0098101

Mr. Valdes became an apparent violator by accepting hundreds of dollars in cash as reward for delving into computerized police records to obtain vehicle-registration and arrest-warrant information on drivers at the request of someone who — surprise — turned out to be an F.B.I. informant. Indicted for bribery, the detective was convicted by a jury of the "lesser-included offense" of receiving an illegal gratuity.

Incredibly, the appellate panel tossed out the conviction, finding the anti-gratuities prohibition didn't apply because Mr. Valdes's granting of preferential access to police information lacked a sufficiently "formal" relationship to a decision or action in fulfillment of his "official" public duties. Huh? Mr. Valdes enjoyed access to the police database only because of his official status. And it's not as if researching the background of individuals is removed from a cop's day-to-day job. Police officers do it every time they write a traffic ticket.

Making matters worse, the majority did not just read into the illegal gratuities statute a kooky distinction between "formal" actions and "casual and informal" use of government resources not amenable to criminal prosecution. It provided zero in the way of real guidance for determining which is which. Under the majority's odd formulation, slipping lawmakers or their aides money as reward or incentive for promoting favorable legislation would clearly be illegal. But if a lawmaker, straying from her "formal" everyday legislative duties, accepted a fat wad of bills from a contract-seeking corporate executive as thanks for using her influence to open doors at a government agency, it might not be.

In her dissenting opinion, Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson did not mince words about the ethics disaster achieved by the misapplication by her two colleagues of the Supreme Court's unanimous 1999 decision tossing out, on different grounds, a gratuities case involving former Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy.

"In Mexico," she wrote, "they call it 'la mordida' (literally, 'the bite'); in Iran, 'bakhshish'; and in France, 'pot-de-vin.' Here in America, we call it a 'payoff' and, today, the majority calls it lawful."

While the nation's attention was riveted on the election and other things in late September, an appeal of the damaging Valdes decision was heard by the full bench of the Court of Appeals in Washington. No matter the outcome, revisiting the illegal gratuities law to achieve some overdue clarity and tightening should be part of the ethics reform agenda pursued by Congress's new Democratic majority. Government needs to be a no-tipping zone.

Gaza Cease-fire Raises Hopes For Peace (AP-Y)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 27, 2006

Rocket fire from Gaza died down Sunday after a daybreak cease-fire, raising hopes for an end to five months of bloody destruction and a new opening toward peace talks.

The surprise truce was supposed to take effect at 6 a.m., but in the four hours that followed, 11 rockets were fired from Gaza at Israeli towns and villages and some Palestinian militants threatened to keep up the attacks.

Israel did not retaliate, saying it wanted to give the truce a chance.

"Even though there are still violations of the cease-fire by the Palestinian side, I have instructed our defense officials not to respond, to show restraint, and to give this cease-fire a chance to take full effect," Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said during a ceremony at a high school in southern Israel.

Rivals Hamas and Fatah, the two main factions in the Palestinian government, also publicly backed the truce and by nightfall, it appeared to take hold. Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of the ruling Hamas movement said he had contacted the leaders of all Palestinian factions Sunday and they reassured him they were committed to the cease-fire.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, who has been pressing for a reopening of peace talks with Israel, ordered his security forces to patrol the Gaza border on Sunday to stop rocket attacks. Security officers fanned out across northern Gaza, taking up positions at major intersections with orders to stop anyone suspicious and the salvos stopped by the afternoon.

"The instructions are clear. Anyone violating the national agreement will be considered to be breaking the law," said Lt. Gen. Abdel Razek Mejaidie, Abbas' security adviser.

Battle-hardened Israelis and Palestinians were wary, having seen similar truces and peace efforts disintegrate and slip back into violence.

In the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, the source of most of the rocket fire and target of punishing Israeli reprisals, Rafik Gaish was bitter because the Israelis tore up his fields.

"My potatoes were apparently launching rockets," the farmer scoffed. "We are for this agreement, we want peace — but what will stop the Jews?"

Many residents of Beit Hanoun returning to their damaged homes after the Israeli withdrawal lashed out in anger.

"The Israelis need no pretext to cause destruction, for killing and bloodshed," said Ayoub Kafarna, 65. "Nothing can compensate us for our losses."

DOJ_NMG_0098102

Just 1 1/2 miles away and across the border fence, many of the 22,000 residents of the working-class Israeli town of Sderot, targeted by hundreds of rockets from Gaza, were pessimistic.

"I was optimistic, but that optimism lasted only a few minutes until another rocket landed," 20-year-old Neta Ammar said Sunday after two homes near hers were struck.

"It's a joke," said Dudu Cohen, a 37-year-old convenience store owner in Sderot. "There is no one to talk to on the other side, there is no one to have a cease-fire with."

If the truce holds, it would be a coup for Abbas who has been trying for months to end the violence in Gaza that has killed 300 Palestinians, scores of them civilians, and five Israelis.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni stressed the need to follow the truce with diplomatic steps.

"History teaches us that if this kind of cease-fire with the Palestinians isn't accompanied by something else, it will deteriorate," she said.

The cease-fire was worked out late Saturday night when Abbas called Olmert with an agreement from Palestinian militant groups to halt rocket fire and other violence from Gaza.

Olmert pledged in turn to end the military offensive Israel launched in June after Hamas-linked militants from Gaza captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid. The soldier has not been seen since, but Hamas' leader said Saturday he is still alive.

Word of the cease-fire came shortly after Hamas' Damascus-based supreme leader Khaled Mashaal held several days of talks in Cairo with Egyptian mediators. Palestinian officials said those talks played a role in speeding up the agreement.

In a television interview aired Sunday, Mashaal said Hamas would be willing to give negotiations eight months or a year before launching a new uprising against Israel, backing away from a six-month deadline he set the day before.

Mashaal, who spoke by telephone during a taped show on Egypt's Channel One, was responding to a question from the Palestinian information minister and member of Fatah, who said it was not logical for Palestinians to be talking about an uprising.

"I said six months, but do you want more than six months? Maybe we can take eight months or a year," Mashaal said. But he warned, "If the door is sealed and the horizon is closed (for creating a Palestinian state) then we have to look for another choice."

Israeli troops withdrew from Gaza ahead of the 6 a.m. Sunday deadline. Dozens of tanks and armored vehicles were parked just over the border in a staging ground in southern Israel early Sunday.

But Palestinian militants, including those linked to Hamas, kept up rocket fire into Israel throughout the morning.

"(We) reiterate that our attacks against the enemy continue," Hamas militants said in a statement on their Web site claiming responsibility for several of the rocket attacks.

Islamic Jihad also claimed responsibility for firing rockets at Israel. However, after nightfall Sunday, an official from the militant faction, Khaled al-Batch, said the group was on board. "We will respect this (national) agreement so long as Israel is committed," he said.

Israel has no ties with the Hamas-led Palestinian government, which rejects the Jewish state's right to exist. But it considers Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately last year, an acceptable negotiating partner.

A cease-fire in Gaza is part of a broad package Abbas is trying to put together in the hope of restoring hundreds of millions of dollars in funding Western donors cut off to pressure Hamas to recognize Israel and renounce violence.

Cease-fire Calms Gaza (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

TEL AVIV -- A fragile Israeli-Palestinian cease-fire took effect yesterday, stoking faint hopes for a resumption of peace negotiations even though it was breached by five rockets fired from the Gaza Strip into southern Israel.

The truce, which started at 6 a.m. local time, reflects recognition by the hobbled governments of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority that the five months of fighting touched off by the Gaza kidnapping of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit is eroding public support for both administrations, analysts said.

Whether the cease-fire takes hold or goes the way of at least three failed truces in six years depends on whether it can spur momentum toward a prisoner exchange and an agreement on a Palestinian unity government that could win an end to the international boycott on the Palestinian Authority.

On a visit to a Bedouin town in southern Israel yesterday, Mr. Olmert said Israel would demonstrate restraint and patience despite the early breach of the truce, which applies only to the Gaza Strip.

"Of course the cease-fire doesn't offer an answer to all of the issues on the agenda between us and the Palestinian Authority. I believe this understanding is very liable to contribute to the release of Gilad Shalit," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0098103

"All of these things are likely to lead to one thing: the opening of serious, genuine, direct negotiations between us and the Palestinian Authority, and between me" and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Having coaxed Palestinian militant groups in Gaza into a unilateral moratorium on rocket fire, attacks against Israeli military targets and arms-smuggling activity, Mr. Abbas then negotiated the truce in which Mr. Olmert pledged to recall Israeli forces from Gaza. Israel also is expected to halt assassinations of militants in Gaza.

The rocket fire yesterday morning was a reminder of the spoiler role that independent Palestinian militias such as Islamic Jihad can play as long as security branches of Mr. Abbas' Fatah party and Hamas fail to collect their weapons and enforce the law in Gaza.

Sheik Yazeeb Khader, a Hamas spokesman, said the Islamic militants agreed to the truce because they want progress on a "national unity government, the prisoners exchange, and relieving our people from the political and economic siege."

Since Cpl. Shalit was kidnapped in a June raid on an Israeli unit patrolling the Gaza border, Israeli offensives have left 375 Palestinians dead in Gaza -- including 199 noncombatants, according to the Israeli human rights monitor B'tselem. In the same period, two soldiers were killed in Gaza.

But two Israeli civilians were killed by rockets in Sderot in the past two weeks, bringing pressure on Mr. Olmert's government for a massive offensive in Gaza.

The truce reflects an acknowledgment by Israeli political and military leaders that the military campaign has not succeeded in halting the rocket attacks.

Mr. Olmert "has no choice," said Reuven Hazan, a political scientist at Jerusalem's Hebrew University. "There is no military response to firing of Qassam rockets, just like there is no military response to firing of Katyusha rockets" from Lebanon.

"This gets Sderot off the front pages," he said.

The fighting, meanwhile, has prevented Hamas from trying to stabilize Gaza, where anger is rising as the economy remains choked by an international aid freeze.

In addition to giving new momentum to talks to release Cpl. Shalit, a period of calm would allow Hamas and Fatah to complete talks on a power-sharing government that might meet international requirements for a resumption of aid.

For the first time, Hamas' hard-line leadership in exile showed signs of moderation this weekend. Speaking at a Palestinian summit in Cairo, Hamas politburo chief Khalid Mashaal said Hamas would give six months for talks with Israel on establishing a state in the West Bank and Gaza.

Even though Mr. Mashaal threatened a new Palestinian uprising if such talks failed, observers said the offer could signal a willingness by Islamic militants to part with an ideology that rejects any idea of a peace agreement with Israel.

Israeli And Palestinian Leaders Committed To Gaza Cease-fire (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, November 27, 2006

JERUSALEM — After five months of fighting in the Gaza Strip, Israeli and Palestinian leaders moved Sunday to shore up a cease-fire that both sides had sought as relief from a politically costly conflict that has left more than 300 people dead.

The truce was holding Sunday — after Israeli forces withdrew from Gaza overnight — despite a ragged start. At least seven rockets fired from Gaza landed in Israel after the accord took effect at 6 a.m. By 10:15 a.m., the rocket fire had stopped, and the silence continued into the early hours today.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas instructed his security chiefs to enforce the cease-fire. Officials said 13,000 Palestinian police officers in flak jackets and helmets were patrolling Gaza's borders to discourage new rocket attacks.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert ordered the army to show restraint, "even though there are still violations by the Palestinian side." He added, "I have instructed our defense officials … to give this cease-fire a chance."

The accord, arranged late Saturday, followed months of Israeli military pressure on Hamas, which governs the Palestinian Authority. Since taking control after January elections, the militant Islamist movement has refused to recognize Israel or renounce its hostility toward the Jewish state. It also started stockpiling weapons.

Faced with the threat of an Israeli invasion and demands by Palestinian rivals to give up a government crippled by international economic sanctions, Hamas last week authorized Abbas to phone Olmert with a cease-fire offer and persuaded other militant groups to go along.

Olmert, damaged politically by the summer war against the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon, quickly accepted.

Israel again found itself unable to deal a decisive blow to an aggressive enemy. After five months of incursions into Gaza, the army could not stop the daily rain of crude Kassam rockets on Israeli border towns, particularly Sderot, where two civilians were killed in the last two weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0098104

"Israel and Hamas, like two bruised boxers swaying in front of each other, were desperately waiting to be saved by the bell," political analyst Ben Caspit wrote in the Israeli newspaper Maariv. "Hamas was under pressure from Israel. And Israel was in an insufferable situation; citizens in one town were hostages, and no one could do anything about it."

The incursions also served as a bitter reminder of the failure of Israel's landmark withdrawal of troops and settlers last year, which both sides had hoped would help make the Gaza Strip a prototype for Palestinian statehood.

The truce grew from weeks of discreet phone contacts between Olmert and Abbas, the Fatah Party leader who remained as president when Hamas took over the government.

Israel refuses to talk to Hamas, but considers the more moderate Abbas an acceptable negotiating partner. Both sides said Sunday that they hoped the truce would be extended to the West Bank and pave the way for a revival of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks that collapsed six years ago with the Palestinian uprising.

Before the knotty issues of a peace settlement can be broached, Israel wants Hamas to free Cpl. Gilad Shalit, whose capture in a cross-border raid June 25 set off the latest round of fighting. Palestinian leaders want Israel to release millions of dollars in tax revenue and duties it has collected on behalf of their government.

Abbas has pressed Hamas to stop firing rockets into Israel, free the corporal and turn the government over to a team of nonpolitical technocrats — concessions aimed at ending military and economic pressure from Israel and a freeze on Western aid that has left the Palestinian government unable to pay its 165,000 workers.

For months, Hamas showed little interest in a deal. It demanded the release of 1,400 prisoners in exchange for the soldier and declined to recognize Israel or renounce violence, conditions set by Western nations to end the sanctions.

But Hamas' battlefield losses have taken a toll. Most of the 300 or so Palestinians killed in the fighting were armed militants, including 25 who died in a four-day stretch last week. The Israelis, who lost three soldiers in five months, threatened a large-scale offensive to disrupt Hamas' weapons buildup.

"Hamas has been dragging its feet for nearly a year, but now perhaps there are buds of understanding that they cannot go on like this," Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Sunday.

In addition to accepting a truce, Hamas made it known to Egyptian mediators last week that it would settle for the release of "several hundred" prisoners in exchange for Shalit, Israeli newspapers reported.

Giora Eiland, an Israeli army reserve general and former head of the National Security Council, said a truce could help speed a prisoner exchange for which Hamas could claim credit, helping it to fend off pressure to relinquish the government.

"This political aspect of being able to continue their control of the Palestinian Authority is far more important than any kind of shooting," Eiland said. "This truce is the best Hamas can achieve. It serves their interests for now."

Many Israelis were quick to warn Sunday that Hamas might use the cease-fire to continue stockpiling weapons, as Hezbollah, its role model, did in Lebanon in the years preceding the summer war. Of all the cease-fire conditions, a halt to weapons smuggling from Egypt into Gaza is the hardest to enforce.

"This fictitious cease-fire will have only one clear outcome: Hamas will use the timeout to regroup," said Effi Eitam, a conservative member of the Israeli parliament.

That is if the timeout lasts.

Although the accord is the most serious effort to end the Gaza fighting, its acceptance by all Palestinian militants is tentative at best.

In the early hours of the truce, militants speaking in the name of Hamas, Fatah and Islamic Jihad each claimed responsibility for the continued rocket fire, one of which smashed a home in Sderot after its owners safely fled to the basement.

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas contacted the leaders of all armed factions Sunday, and a government spokesman said they had reaffirmed their commitment to the cease-fire.

"There is a 100% effort to make this work, but there is no guarantee of 100% results," said Ghazi Hamad, the spokesman.

Israel Withdraws From Gaza As Truce Begins, Unsteadily (NYT)

By Dina Kraft

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

SDEROT, Israel, Nov. 26 — A cease-fire in Gaza appeared to be holding on Sunday after Palestinian factions stopped firing rockets at Israel in exchange for an Israeli troop withdrawal from the territory.

The cease-fire, part of an agreement reached late Saturday by Israeli and Palestinian leaders to end five months of fighting in the territory, was to have taken effect at 6 a.m. but got off to a shaky start when Palestinian militants belonging to Hamas and Islamic Jihad launched nine rockets into southern Israel.

One rocket crashed through the roof of a house in this Israeli border town but caused no injuries. The other rockets landed in open areas. By 10:15 a.m., the rocket fire had stopped.

DOJ_NMG_0098105

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, who had been under intense domestic pressure to authorize an even bigger military operation in Gaza to stop the rocket attacks, spoke of restraint.

"The state of Israel is a very strong country," Mr. Olmert said. "It is strong enough to fight terror, and it is strong enough to show restraint in order to give an opportunity for the cease-fire to come into full comprehensive and practical effect."

In Sderot, which has borne the brunt of the Qassam rocket attacks, residents ventured out in the streets to shop and get some air, some of them for the first time in days.

On a street of spacious private homes in this largely working-class town, Daniel Gigi, 45, oversaw friends and neighbors helping clean up glass and broken tiles after a rocket crashed through his roof at dawn. They were also helping him, his wife and four children pack up boxes of belongings.

Having endured rocket fire for six years, they had decided to move farther north, out of range, and had already sold their home. But the rocket strike accelerated their plans.

"The tension is always in the air," said Mr. Gigi, a forester. "We call the children 10 times a day, tell them to stay inside all the time. It simply takes its toll."

The agreement to stop the rocket fire was brokered with the various Palestinian factions by the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas of the Fatah faction. While some say they think it will be short-lived, like previous cease-fires, others say it is the most important chance so far to end the fighting. Mr. Olmert even suggested it might set off a revival of peace efforts after years of stalemate.

Mr. Abbas fanned his security forces out across the Gaza border with Israel Sunday in a bid to prevent further rocket fire. He has taken such actions in the past, with mixed results. The numerous and unruly factions that have claimed responsibility for launching Qassam rockets have rarely been reined in by the Palestinian Authority for long.

From the Israeli perspective, the cease-fire, which does not cover the West Bank, is a result of its military tactics and pressure in Gaza. After withdrawing all its settlers and soldiers from the Gaza Strip in September 2005, Israel re-entered parts of Gaza in late June after the capture of one of its soldiers in a cross-border raid by Palestinian militants, including members of Hamas, which runs the Palestinian Authority.

Mr. Olmert said the re-entry was to win the release of the captured soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, but many Israelis said they viewed the move as a chance to quash the rocket fire.

Hamas has justified its capture of the soldier and its involvement in the rocket attacks as a response to Israeli shelling that has killed civilians. Israel has consistently countered that all its military actions were in response to Palestinian aggression, like the Qassam rockets fired almost randomly into towns and farms.

Before Israel's previous withdrawal in 2005, most of the rocket fire was aimed at Jewish settlements in Gaza. Since then, at least 1,100 rockets have been fired into Israel itself. With the escalation of the fighting in June, about 400 Palestinians have been killed, a number of them militants, along with three Israeli soldiers. Four Israelis have been killed by rocket fire in the past 14 months, two of them in the past two weeks as the rocket barrages have intensified and become more accurate.

This cease-fire is noteworthy also for including Islamic Jihad, which has rarely respected such agreements in the past. Its representatives said Sunday that Islamic Jihad would abide by the truce but vowed to respond to any Israeli attacks on Palestinians, the customary formulation.

The truce, if it holds, could be part of a larger effort to break the stalemate, including an exchange of Palestinian prisoners for Corporal Shalit and the formation of a national unity government for the Palestinian Authority. A unity government could end the economic and political embargo imposed by Western countries after Hamas was elected in January.

"If the cease-fire is to be anything more than a temporary fragile arrangement, the West Bank also has to be a factor, and I think that on this issue our interests and those of Hamas coincide," Giora Eiland, a former Israeli general and former director of the national security council, told Israel Radio.

A second barrage of rockets was shot toward Sderot around the time school began on Sunday. An alarm sounded across the city and children scrambled under desks and tables.

Parents in both southern Israel and Gaza reported anxious and fearful children, many showing signs of trauma and regression like bed-wetting and nightmares after the long months of back and forth fighting, rockets, shelling and airstrikes.

"My friends and I talk about the Qassams, how close we have all been to them at different times," said Avi Grunov, 11, who was treated for shock last week after seeing a rocket fall just 50 feet away as he walked to school. "I'm still scared because I don't think this is a real cease-fire. They are still shooting at us."

Gaza Ceasefire Raises Hopes Of Talks (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, November 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098106

Israel and Palestinian militants began a ceasefire in the Gaza Strip on Sunday, raising hopes for a meeting soon between Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, and Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian president.

Israeli troops withdrew from Gaza on Sunday morning, ending an offensive launched in June after Hamas militants captured an Israeli soldier. Around 400 Palestinians, including many civilians, have been killed in army operations and raids during the last few months.

The soldier, Corporal Gilad Shalit, is still in captivity. Mr Abbas hopes talks on a Palestinian unity government, to replace the Hamas-led administration, can be concluded soon along with a wider exchange of prisoners with Israel.

Mr Abbas ordered his security chiefs to monitor the Gaza border area to stop militants launching rocket attacks, which killed two Israelis in the last week.

"Anyone violating the national agreement will be considered to be breaking the law," said Lt Gen Abdel Razek Mejaidie, an Abbas security adviser.

Some militants, including those from Islamic Jihad, said they were not part of the ceasefire agreement brokered by Mr Abbas. But Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, said leaders of all the Palestinian factions told him they were committed to the truce.

"There is a 100 per cent effort to make this work but there is no guarantee of 100 per cent results," said Ghazi Hamad, a Hamas spokesman.

Mr Olmert urged restraint when a volley of rocket fire was launched after the truce went into effect.

"Even though there are still violations of the ceasefire by the Palestinian side, I have instructed our defence officials not to respond, to show restraint, and to give the ceasefire a chance to take full effect," said the Israeli prime minister.

He also said: "This could be the beginning of a serious, real, open and direct negotiation between Israel and the Palestinian Authority... leading towards a full settlement between Israel and the Palestinians."

Mr Olmert has been under harsh domestic criticism since Cpl Shalit was captured, focused on the army's failure to achieve a resounding success either during the summer war against Hizbollah in Lebanon or in Gaza.

Meanwhile, the Hamas-run Palestinian Authority has been under a western aid embargo since taking office in March. Mr Abbas, of the Fatah party, is hoping an eventual national unity government composed of technocrats will trigger the release of aid.

A White House spokesman said the ceasefire was a positive step. Some moderate Arab states have been pushing Washington to make greater efforts in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying this would make it easier to forge alliances, for example against Iran's nuclear ambitions and in Iraq.

President George W. Bush will be in the region this week but there were no plans for him to meet any Israeli ministers, an Israeli official said last week. Mr Bush will travel to the Jordanian capital Amman for talks with Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister.

Truce May Restart Israeli-Palestinian Talks (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, November 27, 2006

TEL AVIV

Bolstering optimism for the resumption of peace talks, a fragile Israeli-Palestinian cease-fire took effect Sunday even as it was breached by at least nine militant rockets.

The truce reflects recognition by the hobbled governments of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority (PA) that months of fighting sparked by an Israeli soldier's capture is eroding their public support, analysts say.

But whether the cease-fire will gain traction or go the way of previous failures may depend on its ability to spur a prisoner exchange and an agreement on a new Palestinian unity government that could lead to an end of the international boycott of the PA.

On a visit to a Bedouin town in southern Israel, Mr. Olmert said Israel would demonstrate restraint and patience despite the early breach of the truce.

"Of course the cease-fire doesn't offer an answer to all of the issues on the agenda between us and the Palestinian Authority. I believe this understanding is very liable to contribute to the release of [the captured Israeli soldier] Gilad Shalit," he said, expressing hope the truce would also be extended to the West Bank. "All of these things are likely to lead to one thing: the opening of serious, genuine, direct negotiations between us and the Palestinian Authority, and between me" and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, he said.

Having coaxed Palestinian militant groups in Gaza into a unilateral moratorium on rocket fire, attacks against Israeli military targets, and arms-smuggling activity, President Abbas then mediated a truce with Olmert in which the prime minister pledged to recall forces that had returned to Gaza less than year after a September 2005 withdrawal. Israel is also expected to halt assassinations on militants in Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0098107

Still, the rocket fire Sunday morning was a reminder of the spoiler role that independent Palestinian militias like Islamic Jihad can play as long as security branches of Abbas's Fatah Party and Hamas demur from weapons collections and law enforcement in Gaza.

Hamas spokesman Sheikh Yazeeb Khader said his party agreed to the truce because it wants progress on a "national unity government, the prisoners exchange, and relieving our people from the political and economic siege."

Since Corporal Shalit was captured in a June raid on an Israeli unit patrolling the Gaza border, Israeli offensives have left at least 375 Palestinians dead in Gaza - including 199 noncombatants, according to the Israeli human rights monitoring group Btselem. In the same period, two Israeli soldiers were killed in Gaza.

The cease-fire comes after two Israelis were killed in the southern Israeli town of Sderot in the past two weeks, and as pressure mounted on Olmert's government to launch a massive offensive in Gaza reminiscent of the 2002 Defense Shield campaign in the West Bank.

The truce reflects an acknowledgment by Israeli leaders that in the absence of a guaranteed military solution to the Gaza rockets, the cease-fire is worth the political risk.

Olmert "has no choice. There is no military response to firing of Qassam rockets, just like there is no military response to firing of Katyusha rockets" from Lebanon, says Reuven Hazan, a political scientist at Jerusalem's Hebrew university. "This gets Sderot off the front pages."

Though Hamas has reasserted its militant credentials in the recent weeks of rocket attacks on Israel, the fighting has prevented it from any attempt at stabilizing Gaza while an international aid boycott against the Islamic militants has severely choked the Palestinian economy.

In addition to giving new momentum to talks to release Shalit, a calm in the violence would allow Hamas and the rival Fatah Party to complete talks on power sharing and meeting the international requirements for talks with Israel.

And for the first time this past weekend, Hamas's hard-line leadership in exile showed signs of moderation. Speaking at a Palestinian summit in Cairo, Hamas politburo chief Khaled Mashaal said Hamas would allow six months for talks with Israel on establishing a state in the West Bank and Gaza.

While Mr. Mashaal threatened a new Palestinian uprising if the talks fail, observers say it could signal a willingness by Islamic militants to part with ideology that negates the idea of a peace agreement with Israel.

Hamas is "realizing the old views and old opinions haven't borne any fruits," says Bassem Ezbeidi, a political science professor at Bir Zeit University.

But Yossi Alpher, the editor of the Web journal bitterlemons.org, cautions that "You still have serious government weakness on both sides. It's very fragile at this point."

Chilling Echo For Lebanon, Mirror Of Regional Tension (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 26 — In April 1975, gunmen fired on a church in East Beirut in what appeared to be an attempt to kill Pierre Gemayel, founder of the main right-wing Lebanese Christian militia. He was not killed, but the shooting set off a cycle of revenge that became a 15-year civil war.

Last week, three gunmen assassinated Mr. Gemayel's grandson and namesake, a government minister and symbol of Lebanon's besieged Christian, pro-Western community. Now an unnerving question is emerging here: as the battle between the Iranian-backed group Hezbollah and the Western-backed governing coalition reaches a crescendo, is it in fact the prelude to a civil war?

Lebanon's seeming slide toward civil conflict is not just a symbol of unfortunate historic symmetry. This country is a barometer for the region, serving as a measure of tensions and rivalries.

It is no coincidence that Lebanon is suffering its worst political crisis in decades at a time when Iraq has descended into sectarian war, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the past few months reached new heights and power seems to be shifting away from the Western-allied Sunni Muslim countries of Egypt and Saudi Arabia to the Shiite state of Iran.

"Generally, the regional situation at the time was very much what it is today," said Kamal Salibi, a historian and author from Beirut, speaking of the start of the 1975-90 civil war.

Then as now, a major Arab military humiliation prompted radicalism, hostility and questions of legitimacy for Arab governments from Morocco to Bahrain. Then it was the 1967 war in which Israel defeated four armies, and the spreading ideology was secular nationalism. Today, it is the American military presence in Iraq and the ideology is Islamism. In both cases, rising oil prices and terrorism serve as fuel and tool for the conflicts.

DOJ_NMG_0098108

In May 2003, with Baghdad occupied by American forces, Colin L. Powell, then the secretary of state, visited Damascus and warned Syrian and Lebanese leaders that there was a "new strategic situation" in the Middle East. He said they had to end support for groups the West considered terrorist, including Hamas and Hezbollah.

Today, events in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian areas have demonstrated the diminished status of the United States and its allies. In Iraq, the powerful Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr has threatened to stop supporting the government if the prime minister meets with President Bush, as he is scheduled to do Wednesday in Jordan. In Gaza, mediation by Egypt has failed to stem the rising tide of violence or negotiate the release of an Israeli solider despite its intense efforts. In Lebanon, the American-backed government is hanging on by a thread as Hezbollah and its allies push for more power.

"The army will first protect us, but if we find ourselves obliged we will take to the streets, and a peaceful confrontation will be faced with a peaceful confrontation, and clashes will be faced with clashes," said Walid Eido, a judge and member of Lebanon's Parliament in the governing coalition, speaking of the challenge from Hezbollah. "We will sell our blood to buy weapons and confront them. We will never let them control the country."

The Bush administration is worried about Lebanon as well as the other flashpoints, and it suddenly appears to be considering opening a dialogue with Iran and Syria to win help in stabilizing Iraq. In Gaza, Arab and Western diplomats said, Syria has used its relationship with Hamas to block Egypt's efforts to mediate talks on the return of the Israeli solider captured by Hamas.

These forces have come to bear on Lebanon, a weak state with weak institutions unable to shield itself from the volley of disruptions jolting the region. Lebanon is in crisis because of its unique brand of power sharing, divided largely along sectarian lines, but also arranged by geography and political needs of individual players.

Lebanon is also in crisis because of regional uncertainty, which has spawned an intense flurry of geopoliticking between adversaries looking for a leg up. While Saudi Arabia and Egypt struggle to maintain the status quo, Iran presses to rewrite it, defying the West with its nuclear program.

Egypt and Saudi Arabia have been trying to defuse the crisis in Lebanon. Saudi Arabia has tried to protect its financial holdings here and to safeguard Lebanon's Sunni population. Saudi officials in Lebanon have met with Hezbollah's general secretary, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, hoping to orchestrate a compromise, officials here said. Egypt's interest in Lebanon is aimed at preserving its national dignity and a role as a regional power broker.

"Part of this is purely made in Lebanon," said Mr. Salibi, the historian. "But it draws in the anti-Syrian and the pro-Syrian dichotomy, the Sunni-Shia dichotomy, the pro-Iranian-pro-Western dichotomy. All of this is drawn into Lebanon."

The specific Lebanese crisis is about who will control the government — and so hold the power to direct the country's interests toward the West, or Iran and Syria. Right now, the government is in the hands of what is called the March 14th coalition, a mix of Sunni, Druse and some Christian political parties aligned with the United States and France. Six pro-Syrian ministers recently resigned from the cabinet after talks aimed at building a so-called national unity government collapsed.

While the government was already on the verge brink of collapse, Mr. Gemayel was assassinated in broad daylight in an attack that left even hardened political leaders shaken.

Despite the rising tension, many political analysts say that Lebanon is a different place from what it was in 1975, less prone to violence. Political leaders also say they will do what they can to avoid a civil war — but will fight if pressed to.

There are at least two major regional differences between the 1970s and now. Syria is not the Syria of the past. There is no Soviet Union to support it, and the president, Bashar al-Assad, is viewed as far less effective than his father, Hafez. When Syria first broke with its Arab neighbors and made an alliance with Iran — Syria was the only Arab country allied with Iran during the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war — Syria was a more senior partner. Iran is now the senior partner, spreading its economic and military influence throughout Syria. And it has replaced Syria as Hezbollah's main contact point in Lebanon.

"Look at all this mess," said Timur Goksel, a former longtime spokesman for United Nations Forces in Lebanon. "The only one who has overall influence in the region with their military, ideology, money and propensity to cause mischief, are the Iranians."

In Damascus, there is a certain pride that its leaders bet on the right player, Tehran, in the regional jockeying for power. But there is also some anxiety emerging in Damascus over Iran's spreading influence. One Arab diplomat said one of the reasons Syria renewed its diplomatic ties with Iraq after so many years was fear that if the United States were to withdraw, Iran would quickly fill the power vacuum. Syria wants to make sure it has a foothold in the neighboring country so that it, too, can have some influence, said the diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, which is standard diplomatic practice.

The changing role of Iran and Syria in the region, and their diverging interests, come to bear in Lebanon.

One Arab diplomat in Lebanon said that Syria felt very strongly that it should be the prime player in Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0098109

That, the diplomat said, may have prompted Syria to press for chaos in Lebanon, feeling that it may derail the international tribunal investigating the death of Rafik Hariri, a former prime minister, but also put it in a position where it may, once again, be asked to use its power and influence in Lebanon to maintain the peace.

And there is a fear in the country that if the United States is desperate enough about Iraq it might be willing to accept a deal that restores Syrian hegemony over Lebanon. But they also say that tensions are high — and neither side is willing to back down. "This government threatens internal stability and civil peace, therefore it is essential to get rid of it through any possible medium," said Ahmad Malli, a Hezbollah politburo member. "I am assured there will be no civil war because the Lebanese today are more mature than they were in 1975."

Many agree. Yet Mr. Goksel, the former United Nations forces spokesman, said he sensed a risk for renewed conflict that was not negligible.

"There are still people in this country who are nostalgic for the civil war," he said. "They miss the days when they were somebody, when they had militias."

Strong Showing For Opposition Party In Bahrain Elections (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 26 — Shiite opposition candidates won 16 of the 17 seats they contested in Saturday's parliamentary elections in Bahrain, the country's election commission said Sunday.

The opposition now holds 40 percent of the elected Parliament's 40 seats, with the 17th contested seat to be decided in a runoff on Dec. 2.

But leaders of the predominantly Shiite opposition party, the Wefaq National Islamic Society, said the gains, which were expected, might not translate into much political power. Government loyalists may retain control of much of the remainder of the lower house, depending on the outcome of the runoff. Furthermore, the upper house, which is appointed by King Hamad al-Khalifa, can overrule any act of the lower house.

Still, they expressed satisfaction at the outcome. "What happened was no surprise," said Fahim Abdullah, a spokesman for Al Wefaq. "We just never contested an election before."

Mr. Abdullah emphasized that under fairer districting, his party would have garnered even more seats. "We succeeded in preparing the country for major changes," he said, "but we used to protest on the streets. Now we will be asking for real changes from within the Parliament. That is a notable advance."

Al Wefaq boycotted the 2002 parliamentary elections after King Hamad imposed a new Constitution that created the appointed chamber.

Bahrain's Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of the population, say they have been sidelined. They contend that the government has backed Sunni Islamists and encouraged increasingly sectarian politics. Tensions rose in September when a government adviser published a report outlining a conspiracy by senior government officials, including members of the royal family, to undermine Shiite power.

Only 1 of 18 women who ran won a seat, and the winner ran uncontested. The two largest Sunni Islamist blocks, the National Islamic Tribune Association and the Salafi Asala Association, won eight seats, with another three candidates in the runoff. Three candidates of the National Democratic Action Association, a Wefaq ally, are also in the runoff.

Leftist Candidate In Ecuador Is Ahead In Vote, Exit Polls Show (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Nov. 26 — Rafael Correa, an urbane economist who has rattled nerves in Washington with plans to limit American military activities in Ecuador and renegotiate the country's foreign debt, seemed headed to an easy victory on Sunday in the presidential election, according to several exit polls.

A win by Mr. Correa, 43, could bring Ecuador into a group of Latin American nations with leftist presidents, including Bolivia, Cuba and Nicaragua, which are allied with President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela. Mr. Correa has close ties to Mr. Chávez, whose government is prepared to offer Ecuador assistance to strengthen its national oil company.

"Chávez must be smiling in Caracas," said Vicente Albornoz, director of Cordes, an economic research group here. "But what I'm more worried about is Ecuador going through a period of conflict and instability."

The results of the runoff election were not certain on Sunday night, though preliminary figures pointed to a strong victory by Mr. Correa. Álvaro Noboa, the banana tycoon who was Mr. Correa's rival, would not accept the exit poll results, setting the stage for days of political tension. Official results were not expected until Tuesday or Wednesday, election officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0098110

Still, several exit polls by private companies and an early count by the nongovernmental observer group Participación Ciudadana pointed to a wide margin of victory for Mr. Correa, who promises a "citizen's revolution" by convening a constitutional assembly that would diminish the influence of Ecuador's fractious Congress and give greater power to the president.

Three exit polls announced on Ecuadorean television and radio gave Mr. Correa about 57 percent of the vote as opposed to 43 percent for Mr. Noboa. The wide commercial avenues of Quito, a stronghold for Mr. Correa, were filled with cars honking their horns as voters began celebrating on Sunday night.

Mr. Correa ran as an outsider, portraying Mr. Noboa, 56, a Bible-quoting scion of a Guayaquil family who is Ecuador's richest man, as someone who would use the presidency to advance his economic interests. The race was symbolized by insults, with Mr. Noboa describing Mr. Correa as a "devil" and a lackey of Venezuela and Cuba.

"Noboa is a vulgar man who uses God's name to expand his power," said Clemencia Pozo, 39, a street vendor here who said he voted for Mr. Correa.

Mr. Correa also spoke of his Roman Catholic faith during the campaign, but in relatively quiet contrast to Mr. Noboa, who sank to his knees at rallies in an attempt to connect with poor voters. Mr. Correa fiercely criticized President Bush, calling him "dimwitted" at one point, while supporting an end to an agreement that allows the American military to use a base on the Pacific coast for drug surveillance operations.

In an interview, Mr. Correa said he hoped to maintain cordial relations with the United States, where more than a million Ecuadorean immigrants live, largely in New York, New Jersey and Florida.

"We love the American people and its government, aside from the criticism we might have of that government," said Mr. Correa, pointing to the war in Iraq as an obstacle to stronger ties. Mr. Correa said he would welcome the opportunity to shake Mr. Bush's hand, describing him as the "representative of the American people."

"It's nothing personal against Bush," he said. "I just don't agree with his thinking."

Mr. Correa said he wanted to reconfigure Ecuador's economy with policies inspired by economists wary of overexposing developing countries to market forces, like Joseph E. Stiglitz of Columbia University. Mr. Correa, who got a doctorate in economics from the University of Illinois, added that he was no fan of Milton Friedman, the economist who died this month and whose influential work favored minimizing the role of government in the global economy.

Citing the example of Chile, where a state-controlled copper producer contributes much to the country's economic growth, Mr. Correa said he hoped to strengthen Ecuador's national oil company. He positioned a more nationalistic energy policy within a regional project to strengthen ties among South American nations, along the lines of what Mr. Chávez advocates in his "Bolivarian Revolution."

"The dream of Bolívar in the 21st century is more than a dream," Mr. Correa said. "It's a decision of survival."

In the first election round in mid-October, Mr. Correa appeared to have suffered because of his ties to Mr. Chávez. After Mr. Noboa won that vote, Mr. Correa shifted the emphasis of his campaign to focus on domestic issues like affordable housing and cash subsidies for the poor.

It remains to be seen how Mr. Correa will interact with Congress, which ousts presidents with ease in Ecuador. Analysts said much would depend on how quickly he moved to convene a constitutional assembly that would expand his powers. Unlike Mr. Noboa, who has allies in Congress, Mr. Correa has almost none.

Equally daunting, analysts say, is Ecuador's reliance on high oil prices to maintain economic stability. Government spending is climbing about 15 percent a year, compared with economic growth of about 4 percent a year, according to private economists here, following policies that Mr. Correa pushed for during a brief stint as finance minister.

Correa Set For Ecuador Election Win (FT)

By Hal Weitzman

Financial Times, November 27, 2006

A leftwing radical allied to Hugo Chávez, the anti-American Venezuelan leader, will be Ecuador's next president, according to exit polls from Sunday's election.

The surveys projected that Rafael Correa, a former finance minister, had won the contest with some 57 per cent of the vote, well ahead of Alvaro Noboa, the right-leaning banana magnate who was his rival.

The election is the second this month to be won by allies of Mr Chávez, coming weeks after Daniel Ortega was re-elected president of Nicaragua.

"This is a new moment for Ecuador," said Gustavo Larrea, Mr Correa's chief campaign spokesman and a likely cabinet minister. "We thank the Ecuadorean people and call for national unity to effect the changes that the country needs."

DOJ_NMG_0098111

Mr Correa did predictably well in highland areas, winning 75 per cent of the vote in Azuay, the southern province that includes Cuenca, the third-largest city in the country. He also appeared to be on course to win the banana-growing area of El Oro, with some 66 per cent of the vote.

Mr Noboa maintained that the real count would show he had won the election, citing one outlying poll, by Consultar, a local pollster, that showed him the victor.

If confirmed, the result is likely to hit the value of Ecuadoran debt: the country's benchmark bonds fell to a six-week low last week on concern that Mr Correa could win. The leftwinger has promised to restructure debt and increase government spending.

The result is also likely to signal a period of political strife: Mr Correa has promised to take on Congress with an assembly to rewrite the constitution.

It will also affect the Andean country's relationship with Washington. Mr Correa has vowed to close down the US military base at Manta, the only one in South America, and to shelve permanently talks on a bilateral trade deal with the US.

Correa Claims Ecuador Victory, Promises To Renegotiate Debt (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

After pulling ahead in the presidential campaign by focusing on centrist issues, Ecuador presidential candidate Rafael Correa said he would govern from the populist left if he were to win yesterday's election.

While official results had yet to be released last night, Mr. Correa, a 43-year-old economist, held a jubilant news conference claiming that exit polls showed he had won by a margin that gave him wide latitude to push a radical agenda. He vowed to renegotiate payments on the country's $16 billion of foreign debt and to scrap the constitution -- proposals that he barely mentioned during the final weeks of his campaign. He also reiterated his longtime opposition to a new free-trade pact with the U.S.

"This is a clear message that the people want change," Mr. Correa said. "This is a clear message to the traditional political class that there has to be change."

Three separate exit polls gave Mr. Correa a lead of at least 13 percentage points, including one poll partly paid for by his opponent, Alvaro Noboa, who hadn't conceded defeat last night. Official poll results weren't expected until later last night or early today.

Mr. Correa, who came in second in an initial round of voting after once holding a large lead, was hoping for a comeback. To do it, he tacked to the center to win support from working-class and poor voters who had been uneasy with his self-described "revolutionary" agenda, including closing a U.S. military base in the country. Instead, he focused on run-of-the-mill issues like increasing low-cost housing and raising the minimum wage.

Mr. Correa's move to the center reflected the waning momentum of Latin American populists since a victory in December by Bolivia's Evo Morales, who tried to nationalize the country's oil and gas industry. Populists lost in Mexico, Peru and Costa Rica. Although former communist rebel Daniel Ortega won in Nicaragua this month, he did so by stressing moderation and reconciliation.

It is too soon to tell how much of Mr. Correa's agenda would be feasible if his election victory is confirmed. Ecuadorians have often expelled presidents who don't govern as they campaign, and Mr. Correa faces strong opposition in Congress. The new president will be Ecuador's eighth in a decade.

But no proposal carries more risk than Mr. Correa's plan to renegotiate Ecuador's $16.1 billion of debt. Even talk of debt negotiations has sent the price of default insurance on Ecuador's bonds soaring to the same levels as Iraq's.

Whitney Kane Gomez, a Morgan Stanley Fixed Income analyst who covers Ecuador, expects the country's bonds to sell off today on the likelihood that Mr. Correa's victory will be upheld. "There is a strong probability that some external debt will not be paid," she said.

Although renegotiation would hardly be new for Ecuador, which has renegotiated its debts in each of the last two decades, it could backfire by reducing the nation's ability to obtain new international financing. Unlike Argentina, which renegotiated its debts after committing the biggest sovereign debt default in history in 2001, Ecuador isn't running out of money. Rather, Mr. Correa wants to renegotiate for what he considers moral reasons: He believes part of the $3 billion debt service should be spent on the poor.

Exit Polls Indicate Win For Ecuadoran Reformer (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098112

QUITO, Ecuador, Nov. 26 -- Unofficial exit polls and quick counts suggested that a young reformer promising to break free from the country's traditional power brokers defeated the nation's wealthiest man in Sunday's election to become Ecuador's eighth president in a decade.

The race between economist Rafael Correa, 43, and banana magnate Alvaro Noboa, 56, offered voters a choice between conflicting views of the nation's role in a globalized world. If Correa wins, Ecuador will join Venezuela and Bolivia as Andean countries led by presidents who are critical of U.S. influence in the region and advocate a greater state role in the economy.

Correa opposes U.S.-backed trade pacts that he says work against Ecuador's interests. He promises not to renew U.S. rights to a military base used for anti-drug operations. And he has threatened to not pay foreign debts he considers illegitimate and to instead use the money to increase social spending. Noboa had argued that an unrestrained free market was key to wooing foreign investment, and he pledged to cut ties with Venezuela's Hugo Ch?vez, whom Correa considers a friend.

Claiming victory before the official results, Correa called his win a defeat for a "political mafia" that he said had ruled the country for decades and implemented free-market, neo-liberal economic policies that the United States promoted in Latin America in the 1980s and '90s.

"This is a change to improve, to overcome 20 years of the long, sad, neo-liberal night that for so many years has defined us," Correa said during a televised news conference.

Correa, who received a doctorate at the University of Illinois, emerged as an attractive outsider for those voters who were seeking change after congressional conflicts and public unrest had ousted the last three elected presidents. He finished second behind Noboa in a first-round vote last month, but since has toned down his revolutionary rhetoric, reassuring some who feared that his more radical proposals -- including a pledge to convene a constituent assembly and dismantle the National Congress -- could result in more instability.

His surge in support after muting his rhetoric coincided with his emphasis on specific proposals to alleviate poverty, such as plans to increase welfare payments and construct more low-cost housing for Ecuador's poor, who make up the majority of its 13.4 million citizens. But after exit polls showed him with a comfortable lead, Correa reiterated his pledge to convene the assembly, which analysts say would require either congressional support or public approval.

"I believe the election result is a clear message that citizens want profound change and want a national constituent assembly," Correa said.

Some who cast ballots for the charismatic young economist Sunday said Correa's promises to ease unemployment and combat poverty earned their votes.

"He's young, but he's prepared for the job because he's knowledgeable about the economy and how to fix it," said Luis Chicaiza, 53, an industrial mechanic who has been unemployed for six months, shortly after voting for Correa at a Quito polling station Sunday. "Noboa was born rich, and he doesn't know anything about what it takes to fight against unemployment and poverty."

Noboa, who had been leading most polls until about a week ago, told a local television station Sunday evening that he was not prepared to accept defeat based on exit polls and quick counts. Few political observers put much stake in the exit polls, which had predicted that Correa would finish ahead of Noboa in the first round.

Noboa inherited one of the world's largest banana exporting companies and has since expanded his empire to include more than 110 businesses. He controls almost every aspect of a process that takes bananas from the leafy fields of his plantations to supermarkets in the United States and Europe.

Noboa stuck closely to an old-fashioned variety of populism by promising voters material benefits if they voted for him, and he handed out wheelchairs and other gifts to supporters at rallies. He regularly dropped to his knees and raised a Bible over his head during his speeches, invoking God while promising that his government would build 300,000 houses a year for the poor -- a promise many analysts dismissed as unrealistic.

Voting for Noboa at a polling station in Quito's city center on Sunday, Pedro Escudero said he thought that Correa's lack of congressional support made the banana magnate -- whose party holds 28 of 100 congressional seats -- a safer option. "Correa will almost certainly be in constant confrontation if he's elected," said Escudero, 47, a securities analyst.

An important player in the next government is expected to be Lucio Guti?rrez, who was ousted from the presidency last year after Congress accused him of meddling with the Supreme Court. Although he was banned from running for president this year, Guti?rrez's party won 24 seats in Congress last month, meaning that he could join forces with Noboa's party to form a majority bloc against Correa -- or provide important support for Correa.

In an interview in Quito last week, Guti?rrez said he decided not to endorse either candidate to preserve the opportunity to work closely with either one. He said that if Correa was elected, his party would serve as a watchdog if Correa attempts to go forward with his most controversial policies.

"We're ready to have a dialogue with Rafael Correa," Gutierrez said.

DOJ_NMG_0098113

Thousands In Turkey Denounce Papal Visit (AP)

By Brian Murphy

AP, November 27, 2006

Tens of thousands of protesters denounced Pope Benedict XVI as an enemy of Islam at a rally Sunday that underlined deep divisions straining Turkey ahead of the pontiff's visit this week.

Officials hoping to promote closer ties with the West urged calm, but Islamic groups wary of Western ways are united in anger over a speech Benedict gave two months ago in which he quoted a medieval text that linked Islam to violence.

Chants of "No to the pope!" rose among nearly 25,000 demonstrators at every mention of his remarks on violence and the Prophet Muhammad. Many protesters wore headbands with anti-pope slogans and waved placards that included a depiction of Benedict as the grim reaper.

The protest, organized by an Islamist political party, was the largest mass gathering so far against Benedict's four-day visit scheduled to begin Tuesday — his first papal journey to a mostly Muslim nation. The outcry also was designed to rattle Turkey's establishment.

Turkish officials hope to use the visit to promote their ambitions of becoming the first Muslim nation in the European Union and showcase Turkey's secular political system. But Islamic groups, which have been gaining strength, see Benedict as a symbol of Western intolerance and injustices against Muslims.

"The pope is not wanted here," said Kubra Yigitoglu, a 20-year-old protester wearing a head scarf, ankle-length coat and cowboy boots.

Nearby, a large banner was raised amid a sea of red flags of the Saadet, or Felicity, party. It called the Vatican "a source of terror."

Security forces are on full alert for the pope's visit. Nearly 4,000 police, including units in full riot guard, watched over the protest. Surveillance helicopters buzzed overhead and protesters were frisked before entering the square in a conservative stronghold of Istanbul.

The pope's visit has two distinct — and difficult — objectives: calming Muslim ire and advancing efforts to heal a nearly 1,000-year divide in Christianity between the Vatican and Orthodox churches.

Benedict plans to meet first with political and Muslim religious leaders in the capital, Ankara, including Turkey's president and the Islamic cleric who oversees the country's religious affairs. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is scheduled to attend a NATO meeting in Latvia during the papal visit, but could briefly greet the pontiff at the airport.

The pope then heads to Istanbul — the ancient Byzantine capital of Constantinople — to be hosted by the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I.

The pope strongly backs efforts for closer bonds between the two ancient branches of Christianity, which formally split in the 11th century over disputes including papal primacy. But some Orthodox leaders, including Russia's powerful Patriarch Alexy II, are wary of deepening ties too fast.

While in Istanbul, Benedict also plans to visit the famous 17th century Blue Mosque. The Vatican spokesman, the Rev. Federico Lombardi, called it a "sign of respect" toward Muslims.

The mosque is one of the city's major tourist sites and its slender minarets are a prominent landmark in Istanbul's ancient center. Tradition says it was built to show Islamic architects could rival the glories of the nearby Haghia Sophia, a church that was converted to a mosque after the city fell to Muslim armies in 1453. It is now a museum.

Benedict may also use his time in Turkey as a forum to demand that Islamic nations offer greater rights and protection to Christian minorities, such as the remnants of the once-thriving Greek Orthodox community in Istanbul.

Turkey's foreign minister, Abdullah Gul, said Benedict's visit could help "remove some misunderstandings" between Christians and Muslims.

"The messages the pope gives here will, of course, be very important," Gul said at a news conference.

But the protesters sent a loud signal that the pope is not welcome until he offers a full apology for his remarks in September, in which he quoted a medieval Christian emperor characterizing some of Muhammad's teachings as "evil and inhuman."

The Vatican has expressed regret for offending Muslims and sorrow for the violent backlash that included attacks on churches in the Holy Land. The intent of the remarks, the Vatican said, was to draw attention to the incompatibility of faith and violence.

"The pope was disrespectful to us and he needs to apologize," said one banner at the demonstration.

DOJ_NMG_0098114

Seafetin Tuleg, 70, wrapped himself in the flag of rally organizers and said Muslims revere the Jewish and Christian prophets, but do not receive the same respect for their own. "We love Moses, Jesus and Muhammad, but the pope doesn't love Muhammad and Islam," he said.

Officially, Turkey is a rigidly secular republic, though around 99 percent of its population is Muslim.

In 2004 — before becoming pope — the then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger cast doubt on whether Turkey has a place among EU nations. "Turkey has always represented a different continent, in permanent contrast to Europe," he was quoted by the French magazine Le Figaro as saying.

The Vatican spokesman, Lombardi, played down those comments Sunday in an interview with Turkey's state-run Anatolia news agency, saying the Vatican was not against Turkey joining the EU if it fulfilled membership criteria.

Also at the Vatican, Benedict expressed his "feelings of esteem and of sincere friendship" for Turks and their leaders.

Turks Protest Pope's Coming Visit (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 26 -- Thousands of chanting, flag-waving protesters on Sunday denounced Pope Benedict XVI as anti-Islamic, demanding that he cancel a trip to Turkey this week that the Vatican hopes will help mend relations between the pontiff and Muslims.

An estimated 25,000 protesters jammed a large square in Istanbul in one of the largest public demonstrations against the visit so far in this predominantly Muslim country, where secular voices are battling growing Islamic forces at a critical moment in Turkey's relations with the West.

The pope's visit has infuriated many Muslims because of remarks he made 2 1/2 months ago in which he quoted a medieval Christian emperor equating some of the prophet Muhammad's teachings with violence and evil. The pope has not apologized for making the remarks but has said he regretted the pain they may have caused Muslims.

Protesters waved signs declaring "Go home, pope" and shouted, "No to the pope!" as about 4,000 police, many in riot gear, ringed the square and helicopters monitored the crowd from overhead.

"We don't want the pope here," said Mustafa Demir, 50, as he gripped the hands of his two elementary-school-age daughters. "He insulted our prophet."

Although many Turks oppose the papal visit, some government authorities and business leaders see it as a chance to promote Turkey's efforts to join the European Union and to highlight the country's secular political system.

Turkish officials attempted to play down the protest. Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said at a news conference that the pope's visit could help "remove some misunderstandings" between Christians and Muslims and that his messages would "be very important."

During his regular Sunday address at the Vatican, Benedict told the crowd beneath his window, "Starting right now, I want to send a cordial greeting to the dear Turkish people, rich in history and culture."

He added, "To these people and their representatives, I express feelings of esteem and sincere friendship."

The Vatican also confirmed Sunday that the pope will visit Istanbul's famous Blue Mosque, the Sultanahmet, in his first visit to a mosque as pope.

Turkish authorities said security will be extremely tight during the papal trip, which begins in the capital, Ankara, includes a visit to the shrine near Ephesus, where many Catholics believe the Virgin Mary lived her final days, and ends in Istanbul.

Although Vatican-Muslim relations have dominated the headlines about it, the trip was originally scheduled to help repair a centuries-old divide between the Vatican and Orthodox Christian churches. The pope will have two meetings with the Orthodox Patriarch Bartholomew I, who is based in Istanbul and has waged his own religious battles with the Turkish government.

Many of the protesters at the rally Sunday in Istanbul were just as distressed by the pope's planned meeting with the Orthodox patriarch as they were by what they see as his attitude toward Muslims.

"We are here to prevent the visit of the pope," said Gulnihal Yildirim, 38, who wore a head scarf and was accompanied by her two daughters, ages 6 and 11, each sporting green headbands reading, "The pope should not come."

"He will be the guest of the state for one day and of the patriarch for three days," added Yildirim, who said she opposed the pope's efforts to enhance the status of the patriarch in this Muslim country.

Rebels Leave As Chad Retakes City (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098115

PARIS, Nov. 26 — Rebels who overran the largest city in eastern Chad on Saturday disappeared almost as quickly as they had arrived, melting away Sunday as government soldiers re-established control of the looted city center.

But even as the government forces retook the city, Abéché, apparently without bloodshed, a rebel column headed toward the capital, Ndjamena, Western diplomats there said on the condition of anonymity.

The French Embassy in Ndjamena said a column of rebel troops was headed toward Ndjamena, but it was impossible to say if it had left Abéché or was another group of rebels.

Later in the day, news agencies gave conflicting reports about the location of the rebel column. [A news service] reported that France had said the column was no longer advancing but was in Batha Province, which would put the rebels 150 to 375 miles from the capital. It also said Chad's government had denied reports of rebels moving on Ndjamena. But The Associated Press reported that Chadian soldiers had been massing along a strategic road as a rebel convoy had been spotted advancing toward the city.

For more than a year, several rebel groups have been seeking to overthrow Idriss Déby, who has been president of Chad since he seized power in a coup in 1990. Chad, one of the poorest and least stable countries in Africa, has been further destabilized by the chaos in Darfur, the region of western Sudan just across the border.

At least 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have been pushed from their homes in Darfur in a battle over land, ethnicity and self-determination that the Bush administration has called genocide.

The government of Chad accuses Sudan of supporting the rebel groups menacing Mr. Déby's rule, and Sudan contends that Chad has helped non-Arab rebel groups in Darfur that are fighting the Arab-dominated government and its allied Arab tribal militias.

Mr. Déby was re-elected president this spring after he forced through an amendment to the Constitution to allow him to run for a third term. Most opposition parties boycotted the election.

As China Reins In Piracy, Some Seek Faster Results (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

BEIJING -- China is beginning to make some progress on containing the epidemic of piracy and counterfeiting that foreign businesses have long complained robs them of sales in a crucial market. But some of its trading partners, seeking faster action, are calling for a harsher approach.

Foreign-company executives, surveys and government officials all note improvements. The biggest change has been at the top: Senior leaders including Premier Wen Jiabao now declare that improving the protection of intellectual property is a "strategic policy" for the nation. That is because they want Chinese companies to climb out of low-end manufacturing and develop their own technologies and brands -- which will need protecting. Software producers like Microsoft Corp. have seen some of the clearest early benefits.

Enforcing such a shift on the ground isn't happening as quickly, however, and the scale of the problem is still enormous. Hollywood studios and makers of luxury goods continue to fret about the widespread availability of illegal knockoffs of their wares on Chinese streets.

The mixed results have caused a split in the trade community on how to proceed, with some U.S. and European officials increasingly arguing a more combative approach is needed to ensure further action.

The piracy issue is likely to be on the table next month when Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke visit Beijing for the first round of a new U.S.-China dialogue intended to address outstanding economic tensions. The talks are also expected to address U.S. calls for China to open its markets further to American financial-services companies, as well as U.S. demands that Beijing allow the yuan to rise against the dollar.

Still, some companies are saying the direction of change is now clear enough to allow them to invest for the future in the confidence that improvements will continue. Pharmaceutical giants AstraZeneca PLC and Novartis AG this year each committed to spending $100 million on research and development in China. Drug companies depend on selling patented products, and both companies cited China's strengthening protection of such rights in support of their decision to invest.

"The positive momentum leads us to believe that things can only get better," said Keith Feldman, general manager of the international home-entertainment unit of News Corp.'s Twentieth Century Fox studio. He said the improving enforcement of intellectual-property rights is one reason Fox decided to try to start selling DVDs in China, even though it must still compete with illegal copies that can sell for less than a dollar.

"There's no question they have made progress," Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez said in an interview this month during a visit to Beijing.

DOJ_NMG_0098116

Surveys this year by the American Chamber of Commerce in China and the U.S.-China Business Council found that roughly a third of each of their members reported an improvement in enforcement of trademarks, patents and copyrights.

Many of the changes started to happen after the government put together a high-level task force on the issue in early 2005. Headed by Vice Premier Wu Yi, the group in March produced an "action plan" committing the government to several changes in legislation and practice.

One shift brought about by the plan has been a requirement that all new computers sold in China come with legitimate operating-system software already installed. Previously, most computers in China were sold as empty boxes, and retailers often added illicit copies of software like Microsoft's Windows and Office. Microsoft executives say they have seen a significant pickup in sales since the new rule went through early this year.

China hasn't been able to make much progress in controlling the many thousands of producers of illicit goods located across the country, ranging from DVD factories hidden in chicken farms to car-parts plants that produce knockoffs on the night shift.

Laws on the books prohibiting such activity are poorly enforced. Moreover, financial penalties aren't heavy, and few piracy or counterfeiting cases are criminally prosecuted, allowing many violators to stay in business after repeated crackdowns. That is why the top priority for foreign businesses has become tougher law enforcement and more criminal sanctions.

U.S. and European officials are also feeling increased political pressure to do something about what critics call China's unfair trade practices. That is creating division among businesspeople and government officials on the best way to tackle one of the most significant trade issues they confront.

Some want to continue an approach they credit for much of the recent progress: stressing to Chinese policy makers how piracy endangers China's own prosperity, rather than how much it hits the bottom lines of multinational companies. The more hawkish, however, feel negotiations have produced too much talk and not enough action and increasingly want to use international trade law to force more changes.

"There is no division on the goals: tougher enforcement, revision of the criminal code and more criminal sanctions. But there is some division on tactics, on how we reach those goals," said Myron Brilliant, vice president for Asia at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

A congressional commission in October called on the Bush administration to take a case against China's intellectual-property practices at the World Trade Organization -- an action considered the weapon of last resort in international trade disputes.

U.S. trade officials say they have been preparing for a case but for the moment want to continue with negotiations.

The European Union in October also publicly threatened China with a WTO case if it doesn't crack down further on piracy and counterfeiting. But EU trade officials say privately that they aren't prepared to support a WTO action, as they believe the current course of negotiations is producing results and shouldn't be abandoned.

That position could leave the U.S. isolated if it does eventually pursue a case, as many observers expect. A WTO case -- in essence, a highly public and official statement that China is violating treaties it signed -- could also cost the plaintiff a lot of goodwill in Beijing.

Chinese Minister of Commerce Bo Xilai said this month that a WTO case by the U.S. would have a "very negative impact" on its relationship with China. China will make further improvements, he said, but the process will take time. Chinese officials have told visiting negotiators that a WTO dispute would weaken those within their government who are pushing for more action to protect on intellectual property.

Britain's Relations With Putin Poisoned (WT/AP)

By Jill Lawless

The Washington Times, November 27, 2006

LONDON -- A British Cabinet minister yesterday accused Russian President Vladimir Putin of "attacks on individual liberty and on democracy" as relations between Britain and Russia grew increasingly strained in the wake of the fatal poisoning of a former KGB agent who became a British citizen.

Peter Hain, the government's Northern Ireland secretary, said Mr. Putin's tenure has been clouded by incidents "including an extremely murky murder of the senior Russian journalist" Anna Politkovskaya.

His are the strongest comments leveled at Moscow since Alexander Litvinenko, the one-time KGB agent who has lived in London with his family for several years, died Thursday from poisoning by the radioactive element polonium 210. He had been investigating the death of Mrs. Politkovskaya. In a dramatic statement dictated from his hospital bed and read outside the hospital shortly after his death, he accused the "barbaric and ruthless" Mr. Putin of ordering his poisoning.

DOJ_NMG_0098117

Mr. Hain was similarly harsh in his assessment of the Russian president. "His success in binding what is a disintegrating nation together with an economy that was collapsing into Mafioso-style chaos, his success in that must be balanced against the fact there have been huge attacks on individual liberty and on democracy," he told a BBC interviewer. "And it's important that he retakes the democratic road in my view."

British officials have so far avoided blaming Moscow for Mr. Litvinenko's death, and Mr. Hain did not comment directly on the case.

[London's Guardian newspaper reported last night that a senior source at the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, said that "he had no doubt that the killing of Litvinenko was an organized 'operation' which bore all the hallmarks of a foreign intelligence agency. The expert in radioactive materials said the ability to obtain polonium 210 and the knowledge needed to use it to kill Litvinenko meant that the attack could not have been carried out by a 'lone assassin.' "]

Opposition Conservative Party leaders demanded yesterday that the government explain what it knows about the poisoning and, in particular, how the deadly nuclear material used to poison the 43-year-old Mr. Litvinenko, perhaps sprayed or sprinkled on his food in a London sushi restaurant, got into Britain.

Mr. Litvinenko told police he thought he was poisoned Nov. 1 while investigating the October slaying of Mrs. Politkovskaya by a person or persons unknown. Mr. Litvinenko was moved to intensive care last week after his hair fell out, his throat became swollen, and his immune and nervous systems suffered severe damage.

London Metropolitan Police say they are investigating a "suspicious death," carefully not calling it murder. They have not even ruled out the possibility, however unlikely, that Mr. Litvinenko poisoned himself. His death was described as "agonizing."

Mr. Litvinenko's friends and allies in London's Russian emigre community blame Mr. Putin, who has denied his government's involvement. After first denying that it was "a violent death," Mr. Putin has called Mr. Litvinenko's death a "tragedy".

Russian officials could not be reached for comment yesterday on Mr. Hain's remarks. Home Secretary John Reid, Britain's top law-and-order official, has declined to speculate about who might have killed Mr. Litvinenko. "I don't think it's for me as a politician to be making judgments that a policeman should make," he told Scotland's Radio Clyde.

The Conservatives demanded the government make a statement in the House of Commons today outlining what it knows about the death and how polonium 210 -- a rare radioactive element usually produced in a nuclear reactor or particle accelerator -- got into Britain.

Mr. Litvinenko's contaminated body was released to a coroner late Saturday, and government pathologists await recommendations on whether it is safe for them to perform an autopsy.

Mystery Could Strain Anglo-Russian Relations (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, November 27, 2006

LONDON — Britain's biggest spy thriller isn't the new James Bond film but the mystery surrounding the poisoning death of ex-Soviet KGB officer Alexander Litvinenko.

Litvinenko, 43, a Kremlin critic, died Thursday night of heart failure from what doctors said was poisoning from polonium-210 — a radioactive element usually produced in a nuclear reactor or particle accelerator.

In a statement dictated two days before he died, Litvinenko accused Russian President Vladimir Putin of orchestrating his poisoning. The statement was read posthumously Friday by his family. The government's Health Protection Agency called the poisoning unprecedented.

On Sunday, New Scotland Yard, the headquarters of police for greater London, said it had nothing new to say about the case. British Home Secretary John Reid said the death had been ruled suspicious and police would “follow the evidence.” He rejected the opposition Conservative Party's call for a House of Commons statement condemning the death.

The Kremlin denies any involvement. Putin called Litvinenko's death a tragedy and offered his government's help investigating the case. He also said the case should not spoil Anglo-Russian relations.

There were signs that the case could do that. British Cabinet member Peter Hain, the secretary for Northern Ireland, said relations with Russia were “tricky” and urged Putin to recommit himself to democracy.

In an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.'s Sunday AM, Hain said that in Putin's Russia, “there have been huge attacks on individual liberty and on democracy.” He added, “It's important (Putin) retakes the democratic road.”

David Davis, a Conservative spokesman on law-and-order issues, said the government needs to take steps so “other dissidents living in Britain are reassured about their safety.”

In a BBC television interview, Reid urged politicians to leave the case to police “to make their judgments.”

DOJ_NMG_0098118

There were other signs the government was taking the case seriously. The emergency planning committee, known as COBRA, met Saturday for the second time in 24 hours to discuss the situation. COBRA, which includes ranking ministers, police and intelligence officials, has met on high-level emergencies such as the London transit bombings in July 2005.

Litvinenko had told friends and family he was poisoned because he was investigating the killing in Moscow last month of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, a vocal Kremlin critic.

Litvinenko was a specialist in counterterrorism and organized crime for the Soviet-era KGB and its successor agency, the Federal Security Service (FSB).

In the 1990s, he alleged that the FSB was involved in executing businessmen and other public officials opposed by the government. After a nine-month stint in prison in 1999 for abuse of office, he moved to Britain. He was granted asylum in 2000 and became a British citizen.

Litvinenko became ill after meetings with two Russian men at the Millennium Hotel near the U.S. Embassy and with Mario Scaramella, an Italian security expert and academic, at a sushi restaurant in Piccadilly. Scaramella told reporters that he showed Litvinenko a list of dissidents targeted by Russia's security services. He said Litvinenko's name was on the list.

Hospitalized Nov. 1, Litvinenko was moved to an intensive care unit at London's University College Hospital after he lost weight and his hair fell out. Once they determined the cause of his illness, police followed Litvinenko's movements on the day he became ill. On Saturday, they found traces of radiation at his north London house, at the Millennium hotel bar and at the sushi restaurant.

The Health Protection Agency encouraged anyone who had a concern about exposure to be tested. Polonium-210 is toxic if it is inhaled, swallowed or injected into a wound. About 300 people contacted the agency.

Reid said the radioactive substance did not pose a big risk. “I have no indication that there is a widespread threat here,” he told Sky television.

The sushi restaurant was boarded up Sunday while it underwent decontamination.

Among the passersby stopping to check out the scene of possible spy intrigue: Jim and Sarah Rankin of Oxford. “It harkens back to the Cold War, and cloak and dagger and espionage,” Jim Rankin, 38, said of Litvinenko's mysterious death. “There is an air of 007 about it.”

In the new James Bond film, Casino Royale, Bond escapes death by poisoning.

Litvinenko, the real-life spy, was not as lucky. In his deathbed statement, he wrote, “You may succeed in silencing one man, but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life.”

British Police Retrace Steps Of Poison Victim (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 26 — The British police on Sunday sought to retrace the movements of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a former Russian secret agent, before he fell ill from the radiation poisoning that killed him last week.

But the police insisted, as they have for several days, that Mr. Litvinenko’s macabre death on Thursday remained in the “suspicious” category and that they were not at this time treating the case as a murder inquiry.

It remained unclear how polonium 210, the radioactive substance that killed Mr. Litvinenko, 43, entered his body. Although he and his associates accused Russia of poisoning him, the British authorities apparently do not want to turn the episode into a diplomatic incident and have pointedly refrained from leveling accusations about who may be behind the killing.

“I don’t think it’s for me as a politician to be making judgments that a policeman should make,” John Reid, the home secretary and Britain’s most senior law enforcement official, said in a radio interview. “I think it’s known that the particular nature of these circumstances don’t appear to have happened before. That’s why we’re doing everything we can on the health side as well as the police side to get as much information to people as we can.”

Peter Hain, the British Northern Ireland secretary and a former human rights campaigner, did not comment directly on Mr. Litvinenko’s death, but he said Sunday that President Vladimir V. Putin’s rule had been clouded by incidents like the killing of Anna Politkovskaya, an investigative journalist fatally shot in Moscow last month. Mr. Litvinenko had been making inquiries about her death when he became ill.

Referring to Mr. Putin, Mr. Hain said, “His success in binding a disintegrating nation together must be balanced against the fact that there have been huge attacks on individual liberty and on democracy, and it’s important that he retakes the democratic view.”

Britain’s relationship with Russia is built in part on concerns here that the British economy will be increasingly reliant on Russian energy. The remarks by Mr. Hain were by far the most critical of the Kremlin by a high-ranking British official since Mr. Litvinenko died.

DOJ_NMG_0098119

Mr. Putin has denied that Mr. Litvinenko was the victim of an officially approved assassination by Russian agents.

Mr. Litvinenko's family and friends have said that he began to feel ill on Nov. 1 after visiting a sushi bar in central London.

He also spent time that day at a five-star hotel in the Mayfair district, close to the American Embassy in Grosvenor Square. The police said Friday that radioactive traces had been found at each location. On Sunday, they said they had completed an investigation at the sushi bar but were still examining Mr. Litvinenko's north London home and part of the hotel in Grosvenor Square.

Police officials declined to comment on British news media reports that officers planned to go to Moscow and Rome to interview two Russians and an Italian who met with Mr. Litvinenko on or after Nov. 1. But, the police said, officers were scrutinizing closed-circuit television images from security cameras of the places Mr. Litvinenko visited before he fell ill.

The British government has said it is unlikely that other people would have been poisoned from contact with Mr. Litvinenko or from the radiation traces found in those places. "In terms of the type of material used, this case is pretty unique," Mr. Reid said. "I have no indication that there is a widespread threat."

However, the Health Protection Agency said Sunday that 300 people had responded to an appeal for those who visited the same places Mr. Litvinenko did on Nov. 1 to come forward for urinalysis — the kind of test that first indicated the cause of his illness.

Russian officials have repeatedly said that Mr. Litvinenko's death was part of a choreographed effort to discredit Mr. Putin.

Despite Russian denials, the British news media continued to point the finger at Russia. The Sunday Times of London said Mr. Litvinenko had said in an interview as he lay dying that Russia had sent an agent using diplomatic cover to keep track of his movements. The police declined to say whether officers would question the man, identified by The Sunday Times as Viktor Kirov.

The newspaper News of the World reported that a 46-year-old trained assassin whose middle name was Igor had been linked to the poisoning.

The Russian Roulette (TIME)

By Peter Gumbel

Time, November 27, 2006

The former spy lay dying in a LondonÂ hospital--of what he didn't know. (It wasn't until after his death that Scotland Yard realized that the rare compound killing Alexander Litvinenko, 43, had left traces of radioactivity nearly everywhere he had been on Nov. 1.) But Litvinenko wanted the world to know who killed him, not how it was done or where. In a statement released after he died last week, the fierce critic of Russia's government directly addressed the man he said was responsible for his death: "You may succeed in silencing one man, but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life."

Whoever did kill Litvinenko wasn't an amateur. British authorities announced last Friday that he had ingested a radioactive toxin, polonium 210, and that police had found traces of it in three locations: a sushi bar where Litvinenko had eaten lunch, a hotel he had visited on the same day and his home. Polonium 210 is so rare and volatile that the assassin would have needed access to a high-security nuclear laboratory to obtain it. Moscow denies that it had anything to do with the death. At a meeting with European officials in Helsinki, Vladimir Putin called the death a tragedy but also questioned the authenticity of Litvinenko's deathbed accusation and stated bluntly, "There is no issue to discuss."

Whether or not anyone in the Kremlin had targeted Litvinenko, his death, coming just weeks after the murder of investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya in her Moscow apartment block, has sent a subzero chill over Russia's already frosty civil society. Human-rights campaigners and other Putin critics see the killing as the latest blow to democracy and free speech, part of a steady erosion of civil liberties. Russian democracy was chaotically vibrant just a decade ago, after the collapse of communism in 1991. But these days it is looking fragile. New legislation annuls independent candidates for the Duma (parliament's lower house), and no political party can exist without the Kremlin's approval. Regional governors and members of the upper house of parliament are no longer elected but appointed. Most key national media are in the hands of state or state-controlled corporations, and Russian activists live in fear of the consequences when they openly criticize Putin. "There may no longer be shortages of groceries and long lines at every street corner," says Ludmilla Alexeyeva, the doyen of human-rights activists in Moscow, "but Russia today is still a place where human rights and freedom are in short supply."

Litvinenko, for one, was unafraid to speak out. A former lieutenant colonel in the Russian federal security service (FSB), the successor agency to the KGB, Litvinenko gained notoriety in the 1990s for claiming to have refused a Kremlin order to assassinate the Russian oligarch Boris Berezovsky. He had long accused Putin of backtracking on democracy and, in a 2001 book he co-wrote, went so far as to allege that Russian security services organized apartment-block bombings in 1999 that stoked support for a resurgence of the war in Chechnya. He had most recently made public statements tying the Kremlin to the murder of Politkovskaya. Litvinenko was reportedly meeting contacts in London in the hope of gaining information on the case when he was poisoned. "The bastards got me, but they won't get everybody," he told his friend Andrei Nekrasov shortly before his death.

DOJ_NMG_0098120

The Litvinenko case revived memories of perhaps the most notorious assassination carried out during the cold war, the 1978 murder in London of Georgi Markov, a Bulgarian dissident who was working for the BBC. He was killed with a ricin-tipped umbrella while waiting for a bus, in a case that has never been solved. Just like the Markov murder, the death of Litvinenko has already given rise to a flurry of conspiracy theories, including speculation among defenders of the government that the poisoning was arranged by Russian Ã©migrÃ©s or Western intelligence agencies to discredit Moscow. But for many Russian Ã©lites, the whole macabre spectacle has heightened anxieties about the Putin government's backsliding into communist-era intrigue and repression. "People who question the policies of our government are increasingly targeted. People who work for human rights are increasingly under attack," says Alexeyeva. "And even people who support this work are potentially in danger of being singled out by the government. So are we in Russia? Are we back in the U.S.S.R.?" It's becoming harder to tell the difference. With reporting by Reported by Yuri Zarakhovich/Moscow

Investigations: Putin, Russia And An Ex-Spy's Mysterious Death (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Dec. 4, 2006 issue - Until a few days ago, U.S. and British government investigators had never heard of anyone being poisoned by the obscure and unstable isotope polonium-210. Now its extreme rarity is adding to the riddles in the death of exiled former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko, an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Just before falling ill, the dissident received a document that seemed to warn of threats from an alleged secret fraternity of former KGB men calling themselves "Dignity and Honor," says Lord Tim Bell, a former Margaret Thatcher adviser close to Litvinenko's circle.

Who silenced Litvinenko? His family and supporters insist Russian agents did it. Investigators in London think such a lethal dose must have been industrially produced—a job that usually takes not only bismuth metal for raw material but a nuclear reactor to bombard it with neutrons. "It's not something you can go into a drugstore and get off a shelf," says a nuclear-agency official, asking to be nameless because of the sensitive topic. "To get this amount of highly concentrated radioactivity would take a very sophisticated operation, access to nuclear materials and support systems," Litvinenko's friend and fellow Russian exile Alex Goldfarb told NEWSWEEK. Last week he released a statement he says was dictated by Litvinenko as he died, blaming Putin for the poisoning: "The howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life."

Putin denied that he or his government had anything to do with Litvinenko's death. British officials say Moscow has made a serious effort recently to improve ties with London, and Litvinenko was not a big enough threat or nuisance for Putin to jeopardize so much hard work. Still, exotic poisons have been a favorite weapon of Moscow's spy services and their allies ever since Soviet times. The Brits are especially unlikely to forget the Bulgarian dissident who was murdered with a ricin-tipped umbrella on a London street in 1978.

The Soviet collapse did not end the sneak tactics. In 2002 a Saudi-born rebel leader in Chechnya known as Khattab reportedly died after being given a poison-soaked letter. A massive dose of dioxin disfigured and nearly killed the then Ukrainian presidential candidate Viktor Yushchenko in 2004. That same year, the Russian investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya nearly died after drinking a cup of tea she later said had been poisoned. This October she was found shot dead in Moscow. Litvinenko publicly blamed Putin for her death—and fell ill less than two weeks later. Earlier this year, the Russian Parliament explicitly authorized the use of force against enemies living abroad. It's hard to think why Russian agents would use such a distinctive poison. But if they didn't, who did?

Who Killed Litvinenko? (WSJ)

By David Satter

The Wall Street Journal, November 27, 2006

MOSCOW -- Until a week ago, Alexander Litvinenko, a former colonel in the Russian Federal Security Service, the FSB, was virtually unknown outside the murky world of Russian intelligence. With his death in London from a massive dose of the radioactive element polonium 210, however, his fate may lead to a fundamentally different relationship between Russia and the West.

Beginning with the Yeltsin era, two U.S. administrations have muted their criticism of Russia. This was the case even in the face of a series of political murders in Russia. But if Litvinenko, a British subject, was murdered by Russian intelligence on British soil, self-censorship is no longer an option. Unless we want to give the Putin regime carte blanche to dispose of its enemies on our soil, we now have no choice but to react.

DOJ_NMG_0098121

Russian television has given an explanation for the murder of Litvinenko as surrealistic as any offered by the Soviets during the Cold War. It attributed his death to intrigues in the entourage of the exiled Russian oligarch, Boris Berezovsky. An announcer on the evening news said Litvinenko was "a pawn in a game whose significance he did not understand."

Mr. Berezovsky, however, had no reason to kill Litvinenko, whose views he shared and whom he had helped since his arrival in the U.K. in 2000. In November 1998, Litvinenko revealed a plot to kill Mr. Berezovsky who, at the time, was the deputy head of the Russian security council. The evidence points instead to Litvinenko having been murdered by the FSB, which, together with the other "force ministries," has become the dominant political force in Russia today.

The FSB has always had a strong interest in Vladimir Putin's critics abroad. In December 2001, a Russian police official, in announcing a warrant for Mr. Berezovsky's arrest, said, "We know what he eats for breakfast, where he has lunch and where he buys his groceries." This was followed up in September 2003 with an unsuccessful attempt to kill Mr. Berezovsky with a needle camouflaged as a pen. The British reacted by granting Mr. Berezovsky political asylum. In 2004, a stranger threw a Molotov cocktail at Litvinenko and Akhmed Zakaev, the London representative of the separatist government of Chechnya, as they stood on the street near Litvinenko's residence. Besides a history of tracking Mr. Putin's opponents, the FSB could have been encouraged to kill Litvinenko because in June the Russian State Duma passed a law allowing the president to authorize attacks by the FSB on "terrorists" in foreign countries. In fact, the Russian intelligence services do not need a law to attack persons they regard as terrorists abroad. On Feb. 13, 2004, the former Chechen president, Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev, was killed and his 12-year-old son seriously injured when a bomb attached by Russian agents ripped apart their SUV. The new law, however, gives a seal of legitimacy to such operations and guarantees that those who carried them out will not be disowned or forgotten in the event of failure (or possibly even prosecuted in a post-Putin democratic dispensation).

In the last six years, the makeup of the ruling elite in Russia has undergone a dramatic change. Once in power, Mr. Putin filled the majority of important posts with veterans of the security services, many with ties to him dating back to his work in St. Petersburg. By 2003, the top ministers, half of the members of the Russian security council and 70% of all senior regional officials in Russia were former members of the security services. At the same time, many of these persons gained access to great wealth. Russia was already highly corrupt under Boris Yeltsin but, according to IDEM, an independent Russian think tank, with the rise in oil prices the level of corruption in Russia between 2002 and 2005 increased 900%.

The result of these developments was that Mr. Putin created an FSB ruling class. As this class became rooted, the victims of contract killers in Russia began to include some of the most prominent political figures in the country.

The most sensitive question in Russia is the provenance of the 1999 apartment bombings in Moscow, Volgodonsk and Buinaksk in which 300 persons died. As a result of the bombings, the second Chechen war was launched and, in his role as wartime leader, Mr. Putin, then the prime minister, achieved enough popularity to be elected president. There is widespread belief that the real authors of the bombings were the FSB. Two of the political figures murdered in Russia in recent years were trying to investigate the bombings.

The first victim was Sergei Yushenkov, a co-chairman of the Liberal Russia Party and member of the commission on the apartment bombings. He was shot on April 17, 2003. Mikhail Kodanev, the other leader of the Liberal Russia Party, was tried and sentenced to 20 years in prison for organizing the murder. Two years later, however, Igor Korolkov, a reporter for Moscow News, learned that a video camera near the building where Yushenkov was shot captured two persons running from the building immediately after the killing. The police collected the tape but it was never included in the case filed against Kodanev.

In July 2003, Duma deputy Yuri Shchekochikhin, another member of the commission on the 1999 bombings, died after contracting an unexplained illness. Shchekochikhin, who was also a reporter for Novaya Gazeta, had been investigating the "Three Whales" furniture stores that reportedly evaded millions of dollars in import duties. A co-founder of the stores was the father of Yuri Zaostrovtsev, then a deputy director of the FSB. Shchekochikhin's illness progressed catastrophically from peeling skin to "edemas of the respiratory system and brain" and death. When Novaya Gazeta tried to investigate whether he had been poisoned, they were told that all information was a "medical secret" that could not be disclosed even to family members.

Finally, Anna Politkovskaya, perhaps Russia's best-known journalist, was murdered last month. She traveled to Chechnya regularly despite the risk and was sought out by people from all over the North Caucasus in the hope that she would tell the world about their situation. It used to be said in Russia that no one is killed for politics. Politkovskaya, however, was clearly the victim of a political killing because she wrote only about politics.

Litvinenko resembles the others in this list in all respects except one. He lived in England. His book, "Blowing Up Russia," accused the FSB of the 1999 apartment bombings. He received visitors from Russia, was able to comment knowledgably on the actions of the FSB in Moscow, and refused to be intimidated. * * *

In the wake of Litvinenko's death, the West must insist on cooperation from the FSB in finding his killers. If that is not forthcoming, it should be assumed that the murder of Litvinenko was ordered by the Russian regime.

DOJ_NMG_0098122

Under those circumstances, not only should Russia be expelled from the G-8 but the whole structure of mutual consultation and cooperation would need to be re-evaluated. This is not just a matter of refusing to trivialize a murder. It is also a vital political obligation. Russians of all types are watching to see whether the West will simply swallow this crime or finally react to the rampant criminalization of Russian society. There are forces in Russia that want the country to be part of the West. But to back them, we need to demonstrate that we have moral values that we defend. To do less would be to abandon Russia to the forces of nihilism and obscurantism.

Mr. Satter is affiliated with the Hoover Institution, the Hudson Institute and Johns Hopkins. His most recent book is "Darkness at Dawn: The Rise of the Russian Criminal State" (Yale, 2003).

A Poisoned Spy (NYT)

The New York Times, November 27, 2006

Despite the utter lack of evidence about who poisoned Alexander Litvinenko, the former Russian spy who died last week in a London hospital, it was hardly surprising that suspicion fell immediately on the Russian government and President Vladimir Putin. Mr. Litvinenko was a defector with many enemies in Russia, official and otherwise, and Mr. Putin's record on justice and human rights has left many people prepared to believe the worst.

It did not help that the Kremlin quickly went on the defensive. Government spokesmen declared that any suggestion of Kremlin complicity was "sheer nonsense" and that the Soviet and Russian intelligence services hadn't assassinated anyone since 1959. Talk about sheer nonsense.

How much better it would have been had Mr. Putin's people said something like, "Let us help find out who did this outrageous thing!" That's also what Mr. Putin might have said when Anna Politkovskaya, an investigative reporter, was murdered or when all the other reformers were killed.

Words like that might not end the violence. The struggle for wealth and power in Russia is out of control. Mr. Litvinenko also certainly had a long list of highly motivated enemies. He was a defector who claimed he had been ordered to kill the exiled oligarch Boris Berezovsky. He wrote a book alleging that his fellow Russian agents had organized a lethal bombing and accused Chechen terrorists. At the time he was poisoned, he was said to be looking into the death of Ms. Politkovskaya.

But the real problem is that Mr. Putin, a former K.G.B. agent himself, has given no indication that he is dismayed by the political killings, or that he is doing much to stop them. He seems mainly concerned with deflecting blame.

David And Goliath (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

TBILISI, Georgia -- While the United States is otherwise preoccupied, this small former Soviet republic has become the stage for a blatant effort at regime change, Russian-style. Vladimir Putin is going all out to undermine and get rid of Georgia's young, pro-American, pro-democracy president, Mikheil Saakashvili. Putin is assuming that the United States, overwhelmed by Iraq and needing Moscow's support on North Korea and Iran, will not make Georgia a "red-line" issue and that the European Union, fearful of endangering energy supplies from Russia, will similarly play it down.

Much is at stake: Putin's long-term strategic goal is to create a sphere of Russian dominance and hegemony in the vast area the Soviet Union and the czars once ruled. If he succeeds in bringing down the most independent and pro-Western leader in the former Soviet space outside the Baltics, he will have gone a long way toward his goal. Also at stake: President Bush's "freedom agenda," stability in the Caucasus and the European Union's attitude toward a small European country on the edge of the world's most volatile region.

Putin's methods are brutal. He has expelled at least 1,700 Georgians since October, cracked down on Georgian-owned businesses, made repeated statements about preserving the Russian market for real Russians and demonized Georgians as a criminal class. He has doubled natural gas prices two years running and cut off all direct rail, air, road, sea and postal links between the two countries. Russia has also waged an aggressive international disinformation campaign to raise doubts about Saakashvili -- I have heard astonishing, wholly undocumented charges about his alleged corruption and his "hot-headed" style in Berlin, Brussels and even Washington. In Tbilisi today, you can hear an ugly word for this that rises out of the depths of 19th-century Russian history: pogrom.

In fact, the 38-year-old Saakashvili represents almost everything the United States and the European Union should support. He led the peaceful 2003 Rose Revolution that overthrew the corrupt regime of Eduard Shevardnadze. He then opened the country to Western investment, presided over a dramatic turnaround in a once-hopeless economy, and instituted massive reforms of the police and civil service. While these efforts have not been perfect -- Freedom House and other nongovernmental organizations have expressed concern about an overly cozy relationship between the government and the main media, for example -- Georgia has climbed further up the World Bank's latest annual reform survey than any other country.

DOJ_NMG_0098123

In 2004 Saakashvili peacefully seized control of Ajaria, one of the three areas that, with Moscow's encouragement, refused to accept Georgian rule after the crackup of the Soviet Union in 1991. Ajaria, which lies on the Black Sea, has since become a booming tourist center. Now Saakashvili has his eye on regaining two remaining "frozen conflict" areas in Georgia, South Ossetia and Abkhazia, where impoverished breakaway regimes, heavily backed by Moscow and Russian troops, claim to be independent countries.

Despite international resolutions that affirm the territorial integrity of Georgia, it will be difficult for Saakashvili to regain Abkhazia and South Ossetia, especially without strong Western support. Putin would be happy to fight for them again if necessary and to overthrow Saakashvili if possible.

This is not just a strategic issue. It is also deeply personal: Saakashvili as David and Putin as Goliath. Their face-to-face meetings have been electric with anger. When President Bush brought Georgia up with Putin on the margins of the Asian-Pacific summit in Hanoi last weekend, Putin went into a rant, as he does every time the subject arises. His tirades may be designed to discourage further discussion, but for the most part it is, according to people who have heard Putin, real, irrational anger.

Bush's visit to Tbilisi last year was a triumph; today the main road from the airport into the city is proudly named President George W. Bush Street. Bush and Saakashvili genuinely like each other, and there is hardly a country left in the world where Bush is still so popular. Saakashvili's best American friends are Sen. John McCain, who has made support of democracy in the former Soviet Union a major theme, and George Soros, who helped pay salaries for the bankrupt Georgian civil service system in 2004. This cannot please Putin.

But why the relatively muted international response to Putin's outrageous behavior? The main reason is Washington's weakened state as a result of Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and North Korea. This is Putin's moment, especially with oil prices high. For the first time since the end of the Cold War, Washington needs Moscow more than Moscow needs Washington. During the 1990s President Bill Clinton used America's undisputed primacy to enlarge NATO (Saakashvili wants membership, of course) and conduct successful military actions in Bosnia and Kosovo over Russian objections. Today, by contrast, Russia has threatened to veto a U.N. Security Council resolution that would give Kosovo independence and has spuriously linked Kosovo's status to that of Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

The European Union and the United States must make the continued freedom and independence of Georgia a test case of the Western relationship with Russia. Putin must learn that we will not sacrifice the interests of a small country that has put its faith in Western values for the sake of energy supplies or U.N. votes. If Bush's freedom rhetoric has any meaning, let him prove it in Georgia, not just with polite calls for mutual restraint, but with real pressure on Moscow and the assembling of a united front with the European Union to make clear to Putin that he must cease his attempts to destabilize Georgia and overthrow Saakashvili. In the age of Iraq we must show that our nation can continue to have influence elsewhere in the world and that we will not abandon our friends or our values.

Richard Holbrooke, a former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, writes a monthly column for The Post.

Rethinking The Bomb (USNEWS)

By Bay Fang

U.S. News and World Report, November 27, 2006

It was Aug. 6, 1945, and Setsuko Iwamoto had just gotten to school. The morning bell rang, and the 13-year-old girl was running to assemble on the school grounds, when from the corner of her eye she saw a very bright flash-and her world changed forever. When she regained consciousness, she was trapped under a collapsed building and could hear the screams of classmates nearby. She somehow crawled out from the rubble, stood up, and looked around. Her world was dark, the sun blocked by soot and dust whirling in the air. Aside from the weakening screams, the city was eerily silent, and Iwamoto thought for a minute that she might be the last living creature on Earth.

All her life, Iwamoto, now 74, has tried to keep alive the memory of that day. But she is losing confidence that the world still remembers-and understands-the full horror of the atomic bomb. Just under two months ago, North Korea broke into the nuclear weapons club with a test explosion, which, though weak, sent political shock waves throughout the region. In reaction, pacifist Japan is cautiously opening a debate on a subject long taboo: whether to start its own nuclear weapons program. "I strongly believe that nuclear weapons and humans cannot coexist," Iwamoto says. "I'm very concerned about the direction Japan is heading in now."

Ever since its defeat in World War II, which ended with the American atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Japan has been governed by a constitution-written by U.S. occupation forces-that renounces war as a sovereign right and allows for only limited self-defense. Japan's hawkish new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, is seeking constitutional revisions expanding the definition of self-defense, in part because of regional threats such as North Korea. Then, too, Japan's potential shift is itself causing unease in a region that remembers brutal Japanese occupation during World War II. Inevitably, some politicians-including Foreign Minister Taro Aso-say Japan also should re-examine its rejection of nuclear weapons. However, at the end of the recent Asian economic summit in Vietnam, Abe vowed to keep Japan nonnuclear and a leading voice for nuclear disarmament. "Japan," he said, "is different from other countries in that it has suffered a nuclear attack."

DOJ_NMG_0098124

This week, the director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, visits Japan to talk about efforts to turn back the North Korean and Iranian nuclear programs and to step up international nonproliferation efforts.

Memorials. Some six decades after its nuclear devastation, Hiroshima is a sparkling city, with wide boulevards and the newest department stores. But the past is remembered and marked by the small shrines to the dead that dot the city, built by different work groups, civic organizations, or individuals. At the Hiroshima Peace Memorial Museum, a perky, matter-of-fact narrator tells the story of the B-29 Superfortress bomber Enola Gay and the fireball that exploded roughly 1,900 feet above the city at 8:15 a.m. on Aug. 6, 1945, releasing heat of over 1 million degrees Celsius. In the background are images of women and children with skin melting off their bodies, hair standing on end.

Bush Twins, Maradona Attend Soccer Game (AP)

AP, November 27, 2006

President Bush's twin daughters reveled Sunday in a soccer game in Argentina, sitting across the stadium from soccer star Diego Maradona — a fierce critic of their father.

Jenna and Barbara Bush, wearing the blue-and-yellow jerseys of the South American squad Boca Juniors, did not wave to television cameras that sporadically panned in on them during the game.

Watching from Boca's skybox at "La Bombonera" stadium, the twins were kept far from the fans and journalists seated below them.

Maradona watched the match from his own VIP box on the opposite side of the stadium. He was honored with the unveiling of a statue in his honor before the match.

Maradona is a forceful critic of U.S. policy in the region and joined a leftist protest led by Venezuela President Hugo Chavez last year against President Bush's appearance at the Summit of the Americas at the seaside resort of Mar del Plata.

Last Sunday, one of the twins had her purse stolen while touring the historic Buenos Aires district of San Telmo, garnering widespread public attention and dominating local TV newscasts.

Argentine officials did not say which twin was robbed. ABC News, citing unidentified law enforcement reports, reported that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were taken.

Help For Haiti (WP)

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

WHEN IT COMES to Haiti, the hemisphere's poorest country, the United States has a perverse history of being more generous with its troop deployments than its terms of trade. The time is ripe for a new approach.

For the past two years, Congress has turned a deaf ear to pleas that Washington extend trade preferences to Haitian-manufactured T-shirts, hospital scrubs and other apparel. The effect has been devastating for the nation's garment industry, once one of the few bright spots in an otherwise supine economy. Clothing assembly plants, already hit hard by the political violence of recent years, are closing nearly every month as customers move their business to Asia. A sector that once provided 100,000 jobs now employs only 12,000 to 20,000 and stands in peril of disappearing entirely.

A rescue package pending in Congress would allow duty-free access to U.S. markets for garments assembled in Haiti using fabrics from third countries. The legislation, known as the Haitian Hemispheric Opportunity through Partnership Encouragement Act, also called the HOPE bill, is a modest measure; it is certainly no panacea for the Haitian economy. But apparel-making plants that close are relatively easy to reopen, and HOPE, if enacted, could help kick-start the Haitian economy by quickly getting 10,000 or more people working again. In a country as poor as Haiti, where a majority of the population survives on less than $2 a day and four out of five adults are jobless or underemployed, those jobs would be a lifeline for thousands of families.

Predictably, HOPE is opposed by textile industry lobbyists and Southern lawmakers who are doing their bidding. But among HOPE's advocates on the House Ways and Means Committee are both the top Republican (California Rep. Bill Thomas) and the top Democrat (New York Rep. Charles B. Rangel); the bill is also backed by Haitian President Rene Preval. Timing is crucial. After two interventions by U.S. forces in the past 12 years, Haiti inaugurated a democratically elected president this year and has lately enjoyed what passes there for relative political stability. After 15 years of political turmoil, violent unrest and economic mismanagement, this looks like a rare opportunity to consolidate tentative progress in Haiti. Congress shouldn't miss it.

DOJ_NMG_0098125

Don't Punish African Clothesmakers (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 27, 2006

Congress should avoid the political entanglements and extend trade legislation vital to the poorest continent.

OF ALL THE free-trade pacts signed by the United States over the last decade, perhaps none is as uncontroversial as the African Growth and Opportunity Act. Providing duty-free access to exporters in sub-Saharan Africa threatens few if any American jobs while spurring industry in some of the poorest countries in the world. Yet a vital provision of the act is set to expire, and, for the moment, Congress appears more interested in political gamesmanship than in making a painless decision to help some of the world's neediest people.

The language in question involves African clothing made from non-African fabric. Because of a scarcity of fabric mills, apparel makers in countries such as Kenya and Lesotho have to import most of their raw material from elsewhere — usually Asia. That adds considerable expense and time, so duty-free status is about the only thing that keeps African clothing makers competitive in the U.S. market.

If that provision is not renewed in September 2007, as many as 150,000 jobs in Africa's fledgling apparel industry might be lost. Ten months might seem a long time away, but an extension is urgently needed now because apparel companies typically place their orders from nine to 12 months in advance.

The last time an extension of an AGOA provision came up, in 2004, it passed unanimously in both houses of Congress. This time, things have become more political. Though extending the third-country fabric provision still enjoys broad bipartisan support — even the fiercely protectionist U.S. textile industry isn't opposing it — the bill may be folded into a much broader and more controversial piece of trade legislation.

Republican Rep. Bill Thomas of Bakersfield, outgoing chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, is said to be working on a package that would bundle the AGOA with various tax breaks and trade priorities, such as a free-trade pact with Andean nations and new preferences for Haitian apparel, that are heavily opposed by American textile producers. It's a mostly worthwhile package that will face serious opposition in an increasingly protectionist House — one that will get even more anti-trade when the Democrats take control in January.

The livelihoods of too many people are at stake. Thomas should expedite the AGOA bill as is, rather than allow it to be held hostage by his other priorities. And the Democrats who will be taking over the House need to understand that poverty isn't confined to Africa; trade deals with Haiti and the Andes are just as important, even if they stir more opposition from U.S. unions and manufacturers. You cannot credibly claim to weep for the poor while simultaneously blocking them from selling you shirts. Trade is exponentially more powerful than aid, and deeds mean more than words.

DOJ_NMG_0098126

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 27, 2006 8:25 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, November 26, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061126.pdf; dojclips061126.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Government Urges Supreme Court To Stay Out Of Times Case (NYT) 3
Court Asked To Stay Out Of Leak Case (AP) 3
British Terror Trial Traces A Path To Militant Islam (NYT) 4
Scalia The Civil Libertarian? (NYT) 8

Homeland Response:

Bush Vows Continued Aid To Gulf Hurricane Victims (WP/AP) 10
CIA Recruiting Comes Out Of The Shadows (WT/AP) 10

War News:

Baghdad Braces For More Reprisals (WP) 12
47 Sunni Militants Die In Iraq Gunfights (NYT) 14
21 Shiites Gunned Down In Front Of Families (CNN) 15
Iraq Extends Curfew Amid Violence (BBC) 17
Iraqi Clerics Call For End To Hostilities (LAT) 18
Learning From Iraq (NYT) 19
In Search Of The Fixers (NYT) 20
Long After We Withdraw (NYT) 22
The Way To Win A Guerrilla War (WP) 24
U.S. Finds Iraq Insurgency Has Funds To Sustain Itself (NYT) 25
Sunni Urges Arabs Against Iraq Gov't (AP) 28
Now It's Iraq On The Agenda For Mr. Fix-It Of The G.O.P. (NYT) 28
Turning To Baker For New Iraq Plan (BOS/CHT) 30
Iraq Group A Study In Secrecy, Centrism (WP) 31
Long Stints In Iraq Fracture Families (WP) 33
In Alaska, Troops Return Home To Chills And Cheers (LAT/AP) 35
Iraq's Palestinians In Bull's-eye (LAT) 35
Local Surgeons Helping Iraqi Who Helped U.S. (NSDY) 37
Leaving Iraq, Honorably (WP) 38
Bring Back Saddam Hussein (LAT) 39
A Tale Of Two Bushes (WP) 40
NATO Soldier Among Dead In Afghanistan (AP) 41
Taliban, Convicts May Be Afghan Recruits (AP) 42

Corporate Scandals:

First Time As Tragedy, Second As A Musical (NYT) 43
Peer Pressure: Inflating Executive Pay (NYT) 44
The High Cost Of Too Good To Be True (NYT) 47

Criminal Law:

DeFazio Macing A Relic Of Old Style Of Pa. Corruption (PTR) 51
Getting About The Business Of Fighting Crime (MCA) 52
Federal Crime Survey To Include SB County (SBCS) 53
Hampton Roads One Of 18 Metro Areas In U.S. Crime Study (VP) 54

Civil Rights:

NAACP Wants FBI Probe Of Shooting (MOULTO) 54
Experts Concerned As Ballot Problems Persist (NYT) 55
Déjà Vu In Florida (NYT) 57

Antitrust:

Justice Dept. Probe Eyes CME Clearing Operation (CRAINCB) 58
Column: Biggest Year Ever For Deals (SFC) 59
As Cable, Broadcast Snit Boils, FCC Calls A Meeting (DMR) 61
Industry Denies Manipulation To Boost Profits (AP) 63
Mergers Mean Quick Gains For Funds (WP/AP) 65
Airline Mating Dances Pick Up (HC) 66

Environment/Indian Affairs:

On The Move To Outrun Climate Change (WP) 67
Climate In The Court (WP) 69
Clean Up The Navajos' Poisoned Land (LAT) 70

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Crackdown Sends Meth Labs South Of Border (LAT) 70
Heroin Use Rising In Indy (INDYSTAR) 72

Immigration:

Border Group's Finances Scrutinized (HC) 74

Congress-Administration:

Hail To The Chief (BOS) 76
As Power Shifts In New Congress, Pork May Linger (NYT) 79
Democratic "Old Bulls" To Take Charge (LAT) 82
Success Of Drug Plan Challenges Democrats (WP) 84
On Drug Prices, Are Democrats In A Fix? (LAT) 85
Here Come The Economic Populists (NYT) 87

Other News:

State Chiefs Credit Dean For Victory (WT) 89
The Hill May Look Steep For Republicans In 2008 (WP) 90
Denver Poised To Land '08 Democratic Convention (WT) 91
Romney Leaving Mass. With Mixed Record (WP) 92
Romney Reaches For Reagan Touch (BOS) 94
Do We Need Another T.R.? (LAT) 95
A Democratic Tidal Wave In New Hampshire (WP) 97
Dems Look To Big Sky (DENP) 98
The Gospel According To Jim Wallis (WP) 100
The Decade Of Buying Happily (WP) 106
The Education Of Robert Kennedy (NYT) 107
Cheney Meets Saudi King For Talks (NYT) 108
Cheney, Saudi King Discuss Trouble Spots (AP) 108
Dick Cheney Holds Mideast Talks In Saudi Arabia (AFP) 109
Iraq PM Struggling Ahead Of Bush Talks (AP) 110
A Matter Of Definition: What Makes A Civil War, And Who Declares It So? (NYT) 112
Israel And Palestinians Agree To A Cease-Fire In The Gaza Strip (NYT) 113
Tentative Deal Is Reached To Halt Fighting In Gaza (WP) .. 114
Israel, Palestinians OK Gaza Cease-fire (AP) 115
Israelis, Palestinians Reinstate Cease-fire (LAT) 117
Palestinians, Israel Agree To Gaza Cease-fire (CNN) 118
Gaza Ceasefire Comes Into Force (BBC) 119
Crisis In Lebanon Reaches New Threshold (WP) 120
Lebanon Approves U.N. Tribunal To Investigate Hariri Assassination (MCT) 121
Lebanon's Government Backs U.N. Tribunal (AP) 122
Needed: A Big Stick (WP) 123
Realism, And Values, In Lebanon (WP) 124
Lebanon On The Brink (LAT) 125
Probe Traces Global Reach Of Counterfeiting Ring (WP) ... 126
Poisoned Russian Ex-Spy Said He Was Ordered To Hire Assassins (WP/AP) 128
After Poisoning, Britain Sees No Big Public Threat (NYT) 129
Polonium That Killed Ex-spy Could Be From Russia, But Hard To Pin Blame (AP) 129
Protestant Militant Charged In Belfast Attack (NYT) 131
Ecuador's Path And Alliances At Stake In Runoff Election (NYT) 131
In Ecuadoran Vote, Rhetoric Gives Way To Popular Pledges (WP) 132
Divided, Unhappy Ecuadoreans Head To Polls (LAT) 134
Ecuador Votes To Decide President (BBC) 135
Police, Protesters Clash In Mexican City (AP) 135
Pinochet Takes Responsibility For Regime (AP) 136
Rebels Take Control Of City In Eastern Chad (NYT) 137
Rebels "Seize" Two Chadian Towns (BBC) 137
A Sister's Sacrifice (NYT) 138
Sri Lanka Rebels' Critic Silenced By Bullet (NYT) 139
Awaiting Lengthy Lab Confirmation Of Bird Flu Risks Treatment Delays, Studies Find (NYT) 141

DOJ_NMG_0098129

TERRORISM NEWS:

Government Urges Supreme Court To Stay Out Of Times Case (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25 — The Justice Department asked the Supreme Court on Saturday not to prevent a federal prosecutor from examining the telephone records of two reporters at The New York Times, warning that time is running out in an investigation of leaks about two Islamic charities.

At issue is a Chicago grand jury investigation into information learned by two reporters in 2001 about the government's plan to freeze the assets of two charities that were suspected of having ties to terrorist groups.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the United States attorney in Chicago, is seeking to review the telephone records of the two reporters — Judith Miller, who retired from The Times last year, and Philip Shenon. Prosecutors say the reporters asked for comment from both charities in a way that tipped them off to the coming raids.

The case originated in December 2001, when government officials were preparing to raid the offices of the two charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

According to the Justice Department, the reporters contacted both charities and asked questions one day before the raids had been planned. The questions reduced the effectiveness of the searches and endangered the federal agents who carried them out, the government said.

In August, a panel on the federal appeals court in Manhattan ruled 2 to 1 that the reporters were not entitled to shield their sources under the First Amendment or under precedents established in common law.

On Friday, The Times asked Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg of the Supreme Court to delay Mr. Fitzgerald from reviewing the telephone records until the court has an opportunity to decide whether to hear the case. The court gave the government until Saturday to submit a formal response.

On Saturday, the Justice Department urged the Supreme Court not to get involved in the case, saying that even a temporary stay of the earlier court decision would harm a significant criminal investigation.

The department said prosecutors had less than three weeks left to file charges on some of the possible crimes, because important statutes of limitations will expire on Dec. 13 and Dec. 14 — five years after the two separate raids took place.

The department also contended that the facts of the case were unusual and would not create a far-reaching precedent allowing the disclosure of a reporter's confidential sources.

This case is separate from an earlier battle between Mr. Fitzgerald and The Times over leaks about the identity of a covert C.I.A. operative.

Court Asked To Stay Out Of Leak Case (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 26, 2006

Justice Department wants justices to refrain from entering probe

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department on Saturday asked the Supreme Court to refrain from stepping into another First Amendment battle featuring federal prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and The New York Times.

The case involves a leak probe by Fitzgerald to track down the confidential sources of Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon for stories in 2001. Miller, who spent 85 days in jail in 2005 in connection with Fitzgerald's separate CIA leak probe in the Valerie Plame case, retired from the newspaper a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0098130

In the current case, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has said prosecutors can see the journalists' phone records. Earlier, a federal judge had ruled in the newspaper's favor, saying the First Amendment supplied a qualified privilege to reporters to protect confidential sources.

On Friday, the newspaper asked Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg to temporarily block the government from going through the records and said it was prepared to file a petition by Dec. 24 asking the court to take up the case.

In a filing requested by Ginsburg, the government cites a declaration by Fitzgerald on Nov. 13 that says the time for filing criminal charges will expire in the next three weeks.

Temporarily blocking the government from reviewing the phone records would cause "irreparable harm to a significant criminal investigation," the Justice Department told the Supreme Court in a 40-page filing.

The reporters' stories disclosed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation. The freezing of assets was in connection with a terrorism-funding probe.

Shenon and Miller called the two organizations for comment about the information on freezing assets, a move the government says tipped off the charities of planned government raids. The federal judge who ruled in the Times' favor said there is no evidence in the case even suggesting the reporters tipped off the charities about the raids or that the reporters even knew of the government's plans to raid either charity.

The Justice Department replied that "the fact that the reporters here relayed disclosures from a government source to targets of an imminent law enforcement action substantially weakens any claim of freedom of the press."

At issue are 11 days of phone records the government wants to review for the two reporters in 2001 -- Sept. 27-30, Dec. 1-3 and Dec. 10-13. In his declaration this month, Fitzgerald says the statute of limitations "on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating" will expire on Dec. 3 and Dec. 13 of this year. Those dates are five years to the day after the second and third set of phone records the prosecutor wants to review, pointing to the deadline for filing criminal charges.

In June 2005, the Supreme Court refused to take up a separate case involving the First Amendment in which Fitzgerald sought to compel Miller to reveal her sources in the leak of Plame's CIA identity.

That leak probe led to Miller's jailing before eventually agreeing to testify in Fitzgerald's investigation. Her testimony was critical in the indictment of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby.

The current leak probe is in Fitzgerald's capacity as U.S. attorney in Chicago. The Libby prosecution is in Fitzgerald's role as a special counsel who was selected by a Justice Department superior to conduct that particular investigation.

British Terror Trial Traces A Path To Militant Islam (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino, Stephen Grey

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 25 — More than half a ton of ammonium nitrate fertilizer suitable for making bombs was locked in a rented storage warehouse. A cookie tin of aluminum powder was hidden behind a garden shed. Young British Muslims underwent military training at guerrilla camps in remote parts of Pakistan. Suspects, surreptitiously taped by the police, talked about bombing targets in Britain.

Enter a computer technician in Canada experimenting with remote-controlled detonation devices and a collaborator-turned-informer from Queens testifying about secret meetings with operatives of Al Qaeda.

For eight months, the tale of the Operation Crevice Seven has been unfolding in a cramped, windowless courtroom in the Old Bailey in London.

On trial are seven men, ages 19 to 34, six of them with family roots in Pakistan. Arrested in 2004, they are charged with involvement in a criminal conspiracy to make explosives to commit murder, allegations that they all deny. Their target, the authorities say, was unclear — a nightclub, perhaps, or a shopping mall, public utilities, a British airliner or even the House of Commons.

But investigators say the evidence reveals the workings of the kind of cell most feared by officials in Europe. Young Muslims, radicalized by local imams and trained at military camps in Pakistan with vague connections to Al Qaeda, plan an attack at home with help from outside terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0098131

The July 7, 2005, London transit bombings and the alleged London-based plot uncovered last August to blow up airliners also involved disaffected British youths of Pakistani descent, some of whom had traveled to Pakistan for family visits, study and perhaps training.

In a speech this month, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, the director general of the British security service known as MI5, disclosed that intelligence officers were watching 1,600 people "who are actively engaged in plotting, or facilitating, terrorist acts here and overseas."

She said they had identified nearly 30 plots that "often have links back to Al Qaeda in Pakistan and through those links Al Qaeda gives guidance and training to its largely British foot soldiers here." She said other countries — Spain, France, Canada and Germany — faced similar threats.

Dame Eliza's comments echo concerns among intelligence officials throughout Europe that remnants of Al Qaeda's network, disrupted after Sept. 11, were reconstituting in the tribal areas on the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

The Crevice defendants deny they were a conspiratorial cell. Some admit to training in Pakistan but insist they had a goal other than attacking Britain, notwithstanding the fertilizer stored near London. They said they supported jihad in Afghanistan and the liberation of Kashmir, a disputed area between Pakistan and India.

One defendant, Salahuddin Amin, a 31-year-old part-time taxi driver from Luton, testified Tuesday that he started donating money to help Kashmir in 1999. Then he moved to Pakistan in 2001 and became a conduit directing assistance from Britain to Afghan refugees in Pakistan, he said.

But prosecutors charge that Mr. Amin, who knew some of the other Crevice defendants from Britain, became a link between them and militants in Pakistan. They said he and others attended a two-day course in Pakistan to learn to make fertilizer-based explosives. In videotaped confessions to the British police after his arrest in 2005, he admitted being "mixed up with terrorists" and said he provided a formula for explosives to one of his co-defendants through an Internet chat room.

On the witness stand, Mr. Amin proclaimed his innocence, saying he confessed only after being jailed for 10 months in Pakistan, where he said he was beaten and threatened with a whirring electric drill. "I would never take part in plots like that," he testified.

Heeding the Call to Jihad

Omar Khyam, 24, considered by prosecutors to be the ringleader of the group, began his journey to extremism as a teenager in Crawley, just south of London.

Mr. Khyam, a standout cricket player, planned to study electrical engineering in college, but when he was 16 he began spending time with members of Al Muhajiroun, a radical group active in Crawley and dedicated to a global Islamic community under Shariah, the legal code based on the Koran. The group, led by Omar Bakri Mohammed, is now banned in Britain.

Two years later, instead of preparing for his high school exams, Mr. Khyam ran away, leaving a note saying he was off to join Islamic freedom fighters in Kashmir.

His uncle told a British newspaper that ran an article in 2000 about Mr. Khyam's sudden departure that his nephew had been indoctrinated by Al Muhajiroun. Mr. Khyam's family persuaded him to return home, but not before he had attended a training camp.

"They taught me everything I needed for guerrilla warfare in Kashmir, AK47s, pistols, RPGs, sniper rifles, climbing and crawling techniques, reconnaissance and light machine guns," Mr. Khyam testified in the Crevice trial in September.

After enrolling in college in Britain, Mr. Khyam returned to Pakistan in 2001 for a friend's wedding and crossed into Afghanistan to meet members of the Taliban movement before it was overthrown after 9/11. "They were soft, kind and humble, but harsh with their enemies," he recalled in court.

Meanwhile, in Luton, a town on the other side of London and another center of Al Muhajiroun recruitment, Mr. Amin also heeded the call to jihad.

His videotaped confessions to the police tell the story of his rejection of his Western way of life, his turn to prayer and the rules of Islam and his political radicalization.

It was in a Luton prayer center that he first met some of the men accused of being Crevice conspirators, including Mr. Khyam and a man accused of being a Qaeda operative, Abu Munthir, who was visiting from Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0098132

Videos showing the slaughter of Muslims in Chechnya and Bosnia jolted Mr. Amin into sending money to "freedom fighters" in Kashmir to buy arms and ammunition. The lectures of the radical Muslim cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri at the Finsbury Park mosque in London shortly before 9/11 and the American-led invasion of Afghanistan helped persuade him that he should join the Afghan fight.

Two months after 9/11, Mr. Amin sold his house in Luton and went to Pakistan in search of training with militants, according to his confessions. The prosecution argues that over the next three years, Mr. Amin, Mr. Khyam and their associates entered a hidden world of terrorism with tentacles on three continents.

Secrecy was maintained by using aliases and coded language. Cellphone conversations were avoided. Rather than using e-mail messages, communications were passed through Internet chats or by electronic messages stored for others to pick up later with passwords. Computer hard drives and cellphone SIM cards were discarded and replaced often.

The prosecution's guide through that world was a Pakistani-American named Mohammed Junaid Babar, who said he worked for the New York chapter of Al Muhajiroun.

Defense lawyers portray Mr. Babar as a fabricator and possibly an agent for the United States government. "You are a liar, a deceitful, self-centered, arrogant fantasist," Michel Massih, a lawyer for one of the defendants, told Mr. Babar during cross-examination last April.

Mr. Babar acknowledged having lied when first questioned by the F.B.I. He pleaded guilty in New York in June 2004 to providing material support for terrorists, and he said in court that he was testifying against the Crevice suspects to reduce his sentence.

Yet during 17 days on the witness stand, Mr. Babar, the star witness for the prosecution, told a riveting story.

A militant networker, Mr. Babar said he moved to Pakistan in November 2001 with money and instructions from Al Muhajiroun. A year later, on a fund-raising trip to London, Mr. Babar said, he first met members of what he called the "Crawley lot," including Mr. Khyam and Anthony Garcia, an Algerian-born aspiring fashion model who had changed his name and is now accused of purchasing the secreted fertilizer.

Mr. Babar said Mr. Khyam told him that he and other "brothers" from Crawley were not just a local operation but reported to a man called Abdul Hadi, described by Mr. Khyam as the "No. 3" in Al Qaeda.

In mid-2003, the prosecution said, the Crevice suspects began coming together in Pakistan where Mr. Babar's home in Lahore was a haven for young, radical Britons of Pakistani descent.

Bomb-related equipment like detonators, fertilizer and aluminum powder that can be used to fuel an explosion, and beans to make the poison ricin were stored in a bedroom cupboard, he said. The backyard was used for small-scale experiments with explosives, including the detonation of a spice jar packed with chemicals.

Mr. Amin, meanwhile, was living close by. He said in his police confessions that he had been collecting money and materials for fighters in Afghanistan and passing them on to the man accused of being a Qaeda operative, Abu Munthir, who had once visited the Luton prayer center.

When Mr. Khyam arrived in Pakistan in 2003, hoping to train to fight in Afghanistan, he was told there were enough fighters there, according to Mr. Amin's confessions. Instead, Abu Munthir sent word that if he was really serious, he should "do something" in Britain, Mr. Amin told the police.

Later that year, Mr. Khyam, Mr. Amin and another man traveled to a safe house in Kohat, Pakistan, for two days of training in making explosives, including fertilizer bombs, Mr. Amin said. Mr. Khyam then organized a session in the mountains around Malakand near the Afghan border, allegedly to teach others what he had learned.

Mr. Khyam and a core group of three other Crevice suspects, including Mr. Babar, made their way there by posing as Western tourists looking to visit lakes and glaciers.

Mr. Babar said one of the men he brought along was a Canadian named Mohammed Momin Khawaja, a computer engineer, now 27, who is accused of being the detonator-maker in the plot.

Mr. Babar recalled in court that the first test with fertilizer-based explosives failed; the second was moderately successful.

"It created a U in the ground," Mr. Babar testified. "It went down, sideways and back up the other way." The group videotaped the scene, he added, hoping to produce a "a minimovie-type thing" with Koranic verses or songs, to inspire others.

DOJ_NMG_0098133

If Mr. Babar is to be believed, Mr. Khyam became so determined to carry out an attack in Britain that during this time he also took a 10-day trip to seek more guidance from Qaeda operatives.

Mr. Babar said Mr. Khyam told him that the instructions from Abu Munthir were for "multiple bombings," either "simultaneously or one after the other on the same day."

Mr. Babar recalled Mr. Khyam saying that Britain was as responsible as the United States for what was happening in the Middle East and should be attacked. "He said we need to hit certain spots like pubs, nightclubs and trains," Mr. Babar said.

An Undercover Investigation

Precisely how and when the authorities learned of the group's activities is unclear, but by early February 2004, they had begun one of Britain's largest antiterrorist undercover investigations. Operation Crevice, aided by the United States, Canada and Pakistan, involved round-the-clock human surveillance, audio wiretaps in cars and homes and video surveillance.

On Feb. 20, investigators got an extraordinarily lucky break: a suspicious employee at a self-storage warehouse outside of London called the police to report that someone named Nabeel Hussain was storing a large amount of fertilizer.

The police inserted an undercover officer called Amanda as the receptionist and secretly replaced the fertilizer with a benign substance. A hidden camera was installed and filmed Mr. Khyam when he showed up to check the contents.

The police continued to watch and listen, and their 3,500 hours of surveillance tapes are at the core of the prosecution case. Some of the most chilling conversations played in court are between Mr. Khyam, whose Suzuki sport utility vehicle and apartment had been bugged, and Jawad Akbar, 23, a college student whose apartment had been bugged.

In a conversation recorded in February 2004, Mr. Akbar talked of an "easy" target, like a nightclub, "where you don't need no experience and nothing and you could get a job." In such a place, he said, "no one can even turn round and say, 'Oh, they were innocent,' those slags dancing around," using a slang term for loose women.

When Mr. Khyam asked what he would do if he got a job at a place like the Ministry of Sound, London's largest nightclub, Mr. Akbar replied, "Blow the whole thing up."

In March, Mr. Khyam talked about a simultaneous attack of Britain's gas, electricity and water systems.

"The electrics go off so it's a blackout, and then the gas lot move in and bang," he said. "Then something goes wrong with the water, a simultaneous attack."

In late March, when Mr. Khyam and his younger brother, Shujah Mahmood, 19, also a defendant, bought tickets to fly to Pakistan on April 6, the police feared that an attack in Britain was imminent.

On March 30, 700 police officers raided two dozen locations, shutting down what they suspected was a cell and arresting six of the defendants.

They found the cookie tin containing aluminum powder behind a shed at Mr. Khyam's family home in Crawley. They also found a dozen CD-ROMs giving detailed plans of Britain's electricity and gas systems that they charged had been stolen from the National Grid Transco utility company by an employee, Waheed Mahmood. At 34, Mr. Mahmood, a father of four, is the oldest Crevice defendant.

The police seized a list of British synagogues and computer video files containing parts of an explosives handbook and a military training manual. Investigators also found instructions for how to react if contacted by counterterrorism authorities.

Meanwhile, Mr. Khawaja, who had recently returned from visiting Crevice suspects in Britain, was arrested in Canada. Electrical equipment, described by British authorities as remote-control devices that could be connected to bomb detonators, as well as guns and ammunition, were found at his home. He is awaiting trial in Canada, the first suspect to be tried under Canada's 2001 Antiterrorism Act.

The Prosecution's Case

Prosecutors acknowledge that they have not been able to identify either a fixed target or a date for an attack, but they do not have to. To win convictions, they only have to prove that the seven defendants conspired to cause an explosion "likely to endanger life" in Britain.

Mr. Khyam, Mr. Garcia and Mr. Hussain are also charged with possessing 600 kilograms, or about 1,320 pounds, of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, and Mr. Khyam and Mr. Mahmood with possessing aluminum powder, in both cases with the intent to use the ingredients to commit an act of terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0098134

In considering the surveillance tapes, defense lawyers argue that their clients may have been doing a lot of talking about deadly chaos, but that it was nothing more than talk. Some of the schemes seemed like fantasy, like injecting poison into beer cans at soccer games. Others were more frightening, if true: Mr. Amin is accused of making inquiries about buying a radioactive "dirty bomb" from the Russian mafia in Belgium.

As in other criminal cases in Britain, some of the evidence against the suspects is not permitted to be disclosed — either to the jury or the public — until the trials are over for fear that juries will be improperly swayed. Even the news media is under a strict order by the judge to avoid revealing certain information about the case.

The evidence presented shows that the radicalization of the defendants began years ago, raising questions about how well the British security services monitored militants in their midst before last year's transit bombings. The authorities continue to investigate any links between the Crevice defendants and the 2005 bombers, one of whom, the government says, had visited a training camp in Pakistan before the attack.

Investigators closely watch traffic between Britain and Pakistan. But that is a significant challenge with nearly 400,000 visits by residents of Britain to Pakistan in 2004, of an average length of 41 days. And it is even more difficult to determine which, if any, of those visitors are militants following the dangerous route of traveling to Pakistan for indoctrination and training.

"Counterterrorism efforts haven't been able to penetrate the process of radicalization and recruitment," said Sajjan M. Gohel, director for international security at the London-based Asia-Pacific Foundation. "For every individual captured or killed, there are at least five more coming down the assembly line."

Scalia The Civil Libertarian? (NYT)

By Scott Turow

The New York Times Magazine, November 26, 2006

The conservative ideological majority on the U.S. Supreme Court that determined the 2000 election in favor of President Bush should have grown stronger when Bush chose Justice Samuel Alito to replace the moderate Sandra Day O'Connor. Yet in carrying out its first priority, the war on terror, the White House has encountered unwelcome resistance from the court. Objections to Bush's sweeping view of executive power have come not only from liberals and centrists, like Justice Anthony Kennedy but, more remarkably, from Justice Antonin Scalia, who may end up playing a pivotal role in future war-on-terror cases.

Scalia has long been regarded as an administration favorite. Bush suggested during the 2000 campaign that Scalia was his idea of a model justice. In the court's Bush v. Gore decision, which brought that campaign to an end, Scalia ventured the opaque claim that candidate Bush would experience "irreparable harm" if the recount continued in Florida. Not long after, the justice's son was appointed by the president to a top position in the Labor Department. In January 2004, Scalia took a free ride on Vice President Cheney's plane to go duck hunting with him; later he refused to step aside in a major case involving Cheney.

Even beyond these affiliations, Justice Scalia's flamethrowing rhetoric and his hostility to whole chapters of 20th-century jurisprudence have made him a conservative icon and a favorite face on liberal dart boards. The justice has declared that the Constitution not only creates no right to abortion but does not even protect private adult sexual conduct, blasting the court's 2003 decision to strike down a Texas sodomy law as "largely sign[ing] on to the so-called homosexual agenda." He has scaled back the exclusionary rule, which bars evidence obtained by unlawful police searches, and made it clear that he would like to do away with Miranda warnings.

Less noted, however, is the fact that Justice Scalia, especially in the last decade, has frequently taken an expansive view of the Bill of Rights, thus supporting defendants in criminal cases. Scalia is one of the intellectual godfathers of a strand of Supreme Court decisions, crystallized by Apprendi v. New Jersey, that revolutionized sentencing laws. Following a strict interpretation of the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of due process of law and the Sixth Amendment's right to trial by jury, Scalia has insisted that any fact used to extend punishment beyond normal statutory limits must be specified and proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt. Despite his fevered support for capital punishment, Scalia also joined a court majority in holding that the Constitution requires a death sentence to be decided by a jury, rather than by a judge, effectively setting aside every capital sentence still on direct appeal in five states.

DOJ_NMG_0098135

Nor are Scalia's pro-rights decisions limited to one arcane area. In Kyllo v. U.S. (2001), Justice Scalia, writing for the court, deemed police use of heat-seeking technology to detect whether marijuana was being grown inside a house a violation of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches. In a 2004 opinion, Scalia spoke for a court majority in finding unconstitutional the widespread practice of using recordings or prepared statements to the police as a substitute for the testimony of unavailable witnesses. And last term, supported by the court's four more liberal justices, Scalia held that a defendant wrongly deprived of the lawyer of his choice gets a new trial, no matter how overwhelming the evidence of his guilt.

Justice Scalia is led to these seemingly divergent positions by his unyielding adherence to a school of constitutional interpretation called originalism. To Scalia, the Bill of Rights means exactly what it did in 1791, no more, no less. The needs of an evolving society, he says, should be addressed by legislation rather than the courts.

In all of this, Scalia is first and foremost a legal formalist — meaning that to him, the rules are the rules. He did not sign on to the Apprendi cases out of any special sympathy for criminal defendants — indeed, he once wrote an opinion refusing to uphold an acquittal on the grounds that the defendant's motion for acquittal was filed one day too late. Rather, he was motivated by the assumption that, as he put it in the capital-punishment case, "the right of trial by jury is in perilous decline." In other words, over the years the right had come to be interpreted more narrowly than in 1791.

In adjudicating the war on terror, Scalia has come down strongly on behalf of the administration and its prisoners in a number of cases. The extensive powers claimed by the Bush administration would seem to pose a problem for originalists, because the Bill of Rights was indubitably added to the Constitution to keep the new American executive from repeating the monarchal abuses of King George. Yet in a speech in suburban Cleveland in March 2003, just before the invasion of Iraq (where one of his sons would serve), Justice Scalia told his audience that "most of the rights that you enjoy go way beyond what the Constitution requires" and predicted that in war time "the protections will be ratcheted right down to the constitutional minimum." In one of the first war-on-terror cases to reach the court, Rasul v. Bush, a majority agreed that the foreign detainees at Guantánamo had a right to file habeas corpus petitions. Scalia strongly dissented, as one might have expected given the fact that the Constitution's protections are generally intended for only American citizens.

It thus verged on the breathtaking when Justice Scalia wrote in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld: "Many think it not only inevitable but entirely proper that liberty give way to security in times of national crisis. ... Whatever the general merits of the view that war silences law or modulates its voice, that view has no place in the interpretation and application of a Constitution designed precisely to confront war and, in a manner that accords with democratic principles, to accommodate it."

Hamdi, an American citizen, was supposedly captured among Taliban forces in Afghanistan. Four justices thought that the Congressional resolution passed immediately after 9/11, authorizing the use of force against Al Qaeda, permitted the president to detain Hamdi as an enemy combatant. A majority ruled, however, that Hamdi could not be held indefinitely simply on the president's say-so and was entitled to a meaningful hearing. Justice Scalia would not even concede the first point. Instead, he declared Congress has not given the president the power to hold any American, even one who has taken up arms against his country, as an enemy combatant and instead must press criminal charges or let him go.

Now the looming question is where Scalia will settle as future war-on-terror cases come before the court, and whether his unique jurisprudence will accord him a leading role. The court's centrists, most notably Justices Kennedy and Breyer, are inclined to apply nuanced balancing tests. Weighing, for example, the need to hold battlefield captives like Hamdi against the reality that such a detention could last most of the detainee's lifetime, both justices voted to create a right to a hearing for citizen-combatants. Yet their war-on-terror decisions have been so factbound that they offer little future guidance on the meaning of the rights involved. For instance, what happens when a citizen who is a supposed enemy combatant is captured in this country rather than on the battlefield? The other conservatives on the court — Justice Thomas and, in their limited times, Justices Alito and Roberts — have shown an inclination to defer blankly to executive power. Scalia's originalism, too, tends to view executive power expansively, but only when it is applied to the many areas beyond the narrow preserves created by the Bill of Rights. As the Apprendi cases demonstrate, Scalia is more like the court's liberal members in seeing the Bill of Rights as a constitutional trump when it collides with government power.

Apparently unsure about what the future holds, the administration recently has been trying to sidestep the Supreme Court altogether. It persuaded Congress to remove the habeas corpus rights the court had previously granted foreign detainees at

DOJ_NMG_0098136

Guantánamo. The White House also wants to rewrite the wiretapping laws to bolster the president's assertions that he had the constitutional power to wiretap certain calls without a warrant. The president has asked the lame-duck Republican Congress to push through the change, but the newly emboldened Senate Democrats say they will block it. It appears most likely that when the wiretapping program inevitably reaches the court, the justices will have to weigh the president's claim of inherent authority against the statute in place when the program began. The statute explicitly says its warrant procedure is "the exclusive means" to wiretap calls to or from the U.S. for national security reasons.

Scalia has seldom been a consensus builder on the court, preferring to stick with his own views rather than troll for votes. But his occasional alliance with the court's more liberal justices could be struck again in future terror cases. The result would be an unequivocal declaration that executive power must yield to constitutional liberties, even when the nation is on the prolonged war footing we seem to have adopted.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Vows Continued Aid To Gulf Hurricane Victims (WP/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday renewed the nation's commitment to help victims of last year's Gulf Coast hurricanes and thanked U.S. troops fighting abroad.

In his Saturday radio address, Bush said Americans are grateful to those who rallied after hurricanes Katrina and Rita to bring food, water and hope to people who lost everything.

"We renew our commitment to help those who are still suffering and to rebuild our nation's Gulf Coast," Bush said.

Next week, the president will attend a NATO summit in Europe and will meet in Jordan with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. On Saturday, he reminded Americans that many U.S. troops are spending the holiday weekend far from their families.

"We know that their service makes it possible for us to live in freedom," Bush said.

He said the desire for freedom that led pilgrims to America still guides the nation today. "While they were only a shivering few, we are now a strong and growing nation of more than 300 million."

On Tuesday, Bush visited U.S. troops stationed at Hickam Air Force Base in Honolulu. He stopped there on his way back from a trip to Indonesia, Singapore and Vietnam.

"Our service members there have deployed around the world to fight the terrorists in Afghanistan and Iraq, conduct important maritime exercises in the Pacific, help deliver humanitarian aid to the victims of disaster and fight drug trafficking," Bush said.

He singled out Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y., who died after throwing himself on an enemy grenade, saving two of his fellow Marines in Iraq. The Medal of Honor -- the nation's highest decoration for valor -- will be given posthumously to Dunham, who died April 22, 2004, after an ambush near the Syrian border.

"This Thanksgiving, our thoughts and prayers are with his family and with all military families, especially those mourning the loss of a loved one," Bush said.

CIA Recruiting Comes Out Of The Shadows (WT/AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The Washington Times, November 26, 2006

The CIA scrapped a ho-hum test for steering job applicants toward mysterious careers, replacing it with one that's cloaked in jest.

Invisibility or ESP? Jet pack or amphibious sports car? Walk the Great Wall of China or sip champagne at a New York gala?

The results from the CIA's online personality quiz are just a few clicks away. Test-takers are diagnosed as daring thrill-seekers, thoughtful observers, curious adventurers, innovative pioneers or impressive masterminds.

The CIA wants to hire them all.

DOJ_NMG_0098137

The quiz (https://www.cia.gov/ careers/CIAMyths.html) was designed to encourage job applications while dispelling myths about the agency, some of them born of the James Bond stereotype.

For instance, the CIA wants applicants to know that no one who works there drives a sports car with machine guns in the tailpipes. Successful applicants will, in fact, see family and friends again.

Also, according to the quiz, "you don't have to know karate or look good in a tuxedo to work at the CIA."

All fun aside, the hiring push began almost immediately after the September 11 terrorist attacks. The effort picked up steam in November 2004, when President Bush called for a 50 percent increase in the agency's ranks of operatives and analysts.

The president wanted twice as many scientists whose research combats terrorism and the spread of weapons of mass destruction. The agency hopes to meet those goals by 2011.

One in seven of the CIA's current employees signed up in the past year, and nearly 40 percent began working after the September 11 attacks -- statistics at once helpful and troubling.

"This is the youngest analytic work force in the history of the Central Intelligence Agency," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden said at his confirmation hearings in May. "In more disappointing language, this is the least experienced analytic work force in the history of CIA."

The CIA stumbled as it stepped out of the shadows to recruit.

The agency rolled out black-and-white ads in 2002. Its television ads last year, aired during Washington Nationals baseball games, were so unassuming that fans might have thought their cable went out for 30 seconds if they headed to the kitchen for a snack.

Officials in charge of hiring realized they needed a new plan. They hired an ad agency, TMP Worldwide.

The "Bug Spot" was born. A snooping dragonfly zooms through the ad, showing how scientists at the CIA's Directorate of Science and Technology develop Bond-esque devices -- "technology so advanced, it's classified," the ad boasts.

The ad debuted on the Discovery Channel. The agency shortly received 3,500 resumes from applicants who said they had seen the spot.

An ad for the National Clandestine Service, the agency's secret operatives, followed.

Now, the CIA is revamping its Web site. It is buying space on airport billboards and in movie trailers. It is taking out ads in publications from the Locksmith Ledger to Women's Wear Daily to Arab Times, seeking applicants who can crack locks, create disguises and speak polished Arabic. It is reaching out to soon-to-be retired military officers.

The CIA also created the updated personality quiz, with a disclaimer straight from the legal department: "The Myths Quiz is for educational entertainment purposes only. ... This quiz will not affect your ability to get a job with the CIA."

The lawyers have company in not taking the quiz lightly. Some of the CIA's traditionalists fear the agency is bruising proud, exclusive roots to meet the presidential directive. They worry that the CIA quiz and ads during "MythBusters" and other cable shows are too gimmicky.

In short, the traditionalists worry that the agency is sacrificing quality to get quantity. Last year alone, the CIA received 135,000 applications -- more than double the number before the September 11 attacks.

Tom McCluskey, the CIA's chief of hiring and employee development, heard the concerns firsthand at a recent gathering of the Florida chapter of the agency's retirees association.

"Some of the old-timers grumbled, 'Where's the mystique? Where is the aura of mystery around what we do?' " Mr. McCluskey said.

Meanwhile, Congress is watching the recruitment efforts. The incoming chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, has said one priority is investigating whether the CIA has the right workers in the right jobs and ensuring the CIA has enough employees who are fluent in Arabic and other crucial languages.

Even if Congress holds agency officials' feet to the fire in public, odds are it could help.

"We see spikes in applicants after bad stories," said Betsy Davis, deputy chief of the CIA's recruitment and advertising. "We see spikes in applicants after good stories."

DOJ_NMG_0098138

WAR NEWS:

Baghdad Braces For More Reprisals (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan, Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 -- In the aftermath of one of the deadliest spasms of violence, a new level of fear and foreboding has gripped Baghdad, fueled in part by sectarian text messages and Internet sites, deepening tensions in an already divided capital.

In interviews across Baghdad on Saturday, Sunnis and Shiites said they were preparing themselves for upheaval, both violent and psychological. They viewed the bombings that killed more than 200 people Thursday in the heart of Baghdad's Shiite Muslim community of Sadr City as a trigger for more reprisal killings.

"We feel our world has become narrow, and we are being squeezed," said Karar al-Zuheari, 31, a Shiite taxi driver. "We have no place to run."

Since those attacks, quasi-armies of residents in mixed and majority-Sunni Arab neighborhoods have formed to protect their streets. Sunni Web sites are offering advice on how to kill Shiite militiamen. College students and executives pace at their homes, clutching rifles and handguns around the clock. Iraqis are posting pleas on Internet message boards to buy extra ammunition and weapons.

Despite a government-imposed curfew, Iraqis described Shiite militiamen murdering Sunnis at checkpoints, controlling neighborhoods with impunity and conspiring with Iraq's majority-Shiite police force, which the Interior Ministry controls. Other Iraqis spoke of mortar shells raining on their mosques and gun battles outside their houses, deepening their mistrust of Iraq's security forces and elected politicians.

Over the past two days, warnings have spread through messages delivered to the cellphones of Sunni Muslims. In Arabic, they read:

"Very big armed groups are being formed in Sadr City, backed up by the Interior Ministry, to kill great numbers of the citizens of Baghdad once the curfew is lifted. Spread the word among our people."

It signed off: "A reliable source."

Yet amid the fear gripping this city of 7 million, there were also signs of Iraq's famous cohesiveness, even as the sectarian divide widened. In some mixed neighborhoods, Shiites provided shelter to Sunnis targeted by Shiite militiamen, even though they risked being branded as collaborators. Others took care of Sunni children or bought groceries for Sunni neighbors who feared walking to the local market.

Outside their houses, the revenge attacks raged on. Gunmen wearing Iraqi army uniforms rounded up 21 men, including a 12-year-old boy, from two Shiite homes in the village of Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad in Diyala province. On Saturday morning, their bodies were found, all handcuffed, blindfolded and shot to death, said Bahaa al-Sodani, a provincial police official. The attacks were in apparent retaliation for assaults by Shiite militiamen on Sunni mosques in Baghdad and Baqubah the previous day.An Informant's Nod

"This is taking a turn for the worse," Hussam Sammaraie, a Sunni Muslim cellphone company executive, said on Saturday.

Less than two hours after car bombs, mortar shells and missiles bombarded Sadr City on Thursday, Shiite militiamen had taken over a checkpoint in front of his house in the New Baghdad neighborhood. The gunmen, clutching AK-47 assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers, were members of the Mahdi Army, the militia run by Moqtada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric who controls Sadr City.

As Sammaraie watched from his front gate, two militiamen stopped a Sunni man who worked in an electrical shop. A local informant looked at him and nodded. Then one of the gunmen shot him dead and left. Two weeks ago, the electrician had complained loudly when Shiite gunmen attacked a nearby Sunni mosque.

Zuheari, Sammaraie's Shiite neighbor, also witnessed the killing. At that moment, he felt hatred for his own sect. "We don't accept this behavior from our own people," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0098139

Sammaraie also shook, not out of anger but fear. New Baghdad was once a mixed neighborhood, but its Sunni population has left in droves since February, when the bombing of a Shiite shrine in the town of Samarra set off waves of sectarian violence. Now Sammaraie and his family are the only Sunnis on his block.

A half-hour after the electrician was killed, police arrived to investigate. The militiamen who committed the crime came along.

"It was the same murderers -- I saw it with my own eyes," Sammaraie said.

Since Thursday, he said, he has stayed inside his home. He carries his AK-47 and 60 bullets everywhere, even to bed. "I hug my AK-47 more than my wife," Sammaraie said.

His two small daughters don't understand. His 14-year-old asked him why he carried a gun all the time. He replied: "Do you want your dad to get killed?"

At night, he heads to the roof of his house, a cup of coffee in one hand, his AK-47 in the other. From there, he scans the streets for militiamen.

But if his house gets attacked, he will turn to Zuheari for help. Zuheari said he can't forget when Sammaraie's relatives offered shelter to his family during the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Now it's his turn to return the favor. The men placed a ladder against a wall in Sammaraie's back yard. If Shiite militiamen appear, Sammaraie and 16 relatives will use it to climb over the wall and into Zuheari's home.

"If the Mahdi Army finds out we are supporting a Sunni, maybe they will turn against us," Zuheari said. "They will think we are collaborators. This is a big problem. We don't know what will happen. I have one AK-47. We cannot do anything."

Still, Zuheari warned Sammaraie on Friday when he received a text message from a Shiite friend in Sadr City saying that the "young people of the Mahdi Army have taken revenge on the Sunnis." Without revealing the message, "I told him he should move his family inside my house," Zuheari said.Defending the Neighborhood

Luaa Abdul Hade, 21, knew it was his job to protect his sisters and mother. So he grabbed the family's only gun -- an AK-47 -- and joined the approximately 300 young men who have formed a quasi-army to guard the neighborhood of Ghazaliya since violence erupted there on Thursday after the Sadr City bombings.

Since then, the full-time student has slept just four hours. The nights have been cold, but he makes do with a coat. People in the neighborhood cook meals for the guards. Some of the men go back home for rest. Others sleep at a nearby mosque. If any major attack takes place, the mosque will announce it.

"It's our neighborhood," Abdul Hade said. "If they want to attack us, we're going to go out and defend our neighborhood."

Abdul Hade said that he and the other men his age did not know how to defend the neighborhood, so residents with war experience became their advisers, telling them where to stand and what to do. Four or five young men stand on every street corner or roof. Older men guard their houses. They have blocked off entrances to the community with stones, branches and other materials.

In the meantime, Abdul Hade's three sisters and mother remain home, praying regularly and keeping themselves busy by surfing the Internet, talking to friends on the phone and watching TV. A mortar blast already destroyed one of their windows, so now they have blankets on the windows to prevent glass from flying around.

On Friday, gunmen in more than 40 cars drove into Ghazaliya to shoot at houses, he said. The neighborhood army shot back, until U.S. forces intervened. It happened again Saturday morning.

"If they came into our neighborhoods, what would they do with our families?" Abdul Hade said. He said he is not afraid to die to protect his family and home: "We do believe in destiny. We do believe in God."Recipe for Civil War

On the Iraq Rabita Web site, created for Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, is a big black square with red Arabic lettering.

It reads: "Defend Yourself."

Click on it and a message appears.

"The curfew will not affect the sectarian killing militias. The Americans will not rush to help you," it says. "The entire world around you is not concerned about what happens to you. The evil people want to pluck you off one by one. So rush to your weapons and defend yourselves and use this page to inform us of what's going on in your areas and launch rescue calls."

DOJ_NMG_0098140

On Saturday, the Web site displayed a recipe for civil war. It recommended protecting Sunni neighborhoods by "spreading snipers on the roof of buildings," planting roadside bombs at neighborhood entrances and distributing grenades. It advised "antitank missile holders" to make trenches and to attack the first and last vehicles of any convoy.

At the end were instructions for preparing ambushes by "attracting the enemy by using small cars as bait so they would chase them and be dragged to the killing zones.'"To Whom It May Concern'

In the Wihda district on Baghdad's southern outskirts, Haqi Ismaeil's brother called him at work Thursday to tell him not to come home. Their family, and 30 other Sunni families in the area, had received a letter that morning signed by something called "the punishment committee." It was addressed to Sunni extremists and loyalists of Saddam Hussein, but in fact it referred to all Sunnis.

"Warning, warning, to whom it may concern," it read. "The Wahhabis and Baathists and Saddamists, leave our country or we will punish you."

Their small Sunni enclave is surrounded by a large Shiite community. But the Sunni and Shiite families generally have gotten along. When they had problems, the Sunni families would invite local Mahdi Army representatives to dinner to smooth relations. It usually worked, Ismaeil said.

After the letters arrived, Shiite residents visited the Sunni families to offer them support. "They've become more like family to us," he said.

Heeding his brother's advice, Ismaeil, 24, spent Thursday night at a friend's car dealership outside Baghdad. He sneaked back to check on his family the next day, and does not intend to go back to work.

The family has one weapon, an AK-47, and it will remain next to Ismaeil's bed until the family can find another place to stay. But it won't be easy, he said. There are 11 of them living together.

The Mahdi Army has set up checkpoints across the town. "We are really terrified and living in horror," he said.A Rupture of Trust

On Palestine Street, Fehad Galib heard the rumors. The Mahdi Army had rounded up 150 young Sunni men like him and taken them to Jamila Market, the area in Sadr City where two of Thursday's car bombs exploded. Then they executed them. There was another rumor -- that the Interior Ministry was handing out police uniforms to the Mahdi Army.

That is why Galib was reluctant to allow his kid brothers to stay with Shiite neighbors his family has known for decades. "We don't have complete trust in them," said Galib, 21, a college student who carries an AK-47. His 17-year-old brother carries a Smith and Wesson handgun.

The family, he said, plans to move. "When they lift the curfew, we're going to move straight to Tikrit," Galib said, referring to ousted president Hussein's home town. "Maybe the next day the Mahdi Army may storm our house."

47 Sunni Militants Die In Iraq Gunfights (NYT)

By Kirk Semple, Omar Al-Neami

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 — At least 47 Sunni Arab insurgents were killed Saturday during long gun battles with Iraqi security forces in and around Baquba, the capital of Diyala Province, a police spokesman in Baquba said.

In the largest and deadliest fight, scores of insurgents, using assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, laid siege to several government buildings in the center of the city, according to the spokesman. At least 36 of the Sunni Arab insurgents were killed in that clash, which raged for about four hours, according to the official, who said he did not yet know if any Iraqi security forces had been wounded.

Gun battles also broke out in Buhruz, a predominantly Sunni village just south of Baquba, when gunmen assaulted the main police station from three directions using mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and assault rifles, the police spokesman in Baquba reported.

The gunmen began their attack using the cover of date palm orchards that surround the village and retreated after two hours of fighting, the official said. No immediate word of casualties on either side was available. After nightfall, clashes broke out between gunmen and Iraqi Army troops in the Al Tahrir neighborhood in Baquba, according to the police spokesman there. At least 11 insurgents were killed in the fighting, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0098141

An American military spokeswoman in Baghdad also said there had been an attack in Buhruz, but had no details, and she was unable to confirm the Iraqi accounts of other gun battles.

Diyala has been an increasingly bloody battleground between Sunni and Shiite death squads vying for sectarian domination. Shiite militiamen have recently mobilized there in large numbers in defense of its Shiite inhabitants against the Sunni Arab-led insurgency, which has long made the province a redoubt in its campaign to topple the Iraqi government and drive American forces out of the country. American officials have accused the province's police and military forces of siding with the Shiite militias.

The police in Baladruz, a rural village in Diyala, recovered the bullet-ridden corpses of 21 men who had been dragged from their homes by gunmen wearing Iraqi military uniforms and then abducted in pickup trucks, the Diyala police spokesman said. The men, all farmers, were from two extended Shiite families and were taken Friday evening from two neighboring houses in Baladruz, about 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, the police spokesman said. The motive for the attack remained unclear.

The Iraqi security forces have been accused of protecting sectarian death squads, though Iraqi officials have also contended that gunmen sometimes disguise themselves in military and police uniforms, which are readily available on the black market. Efforts to reach the spokesman for Iraq's Defense Ministry were unsuccessful.

The United Nations' special representative for Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, urged the Iraqi government on Saturday to stop the "cancer" of sectarianism from destroying the country and warned that a retributive cycle of violent revenge was "tearing apart the very political and social fabric of Iraq."

"No country could tolerate such a cancer in its body politic," Mr. Qazi said in a statement.

A series of car bombs killed more than 200 people in the Shiite enclave of Sadr City on Thursday and, in apparent retaliation, Shiite militiamen attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and Baquba on Friday. Four of the mosques were in the mixed Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriya, according to Iraqi officials.

But the United States military said on Saturday that Iraqi soldiers patrolling the Hurriya neighborhood found only one mosque that had been damaged during Friday's violence.

Relatively little violence was reported in Baghdad on Saturday amid a curfew that was imposed here on Thursday after the car bombings.

Shiite and Sunni militants traded volleys of mortar fire on Saturday evening. A mortar shell exploded in Hurriya, killing a woman and wounding three other people, an Interior Ministry official said, and at least one mortar round fell in Sadr City, wounding a woman.

Later in the evening, several mortar rounds landed in the Shiite neighborhood of Al Mustansiriya in eastern Baghdad, wounding seven people, according to the ministry official, and five mortar rounds exploded in the predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Ghazaliya, wounding five. At least 17 bodies with bullet holes in their heads were recovered in various places around the city, the official added.

Sheik Harith al-Dhari, the Sunni Arab leader who is under investigation by the Iraqi government for allegedly abetting the insurgency, accused the Shiite-led government of sectarian bias and of "trying to stir up the situation."

Speaking at a televised news conference in Cairo, Mr. Dhari called on other Arab countries, the Arab League and the United Nations "to withdraw their support for Iraq's government, otherwise there will be disaster in Iraq."

The United States military command reported that American forces killed 22 insurgents and an Iraqi civilian, and destroyed a bomb-making factory during several operations north of Baghdad on Saturday. A marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team Five died Friday from wounds sustained in fighting in Anbar Province, the military said.

The Iraqi government announced the partial lifting of the curfew in Baghdad to permit pedestrians in the streets beginning Sunday and said the airport would reopen on Monday.

21 Shiites Gunned Down In Front Of Families (CNN)

CNN.com, November 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098142

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Sunni gunmen stormed two Shiite homes in Diyala province overnight and slaughtered 21 men in front of their families, Diyala authorities said Saturday.

Also on Saturday, a suicide car bomber at a checkpoint northwest of Khalidiya in Anbar province killed two children, an adult and a U.S. Marine, the U.S. military said. Ten other people, including a coalition service member, were wounded.

The attacks add to the series of sectarian reprisals since Thursday's assault on the Baghdad Shiite enclave of Sadr City, considered the single worst attack in Iraq since the war began.

At least 200 people were killed and 250 wounded in that attack, which many balme on Sunni militants.

In response, officials have imposed a strict curfew and ban on traffic until Monday, and shut down Baghdad's airport, forcing Iraqi President Jalal Talabani on Saturday to postpone a trip to Iran.

He was to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to discuss ways Iran might help stabilize Iraq.

Vice President Dick Cheney was on his way back to Washington on Saturday after a daylong whirlwind meeting with Saudi Arabian King Abdullah.

They discussed developments in Iraq, Iran's growing influence in the region, the status of Hamas in Gaza, and Syria's influence in Lebanon's government, a Saudi adviser told CNN.

The political efforts come as a top Sunni leader urged the world community, including Arab nations, to help end the hostilities and rein in what he said was the Shiite-dominated government's backing of militias.

Hareth al-Dhari called the government "biased" and an "excellent sectarian government" and said that "what is going on in Iraq is a political crisis and not a sectarian crisis -- like some politicians like to say."

His group, the Association of Muslim Scholars, had swiftly condemned the Sadr City attack and sent "condolences to the martyrs," a reference to those killed. It called the bloodbath a "repeated scene to agitate sectarian sedition."

Al-Dhari's appeal, which was made in Egypt, came a day after anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's bloc threatened to withdraw support for Iraq's prime minister if a meeting with President Bush goes ahead as planned.

Since the Sadr City attack, enraged Shiites have retaliated by burning people to death and torching Sunni mosques, witnesses told CNN.

The violence threatens to bring Iraq to all-out civil warfare, a run-up toward chaos that has been escalating since February when a Shiite shrine was bombed in Samarra.

That shrine attack prompted Sunni-Shiite vendettas that have continued throughout the year.

On Saturday, mortar rounds landed on two houses in the northwestern Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriya, killing one person and wounding three others.

The Shiite majority neighborhood, which includes Sunnis, was also the scene of violence Friday, when Shiites attacked two Sunni mosques with rocket-propelled grenades and torched two other Sunni mosques.

Shiite militiamen are reported to have doused Sunnis with kerosene and burned them, while shooting at other people.

Mortar rounds also hit the Shiite district of Abu Dshir in southeastern Baghdad, wounding four people, and Sadr City on Saturday afternoon, wounding a woman.

Thirteen were wounded by mortar rounds in the neighborhood of Adhamiya, a Baghdad police official said Saturday.

Police on Saturday said they found 17 bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad neighborhoods, apparently killed in Sunni-Shiite fighting.

The U.S. military set up additional security checkpoints Saturday around Baghdad bases where Iraqi military operations are being conducted, he said.Insurgents targeted

The U.S. military said coalition forces killed 22 insurgents and launched three airstrikes on a bomb-making factory during two separate operations north of Iraq's capital Saturday.

In an operation conducted in Taji, 10 insurgents and a teenage boy were killed in a firefight.

In a written statement, the military said a pregnant woman was wounded and taken to a hospital for treatment. She is expected to be released Sunday.

Coalition forces said they found rocket-propelled grenades, machine guns, anti-aircraft weaponry, pipe bombs and more than 3,000 feet of detonation cord in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0098143

In another operation, the military said, coalition forces killed 12 insurgents in fighting north of Baghdad.

U.S. forces opened fire on a suspected militant traveling in an entourage of three vehicles when the vehicles would not stop.

The military also said the terrorist suspect makes bombs and channels foreign fighters into the northern Baghdad area. During the operation, the coalition approached three vehicles carrying the militant and his associates.

"Twelve armed terrorists ignored warning shots and attempted to maneuver on the ground force," a military statement said.

The coalition forces then opened fire on the vehicles and killed them.U.S. soldier dies

A U.S. Marine died Friday after being wounded in fighting in Anbar province, the U.S. military said Saturday.

The Marine was assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, and the death brings the number of U.S. troop deaths in the Iraq war to 2,867.

Seven military contractors have also died in the war.

Iraq Extends Curfew Amid Violence (BBC)

BBC.com, November 25, 2006

The Iraqi authorities have extended until Monday a curfew imposed on Baghdad in response to recent killings.

The measure was intended to prevent reprisals for bomb attacks on the Sadr City area which killed more than 200.

Violence continued across Iraq however, with 21 bodies found in a village north of Baghdad. US and Iraqi forces said more than 50 insurgents died in raids.

President Jalal Talabani has also had to postpone a much-anticipated trip to Iran, as Baghdad's airport is closed.

Mr Talabani had been due to meet Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for talks on Iraq's security situation.

A spokesman for Mr Talabani said he would travel when the airport re-opened.

Separately, US Vice-President Dick Cheney has arrived in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, for talks with King Abdullah on the situation in the Middle East, particularly Iraq.

Despite the heavy police presence in the capital, there were reports that the Shia Sadr City district had been hit by a barrage of mortars on Saturday, says the BBC's Andy Gallacher in Baghdad.

An Iraqi journalists living in the area said he had heard 12 explosions but there have been no immediate reports of casualties, our correspondent adds.

Moqtada Sadr's group is calling for US forces to leave The US military said the 22 insurgents killed by its forces had died in clashes to the north of Baghdad.

Ten insurgents died in a raid on a bomb-making factory in the town of Taji, it said, while a teenage boy was killed in the crossfire and a pregnant woman was wounded.

US forces said they had discovered caches of rocket-propelled grenades, machine guns, pipe bombs and anti-aircraft weapons in the area. These were later destroyed in an air strike.

In another incident, US forces said they had killed 12 insurgents in a convoy of cars that ignored warning shots.

Iraqi security services said they had killed more than 30 insurgents in a series of raids in Diyala province.

Earlier in the day, the bodies of 21 Iraqis were discovered in the same province, in a village about 80km (50 miles) north-east of Baghdad.

Police said gunmen had raided the homes of two Shia families, dragged out 21 males and shot them dead. It is thought the youngest victim was a 12-year-old boy.

In central Anbar province, a suicide car bomber attacked a checkpoint and killed three Iraqis, two of them children, and a US serviceman, the US military said.

Meanwhile, leading Sunni cleric Harith al-Dhari, head of Iraq's Association of Muslim Scholars, called on Saturday for Arab countries to withdraw their recognition of the Iraqi government.

Mr Dhari, who spoke in Cairo, faces questioning if he returns to Iraq for allegedly inciting sectarian violence.

Earlier this week, at least 230 people were killed in two days of violence in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0098144

Several blasts struck Sadr City in quick succession In one incident, gunmen attacked Hurriya, a Sunni Arab area of Baghdad, burning mosques and homes, and at least 30 people were reported killed.

The attacks were in apparent revenge for Thursday's bombings that killed more than 200 people in the Shia Sadr City district.

There is a real feeling that the situation is moving to the brink amid the cycle of attacks, says the BBC's David Loyn in Baghdad.

To add to the Iraqi government's woes, a key Shia group loyal to cleric Moqtada al-Sadr threatened to quit parliament and the cabinet if the prime minister goes ahead with a planned meeting with US President George W Bush next week.

The withdrawal of the group headed by Mr Sadr would deal a major blow to an already unstable government.

In a sermon on Friday, the young cleric appealed for Muslim unity, but also demanded that the leading religious figure from the Sunni minority issue a fatwa against al-Qaeda members.

Moqtada al-Sadr's Mehdi Army militia dominates the sprawling Sadr City slum in east Baghdad.

Thursday's multiple car bomb attacks in Sadr City - in which 250 people were also wounded - were the deadliest in Iraq since the US-led invasion of 2003.

Iraqi Clerics Call For End To Hostilities (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — Shiite and Sunni clerics, among the last vestige of authority in a country rapidly losing faith in politicians, charged Saturday that Iraq's plight was the result of U.S. mistakes and pleaded with their faithful to stem the bloodshed that followed a devastating attack on a mainly Shiite Baghdad neighborhood.

In interviews Saturday and in recent sermons, clerics articulated one message that appears to be gaining traction on both sides of Iraq's civil war: The U.S. presence is making matters worse, and the Americans should go home.

"The roots of our problems lie in the mistakes of the Americans committed right from the beginning of their occupation," said Sheik Ali Merza, a Shiite cleric in Najaf who is a leader of the Islamic Dawa Party.

Iraq's most prominent Sunni cleric expressed a similar viewpoint. At a Cairo news conference, Harith Dhari demanded that American troops withdraw.

"Since the beginning, the U.S. occupation drove Iraq from bad to worse," said Dhari, who became a fugitive this month after the Shiite-led government issued a warrant for his arrest on allegations that he has supported terrorism.

The increased focus by the clerics on the U.S. presence in Iraq comes as U.S. officials review a broad range of options to address the increasing violence and dwindling domestic support for the war. Options range from a short-term increase in the number of troops — which stands at 144,000 — to a phased withdrawal.

Vice President Dick Cheney made a quick visit Saturday to Saudi Arabia, a neighbor of Iraq and a regional power. Saudi Arabia also is a source of funds for Sunni Arab insurgents in Iraq.

President Bush is scheduled to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in Jordan this week.

The clerics appealed for an end to retaliatory killings and kidnappings in the wake of a series of bombings Thursday in the Sadr City neighborhood of Baghdad that killed more than 200 people.

"The explosions we are witnessing and this series of attacks and killings only aim at triggering a sectarian war, which neither Shiites nor Sunnis will win," Sheik Abdul Aziz Mohammed, a Shiite cleric in Kirkuk, said in his most recent sermon. "The prophet Muhammad said religious strife is dead, and condemned anyone who attempts to resurrect it."

Khalil Maliki, a Shiite cleric based in the southern port city of Basra, also blamed the United States.

"We have all concluded that the primary party responsible for all these massacres is the American occupation," said Maliki, a representative of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Most here expect Iraq's civil war to deepen as the government lifts curfew restrictions today, and it is unclear whether the clerics' appeals for calm are being heard.

DOJ_NMG_0098145

Some prominent religious and political leaders accuse the U.S. military of conspiring with their enemies. Sunni Arabs say U.S. troops are raiding their communities in coordination with Shiite militias.

And Shiites say that U.S. forces are working with Sunni terrorist groups to conduct strikes such as the devastating car bomb barrage in Sadr City.

U.S. troops seeking a missing American serviceman believed to be held by Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia raided Sadr City only hours before Thursday's insurgent car bomb attack. Some Shiite clerics and politicians cited those raids as evidence of American involvement in the attack.

"Recently, it has become obvious that there is cooperation between the occupation forces, Al Qaeda and the Baathists," said Sahib Amry, a Sadr representative in Najaf.

Although U.S. military officials acknowledge that they have increased attacks in Shiite areas in Baghdad in pursuit of Army Spc. Ahmed Qusai Taei, they dismiss the conspiracy theories as ridiculous. But the fact that so many influential Iraqis find them credible complicates U.S. efforts to stop the bloodletting.

Sadr, whose representatives make up a key element in Maliki's Shiite coalition, threatened Friday to stage a walkout and bring down the government if Maliki went ahead with his meeting with Bush. U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday that there were no plans to cancel the meeting.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani canceled a trip to Tehran today, where he had planned to discuss an Iranian proposal for a three-way summit with Syria.

Reports emerged Saturday that Sunni Arab gunmen, using tactics usually attributed to Shiite militiamen, donned Iraqi army uniforms and kidnapped 21 men from a Shiite neighborhood in Balad Ruz, about 45 miles northeast of Baghdad. Police later found their corpses. Eleven of the dead were men from the same family.

In west Baghdad, where most of Friday's sectarian fighting took place, at least two dozen mortar shells pounded a single block in the Sunni Arab-dominated Ghazaliya neighborhood, where residents remained inside their concrete and brick houses. One person was killed.

After the mortar barrage, U.S. forces swept into the neighborhood and arrested at least 10 people, a resident said.

Projectiles also hit Sadr City and the neighborhood of Mustansiriya, crashing into a house and an open-air market; 14 people were injured.

The U.S. military announced that it had killed 22 suspected insurgents in the north Baghdad area in three separate incidents, which included an airstrike on a suspected bomb construction site.

A pregnant woman and a male teenager were injured in one fight, the military said.

"It is always a shame when terrorists hide among civilian women and children, putting them in harm's way," the military said in a statement.

Police in Baghdad found 17 bodies, all of them stripped of identification papers and riddled with bullet holes.

In Baqubah, gun battles between Iraqi police and suspected insurgents left at least 30 dead.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, Iraqi police said they had killed two insurgents who were attempting to plant a bomb, and that four police officers were injured by a roadside explosive.

The U.S. military announced that a Marine was killed by enemy fire in the western province of Al Anbar.

Many Iraqis said they expected violence to increase in the coming days.

"I don't think these attacks against Sadr City will be the last," said Diyadhin Fayadh, a Shiite cleric in Baghdad. "There will be more explosions."

"What happened in Sadr City is a very grave development, and I think the real reaction to it has not started yet," said Adnan Abo-Shabbot, 52, a Najaf supermarket owner. "I think that Baghdad will become an open battlefield. The worst is yet to come."

"The clerics and political leaders are insisting that people must be quiet and patient, because the consequences will be dire if the Muslim is killing his brother," said Ibrahim Hassan, 26, an engineering student in Sadr City. "But if someone loses two or three family members, he will never stay peaceful. Nobody can stop him. Not the clerics nor the politicians."

Learning From Iraq (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0098146

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

While politicians from both parties spin out their versions of Iraqs that should have been, could have been and just maybe still might be, the Army has taken on a far more useful project: figuring out why the Bush administration's military plans worked out so badly and drawing lessons for future conflicts.

That effort is a welcome sign that despite six years of ideologically driven dictates from Donald Rumsfeld's Pentagon, Army leaders remain usefully focused on the real world, where actual soldiers daily put their lives on the line for their country and where the quality of military planning goes a long way toward determining whether their sacrifices help achieve America's national purposes.

Two hopeful examples are the latest draft of a new Army field manual that will be taught to officers at all levels beginning next year and a series of oral history interviews conducted with Iraqi and American officers involved in the disappointing efforts to establish and train Iraqi security forces. Last week, The Los Angeles Times published details of some of the major changes being incorporated into the new field manual, while The Washington Post reported on some of the lessons learned in the Iraqi training programs.

The field manual, the Army's basic guidebook for war, peacekeeping and counterinsurgency, quietly jettisons the single most disastrous innovation of the Rumsfeld era. That is the misconceived notion that the size and composition of an American intervention force should be based only on what is needed to defeat the organized armed forces of an enemy government, instead of also taking into account the needs of providing security and stability for the civilian population for which the United States will then be responsible.

Almost every post-invasion problem in Iraq can be directly traced to this one catastrophic planning failure, which left too few troops in Iraq to prevent rampant looting, restore basic services and move decisively against the insurgency before it took root and spread.

Modern innovations in warfare make it possible for America's technologically proficient forces to vanquish an opposing army quickly and with relatively few troops. But re-establishing order in a defeated, decapitated society demands a much larger force for a much longer time.

The new field manual will rightly call for stabilization efforts to start as soon as American troops arrive. And it will legally require American field commanders to request sufficient forces to successfully carry out these stability operations. That should short-circuit future debates about whether Pentagon policy makers are providing all the troops that the generals on the spot honestly feel they need.

Correcting deficiencies in American military training is also essential, since the biggest reason the United States has not been able to withdraw significant numbers of its own troops over the past three years has been the lack of adequately prepared and reliable Iraqi security forces.

Iraqi officers interviewed for the oral history complained that their American trainers were often junior officers without combat experience. American officers expressed unhappiness about how their own training teams had been selected and prepared. One major tellingly remarked that "I went there with the wrong attitude and I thought I understood Iraq and the history because I had seen PowerPoint slides, but I really didn't."

These are useful insights. But they can only go so far when a host government lacks the will to rid its security forces of sectarian militia fighters more intent on waging civil war than achieving national stability. That so far has been the biggest obstacle in Iraq.

Transforming American forces to fight 21st-century conflicts was the ubiquitous but largely empty slogan of the Rumsfeld era. Incorporating the hard lessons learned in Iraq into future military planning and training operations would constitute a far more practical variety of transformation.

In Search Of The Fixers (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD

DOJ_NMG_0098147

ARMED militias are stalking the streets of Iraq's cities and towns, but that only begins to describe the problem that the United States faces here. As the violence on those streets increases, there seem to be more and more militias or armed gangs — smaller and more loosely controlled fragments of armed groups — than ever before, and in many ways that is the most serious part of the picture. It would be far easier for the United States if these groups, no matter how antagonistic they are to the Americans, had stuck together; then, at least, they could negotiate, make binding agreements and help knit together a nation.

In America, generals, congressmen and commentators across the political spectrum are embroiled in a debate over troop levels and exit timetables. But if the United States seeks to establish stability so its troops can leave, it must answer the question: whom does it talk to?

Which Sunni and Shiite militias, armed tribal groups and even criminal gangs need to be fought? Which can be bargained with? Which are potential allies as the United States seeks to break the increasingly chaotic cycles of attack, revenge and rivalry for turf and spoils?

Last week, it was Sunni militiamen who staged deadly attacks on the Shiite-led Health Ministry and Sadr City, presumably in retaliation for a mass kidnapping from the Sunni-dominated Higher Education Ministry the week before. Those kidnappings, in turn, were carried out by men in official uniforms who were thought to be Shiite militiamen who had infiltrated the army and police force. But, as always, it was unclear which militia was responsible, or whether the kidnappers were from a breakaway group.

The largest Shiite militia, led by Moktada al-Sadr and called the Mahdi Army, has been widely reported to be splintering. But there is also a growing profusion of other groups: in addition to longstanding rival Shiite militias like the Iranian-trained Badr Organization and the Fadhila militia, both of which are powerful in the south, there are Sunni fighters attached to tribal leaders, ex-Baathists or Al Qaeda cells; Iraqi private security contractors; quasi-government militias originally assembled to guard oil pipelines and power lines; criminal gangs; and neighborhood watch groups.

For the Americans, the disintegration of order has complicated any effort to deal with the armed groups, said Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director of the International Crisis Group, an organization of experts on dealing with conflicts that is formulating its own last-ditch plan to salvage peace in Iraq. "Now you have purveyors of violence that are completely independent of everyone else," Mr. Hiltermann said.

With one or two exceptions, he added, the politicians who nominally head some of the larger militias that are now splintering "don't control anything."

The most violent militia is the Mahdi Army, led by Mr. Sadr. Recent conversations with American military commanders in Iraq indicate that the United States ultimately may have to attempt to disarm it in its base in Baghdad — and it will be some time, if ever, before Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who needs Mr. Sadr's support in Parliament, will be a willing partner.

But because there have been so many reports that freelance commanders have broken away from Mr. Sadr's group and are operating on their own, carrying out their own kidnappings, executions and paramilitary operations, the impact of such an operation is difficult to calculate. For one thing, nobody knows exactly how much Mr. Sadr controls his group. For another, nobody knows to what extent commanders who have seemed to operate on their own might retain loyalty to Mr. Sadr in a major fight.

Some American commanders believe that Mr. Sadr retains influence over some groups he has declared to be renegades. If that were the case, the splinter groups would be functioning like the Salvadoran death squads of the 1980s; those operated quasi-independently and gave their government a measure of deniability even when it almost certainly had ordered killings.

If a similar situation applies here, it could lend credence to the arguments of American commanders who believe that the United States military may ultimately have to go in force to Mr. Sadr's base of power, a place where it has trod lightly for the past three years, in order to disarm militiamen who remain defiant. Mr. Sadr's base is a northeastern Baghdad slum populated with two million Shiite Arabs and named after his father.

But Iraqis mostly believe that such a step would be folly because it could inflame Shiites in general. No matter how unruly the groups in the Mahdi Army have or have not become, this argument goes, Mr. Sadr's own popularity, as well as the number of men in the Mahdi Army, has soared throughout Baghdad and the south as the American military has worn out its welcome.

"This is actually very dangerous," said Qasim Daoud, a former Iraqi national security advisor who is now a member of Parliament representing the southern holy city of Najaf. "It will go to a flare-up of the whole southern area."

DOJ_NMG_0098148

The roots of the problem with independent armed groups in Iraq trace back to when the United States invaded the country with the help of a strategically placed militia: the fighters who were loyal to two Kurdish clans in the north. In the aftermath, the United States had little appetite for disarming the Kurds, especially since their fighters are under the firm control of their leaders.

Less well known is that before the invasion, the United States also cozied up to some of the Shiite militias, who were then expatriates, with promises that they would not be immediately disbanded if they returned to Iraq, said Amatzia Baram, director of the Ezri Center of Iran and Gulf Studies at the University of Haifa in Israel. Before the invasion, when he was a scholar based in Washington, he warned of the dangers of letting the militias keep their arms.

The problem, Mr. Baram said, was that the most powerful of those groups, the Badr Organization, never really returned the warmth. The Badr leadership, Mr. Baram said, "never wanted to be engaged more than, 'Yes, when you kick Saddam out, we will be there.' They were very standoffish."

With those precedents, the United States had little standing to disarm the other militias after the invasion, and they gained steadily in power.

There is, however, a temptation for American officials to see the possibility of working with some armed groups, even today. Travels with American military units and a reading of recent embassy initiatives in Iraq indicate that along with preparations for potential military activity against the Mahdi Army, the United States is stepping up efforts to identify militias associated with Iraqi tribes, political parties, geographic regions and even insurgent groups — to placate and co-opt those they can, and even play some off against each other.

In an indication of that strategy, some local American field commanders now give snap analyses of differences between the Janabi, Juburi and Duleimi tribes, an arresting shift from the early days of the conflict when words like those would have drawn blank stares in an American Humvee rumbling through the desert.

Such efforts have sometimes seemed promising. In September, 25 tribes in the Sunni-dominated Anbar province agreed to cooperate militarily in order to combat the local influence of Al Qaeda. But so far, that agreement seems to have had little influence on security; American and Iraqi troops continue to die at a disheartening rate in Anbar.

Looking forward, Representative Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee in January, says the cultural importance of guns in Iraqi society, combined with the practical need for Iraqis to protect themselves, makes it all but impossible for the prime minister to disarm the militias, despite his pledges to do so.

"I don't know how he's going to do it," Mr. Skelton said.

Mr. Daoud, the former security adviser, said that a better strategy would be to absorb militias loyal to the elected government into the official armed forces and give the rest jobs under the civilian government if they take appropriate training courses.

"I prefer, really, to make a sort of evaluation of each single person," Mr. Daoud said.

That approach, which would amount to absorbing many of the militias into the government, may bring less order than hoped, said Marina Ottaway, director of the Middle East program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

"The question is not whether the militias can rule much of the country, which I don't think they can," Ms. Ottaway said. "The question is whether they can make it impossible for anyone else to rule the country."

Long After We Withdraw (NYT)

By David Rieff

The New York Times Magazine, November 26, 2006

As the situation in Iraq continues to deteriorate and as policy makers debate how to extricate the United States honorably from what increasingly appears a war without end, it is worth remembering that all wars do end eventually, and that postwar relationships between the bitterest of enemies can turn out surprisingly well. President Bush's recent trip to Vietnam, where he attended the annual meeting of APEC — the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation organization — illustrates this reality and even offers a measure of hope at a time when battlefront reports are almost unrelievedly bad and when America's foreign policy seems to lurch from crisis to crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0098149

It often seems as if the U.S. presence in Iraq has created so many new enemies in the Muslim world that the clash of civilizations described by Prof. Samuel Huntington has gone from being the hypothesis of a Harvard political scientist to a historical inevitability. Even many of those who resist the notion that Islam and the West are on a collision course still worry that the harm that has been done in Iraq to relations between the U.S. and the Islamic world will be almost impossible to undo.

And yet the example of Vietnam suggests otherwise. If anything, the trauma of the Vietnam War on the American psyche was and for some still is far deeper than anything the Iraq war has yet produced. These days we speak — probably too glibly — of an America almost evenly divided between so-called red and blue states. But for anyone who remembers what this country was like during the Vietnam era and in its immediate aftermath, these contemporary divisions seem rather shallow. Vietnam truly split the country and brought millions of people into the streets against their own government. People died protesting the Vietnam War on campuses like Kent State. On the battlefield, there was also tremendous savagery. Think of the C.I.A.-run Phoenix program of targeted assassination or the systematic torture of American prisoners of war by the North Vietnamese.

Nevertheless, 30 years after the end of a war that left Vietnam in ruins and America in turmoil and confusion, the issues left over — accounting for the missing in action, reuniting families and even paying compensation for Agent Orange-induced maladies — are far less central to U.S.-Vietnamese relations than issues of trade and investment. America is now Vietnam's leading trading partner, and Intel has just announced the expansion of its factory near Ho Chi Minh City. While Congress dealt a temporary setback to President Bush's efforts to promote trade with Vietnam, few doubt that such efforts will succeed. As Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, has put it, Vietnam is "reforming" and "booming." (Of course, he might have added that it is hardly a paragon of human rights.)

Remarkably, President Bush's cordial reception to Prime Minister Phan Van Khai in 2005 was accepted with little protest except from small groups of Vietnamese-Americans. On the Vietnamese side, the dour commissars who fought the French and then the Americans, at the cost of more than a million of their own dead — "born in the North, die in the South" was a well-known saying in the North Vietnamese Army at the time — have given way to proud capitalists who, despite their Communist affiliations, are far more interested in deepening trade relations with America and in warding off their historic rival China than in pulling the scabs off old wounds.

Is there a lesson here for Iraq? The answer is that, in fact, there are many. The first, and perhaps the most important, is that history is not predictable and even the most deep-seated enmities can evaporate over time when the conditions are right. As President Bush himself said when he was in Hanoi last week: "History has a long march to it. Societies change, and relationships can constantly be altered to the good." There is no iron law of history that says that the bad relations between America and the Islamic world, and even between the United States and radical Shiite groups like the one led by the militant cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, are fated to continue this way indefinitely and immutably. Nor is there any reason to believe that an American withdrawal from Iraq will harm these relations any more than the U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam permanently damaged U.S.-Vietnamese relations.

After the searing experience of Iraq, few among us believe that outsiders can impose democracy at the point of a gun. Nations and peoples simply have to find their own way. Of course, it is crucial not to romanticize this process. For the Vietnamese, the first decade after the fall of Saigon in 1975 was an appalling one — an era of mass repression and mass hunger. It is entirely possible, likely even, that in Iraq the situation will get considerably worse after a U.S. withdrawal, as it did in Vietnam. To put it starkly, however, the effort to foster democracy in Iraq has failed, and with that failure, short-term suffering may have to be the price of long-term coexistence. Is this perspective harsh to the point of cruelty? Perhaps. But it may be a necessary and sober one as well.

No one in his right mind should imagine a rosy future for Iraq — regardless of whether American commanders choose to preserve the status quo, start withdrawing or even add more troops to try a "final push" this spring. But again, all wars do end eventually. And in their aftermath, in the peace that follows, possibilities arise that seem almost unimaginable as people lie bleeding. It is conceivable that 30 years from now, one of President Bush's successors will travel to Baghdad not for crisis meetings in the Green Zone or to serve Thanksgiving turkey to the troops but to talk about peacetime matters like trade, tourism and the environment. Yet given America's inability to guarantee the security of ordinary Iraqis after an occupation that has lasted almost as long as our participation in World War II, it is possible to speculate that the sooner American forces leave Iraq, the sooner such a trip is likely to happen.

DOJ_NMG_0098150

The Way To Win A Guerrilla War (WP)

By T.X. Hammes

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

In all the barrels of ink being spilled in the argument over whether the United States can or can't possibly win the war against the insurgency in Iraq, one critical aspect is often overlooked: how the nature of insurgency has changed over the past few decades, and what that means for the counterinsurgent.

Insurgencies are still based on Mao Zedong's fundamental precept that superior political will, properly employed, can defeat greater economic and military power. Because insurgents organize to ensure political rather than military success, an opponent cannot defeat them with military force alone. But complicating our problem today is the fact that insurgencies are no longer the unified, hierarchical organizations that the Chinese, and later the Vietnamese, developed from the 1920s to the 1960s. Rather, they are loose coalitions unified only by the desire to drive out an outside power. All elements of the insurgency know that when the outside power is gone, they will fight a civil war to resolve their differences. Learning to adjust is the key to success in counterinsurgency. Conventional military weakness forces insurgents to be adaptable, so defeating them requires coherent, patient action -- encompassing a range of political, economic, social and military activities -- that can only be executed by a team drawn from all parts of government. You don't outfight the insurgent. You outgovern him.

This was one of the real sources of frustration during my brief tour of duty in Iraq in 2004. The United States had clearly failed to learn from previous insurgencies. We were focused on killing insurgents rather than providing security and governance. Fortunately, we're now showing signs of learning -- thanks to some smart people who are both practitioners and students of counterinsurgency.

Any study of modern insurgency has to start with Mao. The communist leader who defeated China's nationalist forces not only succeeded as an insurgent but also wrote about how he won. "On Guerrilla Warfare " is a how-to guide for insurgent leaders that has been quoted by nearly every insurgent strategist since, including al-Qaeda's. The best translation is by Marine Brig. Gen. Samuel B. Griffith, whose fluency in Chinese and extensive travel in China during its civil war enabled him to provide unique insights into Mao's work.

No American discussion of insurgency could ignore Vietnam. Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap's "People's War, People's Army" is still the basic reference on the North Vietnamese view of the war and an illustration of how warfare continually changes. While Mao was able to confront his opponent on the Chinese mainland, Ho Chi Minh and Giap had to defeat the French and the Americans without ever being able to threaten their home bases. They expanded on Mao's concept by using the media and peace activists to convince the American people that we couldn't win the war. They won not by defeating our armed forces but by breaking our political will.

In the 30 years since the fall of Saigon, insurgency has continued to evolve. For an up-to-date overview, National Defense University professor Bard O'Neill's "Insurgency and Terrorism: From Revolution to Apocalypse," published in 2005, is hard to beat.

Counterinsurgency is a very different animal. Insurgents practice the art of destruction, which is easy; counterinsurgents have the far more difficult task of creating a functioning government. Written in 1964, David Galula's "Counterinsurgency Warfare: Theory and Practice" is still one of the best books to make this case. Galula, who was a French army officer during World War II and later in Indochina and Algeria, makes it clear that counterinsurgency is not about killing insurgents but about providing security and the hope for a better future. If a government can't give its people both, the insurgents will overthrow it.

"Learning to Eat Soup with a Knife: Counterinsurgency Lessons from Malaya and Vietnam," by Lt. Col. John Nagl, is a comparison between the British experience in Malaya from 1948 to 1960 and the U.S. experience in Vietnam. The British army, Nagl says, managed to created a "learning institution" that was able to understand the type of war it was in and adjust accordingly. In contrast, the U.S. Army in Vietnam kept trying to apply conventional warfare doctrine to an unconventional war. By the time it finally did adjust, it was too late.

DOJ_NMG_0098151

Journal articles offer another rich vein of enlightenment on the conduct of counterinsurgency. In "Best Practices in Counterinsurgency," in the May-June 2005 issue of Military Review, Kalev I. Sepp, a former Special Forces officer and now professor at the Naval Postgraduate School, studied 51 recent counterinsurgencies to develop a list of 12 "best practices" common to all successful ones, and nine "worst practices" of the unsuccessful ones. Sadly, in Iraq, the United States scores below 50 percent on the first and above 50 percent on the second.

David Kilcullen's "Counterinsurgency Redux" appears in the current issue of Survival. I've found it the best discussion of insurgency's evolution from classical Maoist to the modern transnational, multilateral "coalitions of the willing" that challenge the United States today. "In modern counter-insurgency," Kilcullen writes, "the security force must control a complex 'conflict ecosystem' -- rather than defeating a single specific insurgent adversary." This is a long way from the monolithic organizations Galula fought.

Two important articles are written from the unique perspective of a senior military officer fighting an active counterinsurgency. In "Challenges in Fighting a Global Insurgency," in the summer 2006 issue of Parameters, Lt. Gen. David W. Barno, commander of U.S. and Coalition forces in Afghanistan from October 2003 to April 2005, highlights the insurgents' ability to think in terms of 25-year wars. "The Americans may have all the wristwatches," he quotes the Taliban reminding villagers, "but we have all the time." And in his influential "Winning the Peace: The Requirement for Full-Spectrum Operations" in the July-August 2005 Military Review, Maj. Gen. Peter Chiarelli describes how his division in Baghdad not only had to conduct combat operations but also train Iraqi security forces, provide essential services, promote Iraqi efforts to establish an effective government and foster economic competition in what had been a controlled economy.

All these sources influenced the new Army/Marine Corps Field Manual 3-24, "Counterinsurgency." Posted on the Internet in draft form, it updates the badly outdated doctrine based on U.S. experiences in the 1960s, offering thought-provoking observations such as "The best weapons for counterinsurgency do not shoot bullets" and "The more force you use, the less effective you are." It's already influencing both how the military is fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and how it is preparing for future wars.

If you're not inclined to read an Army field manual, three notable movies provide an insight into at least one aspect of counterinsurgency. David Lean's 1962 epic "Lawrence of Arabia," based on T.E. Lawrence's experiences in the Arab World War I uprising against the Turks, illustrates how hard it is for an outsider to understand another culture well enough to advise effectively. The 1966 classic "Battle of Algiers" shows how French brutality lost the war in Algeria. And 1993's "In the Name of the Father" reinforces that message, showing how "aggressive interrogation" techniques came back to haunt the British in their campaign against the Irish Republican Army -- a valuable insight for those trying to win these most difficult of wars.

T. X. Hammes, a retired Marine colonel, is author of "The Sling and the Stone: On War in the 21st Century" (Zenith Press).

U.S. Finds Iraq Insurgency Has Funds To Sustain Itself (NYT)

By John F. Burns, Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 — The insurgency in Iraq is now self-sustaining financially, raising tens of millions of dollars a year from oil smuggling, kidnapping, counterfeiting, connivance by corrupt Islamic charities and other crimes that the Iraqi government and its American patrons have been largely unable to prevent, a classified United States government report has concluded.

The report, obtained by The New York Times, estimates that groups responsible for many insurgent and terrorist attacks are raising $70 million to $200 million a year from illegal activities. It says $25 million to $100 million of that comes from oil smuggling and other criminal activity involving the state-owned oil industry, aided by “corrupt and complicit” Iraqi officials.

As much as $36 million a year comes from ransoms paid for hundreds of kidnap victims, the report says. It estimates that unnamed foreign governments — previously identified by American officials as including France and Italy — paid $30 million in ransom last year.

A copy of the seven-page report was made available to The Times by American officials who said the findings could improve understanding of the challenges the United States faces in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0098152

The report offers little hope that much can be done, at least soon, to choke off insurgent revenues. For one thing, it acknowledges how little the American authorities in Iraq know — three and a half years after the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein — about crucial aspects of insurgent operations. For another, it paints an almost despairing picture of the Iraqi government's ability, or willingness, to take steps to tamp down the insurgency's financing.

"If accurate," the report says, its estimates indicate that these "sources of terrorist and insurgent finance within Iraq — independent of foreign sources — are currently sufficient to sustain the groups' existence and operation." To this, it adds what may be its most surprising conclusion: "In fact, if recent revenue and expense estimates are correct, terrorist and insurgent groups in Iraq may have surplus funds with which to support other terrorist organizations outside of Iraq."

Some terrorism experts outside the government who were given an outline of the report by The Times criticized it as imprecise and speculative. Completed in June, the report was compiled by an interagency working group investigating the financing of militant groups in Iraq.

A Bush administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, confirmed the group's existence. He said it was led by Juan Zarate, deputy national security adviser for combating terrorism, and was made up of about a dozen people, drawn from the C.I.A., the F.B.I., the Defense Intelligence Agency, the State Department, the Treasury Department and the United States Central Command.

The group's estimate of the financing for the insurgency, even taking the higher figure of $200 million, underscores the David and Goliath nature of the war. American, Iraqi and other coalition forces are fighting an array of shadowy Sunni and Shiite groups that can draw on huge armories left over from Mr. Hussein's days, and benefit from the willingness of many insurgents to fight with little or no pay. If the $200 million a year estimate is close to the mark, it amounts to less than what it costs the Pentagon, with an $8 billion monthly budget for Iraq, to sustain the American war effort here for a single day.

But other estimates suggest the sums involved could be far higher. The oil ministry in Baghdad, for example, estimated earlier this year that 10 percent to 30 percent of the $4 billion to $5 billion in fuel imported for public consumption in 2005 was smuggled back out of the country for resale. At that time, the finance minister estimated that close to half of all smuggling profits was going to insurgents. If true, that would be $200 million or more from fuel smuggling alone.

For Washington, the report's most dismaying finding may be that the insurgency now survives off money generated from activities inside Iraq, and no longer depends on sums Mr. Hussein and his associates seized as his government collapsed. American officials said that as American troops entered Baghdad, Mr. Hussein's oldest son, Qusay, took more than $1 billion in cash from the Central Bank of Iraq and stashed it in steel trunks aboard a flatbed truck. Large sums of cash were found in Mr. Hussein's briefcase when he was captured in December 2003.

But the report says Mr. Hussein's loyalists "are no longer a major source of funding for terrorist or insurgent groups in Iraq." Part of the reason, the report says, is that an American-led international effort has frozen $3.6 billion in "former regime assets." Another reason, it says, is that Mr. Hussein's erstwhile loyalists, realizing that "it is increasingly obvious that a Baathist regime will not regain power in Iraq," have turned increasingly to spending the money on their own living expenses. The trail to these assets "has grown cold," the report adds.

The document says the pattern of insurgent financing changed after the first 18 months of the war, from the Hussein loyalists who financed it in 2003 to "foreign fighters and couriers" smuggling cash in bulk across Iraq's porous borders in 2004, to the present reliance on a complex array of indigenous sources. "Currently, we assess that these groups garner most of their funding from petroleum-related criminal activity, kidnapping and other criminal pursuits within Iraq," the report concludes.

One section of the report is dedicated to the role played by "sympathetic donors," including Islamic charities and nongovernmental organizations. It says that "intelligence reporting" indicates that only 10 to 15 of the 4,000 nongovernmental groups support terrorist and insurgent groups, but that those few take advantage of lax Iraqi regulation to divert funds to insurgent and other armed groups and, in some cases, "to provide cover for insurgent recruitment and the transport of weapons and personnel."

The possibility that Iraq-based terrorist groups could finance attacks outside Iraq appeared to echo Bush administration assertions that prevailing in the war here is essential to preventing Iraq from becoming a terrorist haven, as Afghanistan became under the Taliban. But that suggestion was one of several aspects of the report that drew criticism from Western terrorism and counterinsurgency experts working outside the government who were given the outline of the findings.

DOJ_NMG_0098153

While noting that the report appeared to reflect a major effort by the administration to learn more about the murky world of insurgent financing in Iraq, the experts said the seven-page document appeared to be speculative, at least in its estimates of the funds available to the insurgent and terror groups. They noted the wide spread of the estimates, particularly the $70 million to $200 million figure for overall financing, the report's failure to specify which groups the estimates covered and the absence of documentation of how authors had arrived at their estimates.

While such data may have been omitted to protect the group's clandestine sources and methods — the document has a bold heading on the front page saying "secret" and a warning that it is not to be shared with foreign governments — several security and intelligence consultants said in telephone interviews that the vagueness of the estimates reflected how little American intelligence agencies knew about the opaque and complex world of Iraq's militant groups.

"They're just guessing," said W. Patrick Lang, a former chief of Middle East intelligence at the Defense Intelligence Agency, who now runs a security and intelligence consultancy. "They really have no idea." He added, "They've been very unsuccessful in penetrating these organizations." He said he was equally skeptical about the report's assertion that the insurgent and militant groups may have surpluses to finance terrorism outside Iraq. "That's another guess," he said.

"A judgment like that, coming from an N.S.C.-generated document," he said, is not an analytical assessment as much as it is a political statement to support the administration's contention that Iraq is a central front in the war on terrorism. "It's a statement put in there to support a policy judgment," he said.

Several analysts said that, except for the possibility that Al Qaeda of Mesopotamia might be transferring money to Qaeda factions elsewhere, the assertion that insurgent money might be flowing out of the country was doubtful considering the single-minded regional focus of most of the militants operating here.

Dr. Magnus Ranstorp of the Swedish National Defense College, an author of extensive studies of the Iraqi insurgency, said he doubted Iraqi groups were ready to finance terrorism outside the country. "There's very little evidence that they're preparing to export terrorism from Iraq to the West," he said. "I think it's much too early for that."

The document tracing the money flows acknowledges that investigators have had limited success in penetrating or choking off terrorist financing networks. The report says American efforts to follow the financing trails have been hamstrung by several factors. They include a weak Iraqi government and its nascent intelligence agencies; a lack of communication between American agencies, and between the Americans and the Iraqis; and the nature of the insurgent economy itself, primarily sustained by couriers carrying cash rather than more easily traceable means involving banks and the hawala money transfer networks traditional in the Middle East.

"Efforts to identify key financial facilitators, funding sources and transfer mechanisms are yielding some results, but we need to improve our understanding of how terrorist and insurgent cells interact, how their financial networks vary from province to province or city to city and how they use their funds," the report says. It also says the United States must help the Iraqi government "to excise corrupt officials from its law enforcement and security services and its ministries" and "to prevent smuggled Iraqi oil from being sold within their borders."

Another challenge for the United States, the report says, was to persuade foreign governments to "stop paying ransoms." It gives no details, but American officials have said previously that France paid a multimillion-dollar ransom for the release in December 2004 of two French reporters held hostage by an insurgent group. Italy, these officials have said, paid ransoms on at least two occasions, in September 2004 for the release of two women, both aid workers, and in March 2005, a reported $5 million for the release of Giuliana Sgrena, a journalist for the Rome newspaper Il Manifesto.

Several American security consultants, all former members of government intelligence agencies that deal with terrorism, said in interviews that the ineffectiveness of efforts to impede the revenues to the insurgents was reflected in the continuing, if not growing, strength of Iraq's militants. "You have to look at what the insurgency is doing," Mr. Lang said. "Are they hampered by a lack of funds? I see no evidence that they are."

Jeffrey White, a defense fellow with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, also a former Middle East analyst with the Defense Intelligence Agency, agreed. "We've had some tactical successes where we've picked off a financier or whatever, but we haven't been able to unravel a major component of the system," he said. "I've never seen any indication that they're strapped for cash, never seen any indication that they were short on weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0098154

He said the insurgency had demonstrated tremendous regenerative properties. "The networks fix themselves, they heal themselves," he said. He pointed to the success of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia in withstanding the loss of hundreds of combatants and dozens of major leaders. "They keep coming back," he said, "and I think the same thing has happened to the financial system."

Sunni Urges Arabs Against Iraq Gov't (AP)

By Omar Sinan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

A prominent Sunni religious leader accused in Baghdad of inciting terrorism warned Saturday that Iraq's escalating sectarian violence will spread throughout the Middle East unless the international community ends support for the Shiite-led Iraqi government.

"I call on the Arab states and the Arab League and the United Nations to stop this government and withdraw its support from it. Otherwise, the disaster will occur and the turmoil will happen in Iraq and other countries," said Sheik Harith al-Dhari, who heads the Association of Muslim Scholars in Iraq.

The Iraqi Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant for al-Dhari earlier this month, accusing him of inciting terrorism and sectarian violence. The Sunni leader, who lives in Jordan and was in Cairo to meet with Arab officials, said he does not "take this warrant seriously."

Al-Dhari's comments came as Iraq is being wracked by an upsurge in sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites, including a bombing onslaught Thursday that killed 215 people in Baghdad's biggest Shiite neighborhood.

Sunnis charge Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is not serious about disbanding Shiite militias accused of sectarian killings. Sunni groups and politicians recently said the warrant for al-Dhari put an end to the national reconciliation program presented by al-Maliki in June.

Al-Dhari, who is an outspoken critic of al-Maliki's government and the presence of U.S.-led foreign troops, charged that the Shiite-dominated administration is using a curfew declared in Baghdad after the bombings as a way to carry out attacks on Sunnis.

"The government and the occupation forces are preparing the suitable environments to the militias and killing gangs, by imposing the curfew once or twice a week to attack our people (Sunnis)," al-Dhari said.

But he also urged Iraqis not to join in violence, which he said threatens to tear the country apart.

"Be patient and practice steadfastness and don't be lured into this sedition that aims to destroy" Iraq, he said.

Now It's Iraq On The Agenda For Mr. Fix-It Of The G.O.P. (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25 — Everyone in Washington knows that President Bush has a lot riding on the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel searching for a fresh strategy in Iraq. But so has the man whose name has become synonymous with the group: its Republican co-chairman, James A. Baker III.

The last time he dominated the news was in 2000, in Florida, when Mr. Baker — a former secretary of state who has been a friend and a tennis partner of the first President Bush since the current president was 13 years old — led the legal team that delivered the White House to its current occupant. That was Mr. Baker in partisan mode, cementing his reputation as Bush family confidant and Republican fix-it man.

Now, at 76, Mr. Baker is in high diplomat mode, on a mission, friends and supporters say, to aid his country and his president — and, while he is at it, seal his legacy in the realm of statesmen, a sphere he cares about far more than politics.

"I think he'd like to be remembered as a 21st-century Disraeli," said Leon Panetta, a Democratic member of the group, referring to the 19th-century British statesman and prime minister. "I think deep down he is someone who believes that his diplomatic career, in many ways, helped change the world."

DOJ_NMG_0098155

On Monday, the 10 members of the Iraq Study Group — five Republicans and five Democrats — will convene in Washington for two days of deliberations, to try to produce a report by mid-December. The panel, formed at the urging of a bipartisan group in Congress, has a broad mandate to conduct an analysis of the situation in Iraq, including military, economic and political issues.

The group has conducted hundreds of interviews, but some question whether even the most thorough report can have any effect on the ground in Iraq, where sectarian violence is escalating.

The panel remains deeply divided over several critical issues, most notably whether to accede to calls by Democrats for a phased withdrawal of troops. Mr. Baker, who would not be interviewed for this article, has said he wants bipartisan consensus, but the panel's Democratic co-chairman, Lee H. Hamilton, acknowledges it will be difficult.

"It's not a guaranteed result," Mr. Hamilton said. "There is a lot of focus on our work, and a lot of attention to it, and high expectation from it. I think Jim and I both feel that pressure."

Mr. Baker is no stranger to world affairs; he presided over the end of the cold war, the 1991 invasion of Iraq (arguing famously against ousting Saddam Hussein) and was an aggressive dealmaker in the Middle East. He has always been "the quintessential pragmatist," in Mr. Panetta's words, a master at intertwining politics with diplomacy, at consulting everyone in the beginning so no one feels left out in the end.

That has been his modus operandi at the commission, where he has functioned almost as a shadow secretary of state, using his vast personal Rolodex to reach out to international figures the Bush administration has shunned — while testing the political waters at home.

He has made ample use of his Bush connections, dropping in on the president for private Oval Office tête-à-têtes. He led the study group on a mission to Baghdad, where they donned helmets and flak jackets to meet leaders of every political stripe. ("A lot of them knew him," Mr. Panetta said.)

He has included Mr. Hamilton on every decision, going so far as to reject a photo shoot at Newsweek unless it included Mr. Hamilton, colleagues said. He insisted the report be released after the November election. He has let information slip out when it has suited him — like news of his quiet rendezvous with officials from Syria and Iran, rogue nations in the White House's view — but has demanded absolute secrecy about the substance of the panel's work.

"We've all been issued cyanide pills," said Edward P. Djerejian, who is helping Mr. Baker write the draft and is director of the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University, a university Mr. Baker's grandfather helped found.

As a two-time former cabinet secretary (at Treasury under President Ronald Reagan and the State Department under the first President Bush) and a two-time former White House chief of staff (Reagan and the first President Bush), Mr. Baker has been around Washington long enough to know how to play the expectations game. Right now, he is playing it to the hilt, putting out the word that Iraq 2006 is hardly Florida 2000.

"The expectations have gotten well beyond where he wanted them to get," said one person close to Mr. Baker, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "You're talking about a political equation as much as you are a strategic and diplomatic one. And one of the things that's making the situation difficult is this image that Baker's coming in, Baker's riding to the rescue. There are some very smart and very strong Democrats on this panel, and they're not going to do what Baker tells them to do."

Nor will President Bush; his press secretary, Tony Snow, insisted that the White House would not "outsource this problem to the Baker commission." The White House is already pushing back against the report, even before it is issued. The Pentagon is doing its own review of Iraq policy, and the White House has commissioned another. President Bush, meanwhile, is traveling to Jordan this week to meet Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki of Iraq, where he is expected to reassure the prime minister that the United States is not pulling out anytime soon.

Mr. Baker's relationship with the president is one of the great curiosities of Washington, and many here are trying to divine how he will use that tie to advance the Iraq Study Group. The two are not nearly as close as Mr. Baker is with Mr. Bush's father; Mr. Baker's recent autobiography, "Work Hard, Study and Keep Out of Politics," suggests tension just under the surface.

Mr. Baker writes that he did not mind being left out of the current administration: "We had our turn. Now it was his." Though people in Washington see a certain irony in his return to manage a new Iraq war gone wrong, he insists he is not "implicitly criticizing" Mr. Bush for the invasion. Yet Mr. Baker takes pains to point out, in a one-sentence footnote, that Mr. Bush is "an alumnus" of the "office boy pool" at Baker Botts, Mr. Baker's law firm in Houston. In one scene from the elder Mr. Bush's 1988 presidential campaign, he refers to "the ever-playful presidential son, George W."

DOJ_NMG_0098156

These days Mr. Baker refers to that son as "Mr. President." The president calls Mr. Baker, 16 years his senior, "Jimmy." Aides to both insist Mr. Baker has not used his private Oval Office meetings to tip the president off to the commission's work. But then, Mr. Baker would never be that unsubtle.

"He's treating the president just like he is everyone else, as somebody to be co-opted, and brought into the process," said one outside adviser to the study group, who was granted anonymity to talk about the process.

Some Democrats consider that a good thing. "Baker has the great good possibility of success because he's so close to the president," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat and incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "He's able to give the president a way out, a way of saying, 'I didn't do what the Democrats said. I listened to Baker, my old buddy, Jim Baker.' "

By all accounts, Mr. Baker relishes his encore as elder statesmen.

"Look, he was certainly a very effective politician, a wise political strategist," said Donald L. Evans, a close friend of Mr. Baker's who served as commerce secretary in President Bush's first term. "But that was a means to an end. He's playing, I think, the role that he should be playing at this moment in life — the distinguished statesman that is there for leaders to go to, and listen to."

The study group, formed in March, operated below radar for months. But the assignment just happened to overlap with Mr. Baker's October book tour. Mr. Baker left no media outlet unturned, even appearing on "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart." ("Don't think for one minute they don't sell books," he later told The Houston Chronicle.)

Mr. Baker used the appearances artfully, promoting the book and setting the stage for public acceptance of the Iraq Study Group. He made clear his differences with the White House, telling the ABC news program "This Week" that "it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies" and that his panel would search for a middle ground between " 'stay the course' and 'cut and run.' "

The political landscape, though, has changed dramatically since then. If Mr. Baker can guide his group toward recommendations that are accepted by the White House and Democrats, and that yield real improvement in Iraq, he will be more than a Republican fix-it man. Mr. Evans, the former commerce secretary, said he would be remembered as "America's fix-it man."

But foreign policy experts and politicians alike say there is no miracle elixir for Iraq; if there were, someone would have thought of it already. Ivo Daalder, a scholar at the Brookings Institution, says the real test for Mr. Baker is to pull the White House "out of the quicksand" in a way that has lasting political effects at home and strategic effects in Iraq.

"This is an impossible job," said Mr. Daalder, adding wryly: "Even God couldn't meet those expectations. Perhaps Jim Baker can."

Turning To Baker For New Iraq Plan (BOS/CHT)

By Stephen J. Hedges, Chicago Tribune

The Boston Globe/Chicago Tribune, November 26, 2006

Problem-solving prowess is noted

WASHINGTON -- To his Republican colleagues, James A. Baker III has always represented sensible stability and a steel spine.

He brought his calm, courtly efficiency to the Reagan and Bush administrations in the 1980s, serving as a White House chief of staff and secretary of state and treasury. He headed George H.W. Bush's two presidential campaigns. And when George W. Bush faced a historic legal challenge in the 2000 election, Baker quickly and successfully came to his aid.

The Houston attorney had a knack for making most problems appear as if they could be solved like a neighbor leaning over a fence post to talk things over. Now he faces a challenge like few others in his career, which has spanned five decades, namely how to help the president chart a new course in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0098157

Officially, Baker is cochairman of a congressionally mandated, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Unofficially, he is the Bush family consigliere. He knows all of Washington's levers of power, and he knows that much of what needs to be said should be said behind closed doors.

When he talks publicly, as he has by gently nudging the president toward a strategic change in Iraq, it is almost certainly by design and probably with Bush family consent.

"After all, he is a Bush family guy," said Peter Galbraith, a former US ambassador to Croatia and author of the book "The End of Iraq." "The genesis of this came at a time when the Republican sponsors of his Iraq Study Group basically were hoping it would develop a bipartisan support of the Republican Iraq strategy of staying the course. It has now morphed into something different."

The Iraq occupation and its attendant problems have become defining events of Bush's presidency. Now the president needs a way out of Iraq and the political and diplomatic trouble it has brought him.

Enter Baker, the man who so often has entered a room with a problem and left with a solution. The question is, can he do it again?

The Iraq Study Group that Baker leads with Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, is expected to forward its recommendations for a new US strategy sometime in early December.

The group also includes retired Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former secretary of state Lawrence S. Eagleburger, lobbyist Vernon E. Jordan, former attorney general Edwin A. Meese III, former Clinton aide Leon E. Panetta, former defense secretary William J. Perry, and former senators Charles S. Robb and Alan Simpson .

Baker began a solo public relations offensive last month, with the publication of his book "Work Hard, Study. . . and Keep Out of Politics!" While he and Hamilton said early on that they would not discuss the study group's recommendations before the elections, Baker offered hints of the group's discussions during book tour interviews.

He casually suggested, for instance, that Bush needed "alternative views" on Iraq, an implication that those around Bush, such as Vice President Dick Cheney and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, were not serving him well.

Baker has also suggested that rather than vilify Iraqi's neighbors Syria and Iran, the administration ought to hold discussions with them. "It's got to be hard-nosed, it's got to be determined," he said. "You don't give away anything, but in my view it is not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Iraq Group A Study In Secrecy, Centrism (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

In the history of U.S. foreign policy, there's been nothing like it: a panel outside government trying to bail the United States out of a prolonged and messy war.

The innocuously titled Iraq Study Group, which has evolved into a parallel policy establishment over the past eight months, is also unique in the way it operates. For one thing, it's even more secretive than the Bush administration.

Forty experts -- on warfare, the Middle East, reconstruction and Islamic militancy -- were asked to craft options for the commission but have nary a clue what proposals will come out of the 10-member panel, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.).

"It doesn't have to take any of our recommendations," said Clifford D. May of the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies. "They can come up with something entirely different. I wouldn't be surprised if that's what they do."

Interviews with a dozen participants offer insights into the process and the possible outcome of the bipartisan commission, which was organized jointly by four think tanks, was funded with $1 million by Congress and is run by the United States Institute of Peace. It was at times an intellectual free-for-all, participants said.

"I was fascinated by how the big names just let the discussion develop among the experts," said Frederick Barton of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "It was anything but a congressional hearing. They really just said, 'Let us know what you think.' "

DOJ_NMG_0098158

During a meeting between experts and the panel, participants said they were struck by former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor's thoughtful questions. "At the first open meeting, it was very moving, as she was the only one who spoke to daily reality. She wanted to know what could be done to help the lives of Iraqis at a time when everything was slipping into killing and decay," said Judith S. Yaphe of National Defense University.

Others recalled how another panel member, Charles S. Robb (D-Va.), a former senator and a former Marine, probed the ethnic divide in the Iraqi army.

All the experts wanted to make sure Baker, who is still closely connected to the Bush family, was in the room when they spoke. Several noted his telltale body language, which could dismiss a comment with as little as a raised eyebrow.

"We were all reading his face. If someone was expounding on something, Baker would get a distant look. He made clear he was not willing to go down that road," said an expert who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the final report has not been released. "He doesn't tolerate fools."

Some participants said the Iraq Study Group should be a model of how to bring the nation's wise men and women together to inject fresh perspective in solving the country's biggest problems. But others said that it, too, had serious flaws.

Despite Iraq's steady deterioration since the panel began its work in April, it moved at a deliberate pace -- too slow, in the view of some participants. The panel spent months analyzing U.S. policy and Iraq's situation. Experts, who were divided into four subgroups, met among themselves to answer a list of questions from the 10 commissioners -- five Republicans and five Democrats.

The panel will reconvene early this week to begin final deliberations. Its report is still weeks away.

Some experts were disgruntled that their ideas did not make it out of the working groups. Brookings Institution fellow Michael E. O'Hanlon advocates the "soft partition" of Iraq's Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish communities with land swaps and help with housing and jobs, so people could relocate to places where they are less threatened. He said he wishes he had testified before the panel so that his suggestion was not filtered out. "Some good ideas were killed in the cradle," he said.

Besides the experts, the commission also heard from others, including President Bush, former president Bill Clinton, Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem and Javad Zarif, the Iranian ambassador to the United Nations.

The panel was deliberately skewed toward a centrist course for Iraq, participants said. Organizers avoided experts with extreme views on either side of the Iraq war debate.

Neoconservatives, who supported and crafted much of the original Iraq strategy, say the panel was stacked against them. Michael Rubin, political adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority, resigned because he said he was a token.

"Many appointees appeared to be selected less for expertise than for their hostility to President Bush's war on terrorism and emphasis on democracy," Rubin wrote in the Weekly Standard. Baker and Hamilton "gerrymandered" the experts only "to ratify predetermined recommendations," he wrote. "Rather than prime the debate they sought to stifle it."

Only two of the 40 experts -- May and former CIA analyst Reuel Marc Gerecht -- are neoconservatives.

"My frustration was that there was often a feeling in the [experts'] room that President Bush should have asked them for their advice much earlier but didn't, so now they were all going to say, 'I told you so,' " May said. "I said, 'If you're going to say that this mission can't succeed and will face defeat, let's not have a failure of imagination.' "

In an interview, Gerecht said the goal of consensus among 10 Republicans and Democrats means that there will be no dramatic recommendations. In an op-ed piece in the Wall Street Journal, he wrote: "Its recommendations will probably be the least helpful of all the blue-ribbon commissions in Washington since World War II because it cannot escape from an unavoidable reality: We either declare defeat and withdraw completely tout de suite, or we surge troops into Baghdad and fight."

Although the experts have had their last meeting, the debate continues in what one participant described as "catty chatting" in a Web chat room. The panel also gets copies of those discussions.

"Unfortunately, our deliberations have been degenerating lately into petty squabbling over picayune issues of tactics, and I'm afraid I show that I have lost my patience a little bit here," wrote former CIA analyst Ray Close in an e-mail about the experts' deliberations. "Some of our most obstinate neocon diehards are still trying to fashion a strategy that is no more than an ersatz version of 'stay the course until victory.' They have been wasting our time, in my view."

DOJ_NMG_0098159

The only hint of a possible outcome came during an ad hoc vote. On Sept. 18, experts assembled to present two options to the panel: "Stability First," to stabilize Baghdad and make intense reconciliation efforts with insurgents, and "Redeploy and Contain," to gradually withdraw troops while containing terrorist threats.

The chairmen then called for a quick vote by the experts. Accounts vary, though most agree that the "Stability First" option won -- by a large margin, some said.

In a reflection of shifting U.S. sentiments on the war, the chairmen called for a second vote at their last meeting with the experts in October. This time, participants said, the vote was almost evenly divided between stability and gradual withdrawal. Sticking around to stabilize Iraq won by only a tiny margin.

Long Stints In Iraq Fracture Families (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

FORT STEWART, Ga. -- As a gray dawn broke, hundreds of 3rd Infantry Division soldiers gathered on a Georgia marching ground this month and listened to a long list of names of fallen comrades. Taps rose mournfully above rows of young redbud trees planted for each of the division's 317 soldiers who have died in Iraq.

Col. John Charlton, commander of the division's 1st Brigade, which next month begins its third Iraq tour in four years, stepped forward. "Be thankful for your families, your health, and for every day that you're alive," he advised. The brigade's mission, he said, is to bring peace to Iraq's volatile western Anbar province and its capital, Ramadi, which he said despite progress remain "a dangerous area, a very dangerous area."

"Take this time . . . to be thinking about those soldiers represented behind or in front of you," he said, "and as you'll notice, there's still some space on the sidewalk there for more trees."

This week, U.S. troops will have been fighting in Iraq longer than they did in World War II, with no relief in sight. Soldiers from 1st Brigade preparing at Fort Stewart for their third Iraq tour have been spending as much time in Iraq as at home. The rotations -- a year in Iraq followed by a year at home -- dictate soldiers' most intimate decisions: They mandate when troops can marry and have children. They sever relationships that cannot sustain the stress of absence or danger. And they lead some couples to pray for the war to end.

After the memorial service, Lt. Col. Doug Crissman gathered his 1st Brigade soldiers and sent them on leave with a warning not to get hurt, go to jail or go AWOL.

"You're all a little bit nervous. Hell, I'm nervous," said Crissman, of Burke, Va., who commands the 2nd Battalion, 7th Infantry Regiment. "The Army is asking us to do some tough stuff."

Then his voice softened as he nudged his troops to be attentive to their families. "I need you to think about this visit a little differently," he said. "Spend time with them. . . . Tell them you love them."Strained Relationships

In the living room of his Savannah home, Capt. Thom Frohnhoefer tumbled with his daughter Maggie, 2, as she jangled and waved his metal dog tags.

"She's the one I had after the first deployment," Frohnhoefer said. "It will be harder this time because she knows Daddy is leaving."

From courtship to parenting to divorce, the time away at war is having a profound impact on the families of active-duty soldiers, according to interviews with dozens of soldiers from the 3rd Infantry Division and their relatives. The division spearheaded the U.S. invasion of Iraq in March 2003 and returned for a second, year-long tour in January 2005.

For 1st Brigade soldiers such as Frohnhoefer, having children poses a wrenching choice: Leave your wife alone in pregnancy and birth, or miss your newborn's first year.

Frohnhoefer and several others in his brigade opted to start pregnancies soon after returning in January, creating a mini baby boom. Frohnhoefer's second daughter, Haley, was born three weeks ago. Another soldier in the unit had a baby last week.

"We take a lot of pictures," said Frohnhoefer, 28, of Queens, N.Y., as his wife, Audrey, quieted Haley with a pacifier. His biggest fear, he said, is "my kids not knowing me if something were to happen to me."

DOJ_NMG_0098160

Sgt. 1st Class Jonathan Harper, 37, of Wichita, has two children and wanted more, but his wife gave him what he calls "the ultimatum": He had to be home for the pregnancy and beyond. The result: no more kids. "With me being gone, it's too much of a burden," he said.

For single soldiers, finding a spouse is difficult. Spec. Christian Brown, 25, of New Smyrna Beach, Fla., is afraid that when he leaves next month he will lose the girlfriend he met earlier this year. "She doesn't know if she can handle me being gone," he said, adding that he no longer plans to reenlist.

Other soldiers are arranging hasty marriages before they leave -- for added benefits and to provide for their spouses if they die -- a trend officers discourage because they say it makes soldiers more vulnerable to divorce.

Capt. Neil Johnson, 25, of Crystal River, Fla., said that he wed in November 2004 but that the uncertainty and fear surrounding his Army job led to his divorce in June. "If I had been in Florida, I'd probably still be married," he said. Army divorce rates surged after 2001 and remain elevated, although they fell somewhat last year. Johnson sees more divorces coming. "It seems normal," he said. "No one is surprised."

Anxiety, depression and psychological trauma from repeated exposure to combat add to the stress, affecting 15 percent to 20 percent of soldiers, said Maj. Christopher H. Warner, a 3rd Infantry Division psychiatrist. Those factors contribute to drinking, drug use and domestic violence among a small percentage of soldiers, officers said.

While some GIs grow more resilient to combat stress, others get worse, Warner said. One soldier attacked by gunfire and bombs repeatedly at Iraqi bridges found himself afraid to drive through underpasses at home. Some soldiers under treatment for combat stress return to war but are screened to see if they pose a risk, Warner said.

Still, the bulk of psychological problems for soldiers relate to home-front issues such as separation and infidelity, he said.

Many soldiers doubt civilians can understand the pressures they face, and they see a widening gap between Army life and what some call "the outside world." "There are times you feel like, 'Why is it us?' " Audrey said. Civilians, she said, "don't have a concept of what we go through."A Changing Army

Sgt. 1st Class Kevin Bullock takes a break from loading up Bradley Fighting Vehicles and other equipment for shipping to Iraq. A divorced father of two, he had custody of his children all summer but was so busy he saw them for just two weeks. Next year he will not see them "unless luck is there and I get R and R in the summer."

Life for the roughly 3,800 soldiers of 1st Brigade is almost as hectic at Fort Stewart as it is in the desert, because their unit has only a year off the battlefield to rebuild lost manpower and equipment, train, and get ready for another deployment.

Escalating violence has kept troop levels in Iraq at more than 140,000, scuttling the Army's plans to shorten tours or give active-duty soldiers two years at home between combat duties. Given the size of today's active-duty Army compared with the high demand -- at least 17 out of 36 available combat brigades are in Iraq or Afghanistan -- the Army cannot keep all its units steadily filled with people and gear but instead "turns on the tap" for brigades first in line to deploy.

Last spring and summer, 1st Brigade began receiving hundreds of new soldiers and pieces of equipment and had to rush to complete a year's training in four months. An additional 100 soldiers will arrive next month just in time to deploy and train in Kuwait.

"We had to train on weekends, train on many a night," Crissman said. The pressure to meet deadlines was so great that the division commander, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, ordered that soldiers take off certain hours each week to spend with their families.

The stress is fundamentally changing Army culture, some officers say. "I am worried . . . you will see a more single Army, very combat-focused, 'get on the team or get out,' " a senior officer said.Worried Soldiers, Worried Families

Staff Sgt. Wendell Gee, 29, of Knoxville, Tenn., has had his share of close scrapes in Iraq. During the invasion, an Iraqi T-72 tank fired a round through Gee's Bradley.

Asked last week what helps him get through the deployments, the father of three answered: "Not dying has helped get me through it."

Even the most stoic soldiers, like Gee, who reenlisted on his most recent tour, say the Army cannot keep up this pace. The Army is not big enough, and the quality of new recruits has dropped, they say. Many worry pressure to pull out of Iraq will spell chaos and mean their comrades died in vain, but other soldiers and their spouses now say the war was a mistake.

DOJ_NMG_0098161

"I look at this as a duty. You're in it for the long haul," said the brigade commander, Charlton. "Are we able to do this for the next 10 years? I don't know."

Gee's wife, Tracy, grows misty-eyed recalling hearing that the brigade would return to Iraq so quickly. "We cried. . . . We just weren't ready," she said over a fast-food lunch. Tracy, who juggles a 1-year-old and two older children with a job selling vacuums, said she has asked her husband to leave the Army.

What most disturbed her, she said, was when her 12-year-old son, Christopher, wrote in a school paper that he wanted to be just like his dad. "I don't want him to do that," Tracy said, tears welling in her eyes. "Hopefully, the war will be over by the time our children are grown."

In Alaska, Troops Return Home To Chills And Cheers (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA — The first soldiers with the 172nd Stryker Brigade returning from Iraq arrived in Alaska on Saturday to bone-chilling weather and welcoming cheers.

Friends and family gathered at Ft. Wainwright near Fairbanks to welcome about 625 members of the brigade who served an extended tour in Iraq. An additional 200 soldiers with the 4th Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment of the brigade arrived at Ft. Richardson near Anchorage.

As buses pulled into a cavernous building at Ft. Wainwright, cheers went up from the waiting crowd. The roar continued as soldiers got out and lined up in formation. Soon after, they were hugging their loved ones.

"Go easy on them. They're tired and a little chilly," Col. Robert Ball — the second highest-ranking Army officer in Alaska — told the families earlier.

Brigade members will be arriving each day until Dec. 5, according to Army officials.

Most of about 3,800 soldiers will return to Ft. Wainwright, where the brigade is stationed.

The soldiers are returning after 16 months in Iraq. They served their first year in northern Iraq, based out of Mosul, in what was the largest combat deployment of Alaska-based troops since the Vietnam War. The 172nd worked with Iraqi army and police forces, training them and conducting searches and patrols.

After the brigade began returning to Alaska in July, its tour was extended four more months to help quell violence in Baghdad. About 300 soldiers had already returned from Iraq and were sent back after the extension.

Seven brigade soldiers died during the extension, which followed the deaths of 19 brigade soldiers during the original deployment.

Many families at Ft. Wainwright on Saturday brought warm clothing for the soldiers, who came home to temperatures as cold as minus 32 degrees — a 102-degree difference from Baghdad. Reunions varied between romantic and boisterous.

"Oh, he's here!" said Tamatha Zavodsky, jumping up to get a glimpse of her husband, Sgt. Maj. Dennis Zavodsky.

Soldiers embraced toddlers or cradled infants they were meeting for the first time. Some single soldiers were met by families of other soldiers.

Some of the crowd, like Sue Ulibarri, didn't have a soldier returning on the first flights, but came anyway to gear up for their own reunions. Ulibarri's husband, Sgt. Maj. William Ulibarri, isn't due in Fairbanks until later in the week.

"But this is the most exciting thing happening in Fairbanks," she said.

Iraq's Palestinians In Bull's-eye (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

Accused of being favored by Hussein, many take refuge in an ethnic enclave or try to flee the country, which isn't easy.

BAGHDAD — Palestinians in Iraq, many of whom fled here as refugees more than half a century ago, are on the run again.

The civil war convulsing the country has raised worries about the fate of the approximately 20,000 Palestinians in Iraq, who are targeted by kidnappers and Shiite Muslim death squads because of what many Iraqis see as the group's favored status under former President Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0098162

Community leaders say more than 60 Palestinians have been killed since early last year, and thousands have left the country. Many of the Palestinians who have stayed behind, mainly in Baghdad, have been chased from their homes and taken refuge in a largely Palestinian neighborhood here called Baladiyat.

"We are living in a state of fear," said Lena Shaheen, 27, who fled the mainly Shiite Dora neighborhood with her family in September after gunmen announced through loudspeakers that Palestinian residents had 72 hours to get out.

Since then, some of the Palestinians' apartments have been taken over by members of the militia tied to the firebrand Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, residents said.

Palestinians, of course, have not been alone in suffering from the months of bloodletting, largely between armed bands of Shiite and Sunni Muslim Arabs. But international officials warn that Palestinians are in an especially precarious position because they are considered outsiders, even after decades of living in Iraq, and have difficulty gaining admission to other countries because they do not carry Iraqi passports.

Palestinians have also been targeted because they are predominantly Sunni and perceived as having received preferential treatment under Hussein, who sought to burnish his credentials as a pan-Arab leader by voicing support for the Palestinian quest for nationhood.

"They are a more vulnerable group than anybody else in Iraq," said Gianni Magazzeni, who heads the United Nations human rights office here.

Palestinians deny they received special treatment from Hussein, including jobs and government payouts, or that they support the Sunni-led insurgency.

The U.N. refugee agency has appealed to the Iraqi government and U.S.-led forces to offer protection to Palestinians in Iraq, whose population has dropped from about 34,000 before the 2003 invasion that toppled Hussein.

"They haven't had much option, and we are extremely concerned over the plight of those remaining, and the inability to provide them with protection," the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees said last month.

Some Palestinians have been killed during mortar attacks against Baladiyat and in market bombings. Others were seized by gunmen and later found dead, showing signs of torture.

Uday Abu Hayja, a 32-year-old Palestinian, disappeared June 7 after going to work at a Baghdad flour mill in a Shiite neighborhood where he had been employed for two years. Abu Hayja and his Egyptian brother-in-law, who also worked at the mill, were taken aside by militiamen who said they needed to investigate the pair, family members said.

After more than a week, the family learned that the men had been killed on the day of their disappearance. It took days to find the bodies in the city's overcrowded morgue. They bore gunshot wounds.

The victims' relatives were too afraid to fetch the bodies for burial; some Shiite neighbors did so instead.

A month ago, the rest of the Abu Hayja family fled Baghdad, taking a bus to the Syrian border. One of Uday Abu Hayja's sisters, Muna, was allowed to cross into Syria because she carried Egyptian travel documents from her marriage.

But the others, lacking passports, have been living for weeks in a no man's land at the border in side-by-side tents, shivering at night as the temperatures drop. They and more than 300 other Palestinians stuck there have been tended by U.N. and other relief workers.

"We have suffered enough, quite enough," another sister, Maha, said by telephone from the border encampment. "Every family here has its own story of suffering."

She said the family's plans would hinge on whether Syria took them in. In May, Syria let in nearly 300 Palestinians who had languished for months along Iraq's border with Jordan. But it has not allowed any more Palestinians to enter.

Some Palestinians say they would be happy to be moved en masse from Iraq if another country would agree to take them. Many came to Iraq as small children at the time of the 1948 war that broke out as Israel was being established; others were born here but never granted full Iraqi citizenship.

International refugee workers say a bid to move Palestinians to the West Bank or Gaza Strip ran into opposition from Israel, and Arab nations have shown little interest in absorbing them.

A 57-year-old Palestinian attorney in Baladiyat who has promoted the rights of Palestinians said the neighborhood had taken on the air of a refugee camp because so many had flocked there for protection.

DOJ_NMG_0098163

Residents are now afraid to venture out to other parts of Baghdad, and most would gladly move anywhere else they felt safe, said the lawyer, who asked not to be named out of fear he would be targeted.

"Even if they would put us in the desert, we would plant seeds and turn it green," he said. "As long as they provide us with security."

ellingwood@latimes.com

Local Surgeons Helping Iraqi Who Helped U.S. (NSDY)

By Carl Macgowan

Newsday, November 26, 2006

The right side of Uday's face is shattered. There's a hole where his cheekbone used to be and his eye is gone. His nose is crooked and bloated.

Uday nearly lost his life because, he said, he helped U.S. troops in the early days of the Iraq war.

Now the Baghdad native is in New York awaiting the second of three operations to rebuild his face. If all goes well, Uday could receive a prosthetic eye when the last surgery is completed early next year. And if Uday's fondest hopes are realized, his wife and four children will join him in the United States.

"My family wants to see my face after the surgery," Uday, 47, said.

The effort by two Garden City plastic surgeons to repair his broken visage completes a three-year odyssey for Uday, who wins friends with a gentle demeanor in stark contrast to the upheaval in his native land.

Because his family remains in Baghdad, where sectarian violence has led to hundreds of deaths in recent weeks, Newsday agreed to withhold Uday's last name.

Before the war, Uday, a Shia Muslim, was a mechanical supervisor for the government of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. When U.S. troops stormed the capital in April 2003, Uday, who speaks choppy but passable English, was hired as an Arab linguist by the Army's 626th Forward Support Battalion, 101st Airborne. He was kept on when that unit was replaced by the 407th Forward Support Battalion, 82nd Airborne. "I believe they came to help us," Uday said. "So I wanted to help them."

On May 12, Uday said, he was returning to a base in south-central Baghdad after picking up soda and ice for the troops when he was approached by two or three men. He did not know them but believed they were supporters of Saddam Hussein.

"They waiting for me," Uday said. "They stopped me and ask, 'Why you work with them? Why you help them?'

"They shoot. ... They hurt anybody who help [Americans] like that."

Col. Jeffrey Douville, then a lieutenant colonel with the 407th Forward Support Battalion, said Uday was "car-jacked" around midday. "Our soldiers heard the gunfire, saw the commotion and provided immediate aid," Douville, 43, said. The attackers ran off before they could be caught. They left Uday to die.

"He was shot in the face point-blank and required extensive, immediate medical and life support," said Douville, now attending the Army War College in Carlisle, Pa. "Our medics and treatment professionals performed initial treatment to save his life and then we evacuated him to the next level of Army medical care, where initial surgery was performed."

Uday said he woke up in a Kuwait hospital five or six days after the attack. The right side of his face was blown away. His left arm had been disfigured by bullets when he lifted his arm to protect himself.

He remained in Kuwait for seven months, enduring 14 surgeries on his arm and face. Uday returned to Baghdad but after three months returned to Kuwait for more treatment. There he met Elissa Montanti, founder of Staten Island-based Global Medical Relief Fund.

"She told me she would try to help me make surgery which I need," Uday said.

Searching for help

Montanti said she met Uday in May 2004 while searching for children in need of surgery.

"I went to the hospital and met Uday, and I was just totally ... overwhelmed," Montanti, 49, said. "He nearly gave his life for our country."

When she returned to the United States, Montanti said, she spoke to doctors who wanted to help but couldn't get clearance from their hospitals. Her fortunes turned in January of this year when she met plastic surgeon Thomas Davenport at a charity event. Davenport approached Michael Dowling, chief executive and president of North Shore-Long Island Jewish Health System, who said green-lighting the surgery was "an absolute no-brainer."

DOJ_NMG_0098164

"Here's a guy who put his life on the line and his family's life on the line to help U.S. troops," Dowling said. "There are times when you do what's right, and this is one of them."

Montanti, her sister and a friend raised about $1,700 to cover Uday's travel costs and other expenses. Uday arrived in the United States on Sept. 17 and is living at Mount Manresa, a Jesuit retreat on Staten Island.

On Oct. 27, Davenport and Dr. Kaveh Alizadeh, partners at Long Island Plastic Surgical Group in Garden City, implanted a "tissue expander," essentially a balloon that puffs up the right side of Uday's face, causing the overlying skin to grow. Subsequent surgeries next month and in January will involve stretching the new skin to rebuild Uday's face, Alizadeh said.

Uday's prognosis is good, Alizadeh said. "Once you lose the tissue on your face, it can never be perfect," he said. "When he [Uday] sits there with you, he's self-conscious. We want him to not feel self-conscious."

The doctors are not charging Uday a fee. The surgeries normally cost $100,000, Alizadeh said.

'Better than before'

On a recent visit to Alizadeh's office, Uday was unfailingly polite, perpetually cheerful -- and studiously apolitical. He was circumspect when asked if Hussein's Nov. 5 conviction for crimes against humanity would help or hurt Iraq.

"I don't know about that," he said. "Maybe it will help. Maybe it don't."

His assessment of Iraq's future seems contradictory. His wife and children endure daily hardship in Baghdad -- "They're afraid," he said, "their lives are not normal" -- yet he exudes the optimism of people who survived a dictatorship and can find reasons for hope.

"It's better than before," he said.

He wants to remain in the United States and hopes to be joined by his family. Between medical appointments, Uday said he visits fellow Iraqis he's met since arriving in New York. It's a long way from Baghdad, where his injuries prevented him from going outside.

"When I was there ... I'm feeling that it's very difficult. Difficult every day. Difficult life, yes," Uday said. "Now here I'm feeling peace."

Leaving Iraq, Honorably (WP)

By Chuck Hagel

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

There will be no victory or defeat for the United States in Iraq. These terms do not reflect the reality of what is going to happen there. The future of Iraq was always going to be determined by the Iraqis -- not the Americans.

Iraq is not a prize to be won or lost. It is part of the ongoing global struggle against instability, brutality, intolerance, extremism and terrorism. There will be no military victory or military solution for Iraq. Former secretary of state Henry Kissinger made this point last weekend.

The time for more U.S. troops in Iraq has passed. We do not have more troops to send and, even if we did, they would not bring a resolution to Iraq. Militaries are built to fight and win wars, not bind together failing nations. We are once again learning a very hard lesson in foreign affairs: America cannot impose a democracy on any nation -- regardless of our noble purpose.

We have misunderstood, misread, misplanned and mismanaged our honorable intentions in Iraq with an arrogant self-delusion reminiscent of Vietnam. Honorable intentions are not policies and plans. Iraq belongs to the 25 million Iraqis who live there. They will decide their fate and form of government.

It may take many years before there is a cohesive political center in Iraq. America's options on this point have always been limited. There will be a new center of gravity in the Middle East that will include Iraq. That process began over the past few days with the Syrians and Iraqis restoring diplomatic relations after 20 years of having no formal communication.

What does this tell us? It tells us that regional powers will fill regional vacuums, and they will move to work in their own self-interest -- without the United States. This is the most encouraging set of actions for the Middle East in years. The Middle East is more combustible today than ever before, and until we are able to lead a renewal of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, mindless destruction and slaughter will continue in Lebanon, Israel and across the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0098165

We are a long way from a sustained peaceful resolution to the anarchy in Iraq. But this latest set of events is moving the Middle East in the only direction it can go with any hope of lasting progress and peace. The movement will be imperfect, stuttering and difficult.

America finds itself in a dangerous and isolated position in the world. We are perceived as a nation at war with Muslims. Unfortunately, that perception is gaining credibility in the Muslim world and for many years will complicate America's global credibility, purpose and leadership. This debilitating and dangerous perception must be reversed as the world seeks a new geopolitical, trade and economic center that will accommodate the interests of billions of people over the next 25 years. The world will continue to require realistic, clear-headed American leadership -- not an American divine mission.

The United States must begin planning for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq. The cost of combat in Iraq in terms of American lives, dollars and world standing has been devastating. We've already spent more than $300 billion there to prosecute an almost four-year-old war and are still spending $8 billion per month. The United States has spent more than $500 billion on our wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. And our effort in Afghanistan continues to deteriorate, partly because we took our focus off the real terrorist threat, which was there, and not in Iraq.

We are destroying our force structure, which took 30 years to build. We've been funding this war dishonestly, mainly through supplemental appropriations, which minimizes responsible congressional oversight and allows the administration to duck tough questions in defending its policies. Congress has abdicated its oversight responsibility in the past four years.

It is not too late. The United States can still extricate itself honorably from an impending disaster in Iraq. The Baker-Hamilton commission gives the president a new opportunity to form a bipartisan consensus to get out of Iraq. If the president fails to build a bipartisan foundation for an exit strategy, America will pay a high price for this blunder -- one that we will have difficulty recovering from in the years ahead.

To squander this moment would be to squander future possibilities for the Middle East and the world. That is what is at stake over the next few months.

The writer is a Republican senator from Nebraska.

Bring Back Saddam Hussein (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

THE DEBATE about Iraq has moved past the question of whether it was a mistake (everybody knows it was) to the more depressing question of whether it is possible to avert total disaster. Every self-respecting foreign policy analyst has his own plan for Iraq. The trouble is that these tracts are inevitably unconvincing, except when they argue why all the other plans would fail. It's all terribly grim.

So allow me to propose the unthinkable: Maybe, just maybe, our best option is to restore Saddam Hussein to power.

Yes, I know. Hussein is a psychotic mass murderer. Under his rule, Iraqis were shot, tortured and lived in constant fear. Bringing the dictator back would sound cruel if it weren't for the fact that all those things are also happening now, probably on a wider scale.

At the outset of the war, I had no high hopes for Iraqi democracy, but I paid no attention to the possibility that the Iraqis would end up with a worse government than the one they had. It turns out, however, that there is something more awful than totalitarianism, and that is endless chaos and civil war.

Nobody seems to foresee the possibility of restoring order to Iraq. Here is the basic dilemma: The government is run by Shiites, and the security agencies have been overrun by militias and death squads. The government is strong enough to terrorize the Sunnis into rebellion but not strong enough to crush this rebellion.

Meanwhile, we have admirably directed our efforts into training a professional and nonsectarian Iraqi police force and encouraging reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites. But we haven't succeeded. We may be strong enough to stop large-scale warfare or genocide, but we're not strong enough to stop pervasive chaos.

DOJ_NMG_0098166

Hussein, however, has a proven record in that department. It may well be possible to reconstitute the Iraqi army and state bureaucracy we disbanded, and if so, that may be the only force capable of imposing order in Iraq.

Chaos and order each have a powerful self-sustaining logic. When people perceive a lack of order, they act in ways that further the disorder. If a Sunni believes that he is in danger of being killed by Shiites, he will throw his support to Sunni insurgents who he sees as the only force that can protect him. The Sunni insurgents, in turn, will scare Shiites into supporting their own anti-Sunni militias.

And it's not just Iraqis who act this way. You could find a smaller-scale version of this dynamic in an urban riot here in the United States. But when there's an expectation of social order, people will act in a civilized fashion.

Restoring the expectation of order in Iraq will take some kind of large-scale psychological shock. The Iraqi elections were expected to offer that shock, but they didn't. The return of Saddam Hussein — a man every Iraqi knows, and whom many of them fear — would do the trick.

The disadvantages of reinstalling Hussein are obvious, but consider some of the upside. He would not allow the country to be dominated by Iran, which is the United States' major regional enemy, a sponsor of terrorism and an instigator of warfare between Lebanon and Israel. Hussein was extremely difficult to deal with before the war, in large part because he apparently believed that he could defeat any U.S. invasion if it came to that. Now he knows he can't. And he'd probably be amenable because his alternative is death by hanging.

I know why restoring a brutal tyrant to power is a bad idea. Somebody explain to me why it's worse than all the others.

A Tale Of Two Bushes (WP)

By Warren Bass

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

CIRCLE IN THE SAND

Why We Went Back to Iraq

By Christian Alfonsi

Doubleday. 466 pp. $26.95

This isn't the first time Robert Gates has worried about an American occupation of Iraq. In December 1991, with the first Bush administration on the brink of war to expel Iraq from Kuwait, then-Deputy National Security Adviser Gates led the high-ranking committee that unanimously urged President George H.W. Bush not to make regime change one of Operation Desert Storm's war objectives. Toppling the Baathist regime could lead to "the Vietnam scenario," warned the man now nominated to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary. "Our concern was that if we had been in occupation, having bombed bridges and everything else, we would be expected to fix it all, and we didn't want any part of that."

But the unseen cataclysm looming in September 2001 would unleash a wave of conservative scorn for that decision. In 1990-91, Bush and National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft -- Gates's boss and the president's foreign policy alter ego -- thought that humbling an aggressive Iraq without marching on Baghdad would help create a stable balance of power in the Middle East. But in 2001-03, the president's son and his quite different national security team would conclude that their gimlet-eyed, unsentimental predecessors should have tried not to stabilize the region but to remake it.

That long pivot in Republican foreign policy thinking -- from a power-balancing Bush administration to a power-flexing Bush administration -- is the subject of Christian Alfonsi's Circle in the Sand. The book works best as a retelling of the 1990-91 Gulf crisis with the benefit of new documents and on-the-record interviews with senior officials then and now. Unfortunately, Alfonsi skitters around in the period between Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait and America's 2003 invasion of Iraq. And his take on the early 1990s is shot through with what historians call "presentism" -- seeing the past through contemporary lenses, with the inevitable distorting effects of reading the history of Operation Desert Storm in the light of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

Alfonsi, who formerly worked at Young & Rubicam Brands, cherrypicks his data here, harvesting snippets of meetings that help explain the earlier thinking or actions of officials who served in both administrations. That means that Circle in the Sand is in no danger of displacing more methodologically sober classics on the Gulf War, such as Michael R. Gordon and Bernard E.

DOJ_NMG_0098167

Trainor's The Generals' War, Rick Atkinson's Crusade or Michael Kelly's dazzling Martyrs' Day. But it does have plenty of juicy tidbits about the once and future Bushies; Senate staffers will no doubt scour its pages before Gates's confirmation hearings.

It's delicious to learn, for instance, that President Bush asked his staff for talking points on Aug. 1, 1990, for "the next world leader on his call list: Saddam Hussein," who would conquer Kuwait on Aug. 2. (Somehow, Alfonsi gets the invasion's date wrong.) That day, at the first National Security Council meeting of the crisis, the biggest hawks came from the State Department, despite its reputation for preferring jaw-jaw over war-war. "You must kick Saddam out of Kuwait and wreck him in the process," Deputy Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger urged the president. But Paul Wolfowitz, then undersecretary of defense for policy, sat in stunned silence as the principals argued. He recalls leaving the meeting "deeply disturbed" by the Bush team's early indecision about whether to let Iraq's aggression stand. Surprisingly, it was Scowcroft -- now the neoconservatives' favorite bÃªte noire -- who rode to the hawkish Wolfowitz's rescue. At the next NSC meeting, the national security adviser slammed the door on the idea of leaving Iraq in control of Kuwait, having coordinated his "eruption" with Wolfowitz's boss, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney.

The detail gets even better when it comes to questions of regime change -- which in 1990-91 meant not U.S. nation-building but hammering Baghdad until another mustachioed Baathist strongman took over. "Iraq could fall apart," Scowcroft warned Gen. Colin Powell, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Fascinatingly, Gates and his fellow postwar planners worried both about another Vietnam and another Panama -- a replay of the embarrassingly protracted 1989 hunt for Manuel Noriega. Realism prevailed and, after Iraq surrendered, the battered dictatorship crushed rebellions by its much-abused Kurdish and Shiite subjects, eliciting calls for America to get off the sidelines. "I am not going to involve any American troops in a civil war in Iraq," the president lectured in April 1991. Wolfowitz seethed.

Substance and echoes aside, it's also something of an eye-opener to see the elder Bush's foreign policy team back in action. During the Gulf crisis, the policy apparatus moves decisively, snapping down loose ends with hospital corners. The Scowcroft-led interagency policymaking process hums along; the secretary of state and the secretary of defense work amicably together; and the vice president's staff is almost entirely irrelevant, minus the occasional episode where Vice President Dan Quayle or his chief of staff, William Kristol, wanders off the reservation and needs to be herded back on message. Senior U.S. officials even trust the French. The decisions weren't always right, but the process was impeccably professional.

All of which underscores how dissimilar these two Bush administrations have proven, in both style and strategy. But the seeds of conservative dissatisfaction were already evident under the first President Bush. "I do not think the United States wants to have U.S. military forces accept casualties and accept the responsibility of trying to govern Iraq," Cheney said on "This Week with David Brinkley" on April 7, 1991. "I think it makes no sense at all." That's a nice "gotcha" moment for Alfonsi. But later in the show, the defense secretary added: "If you don't have a clear-cut military objective, if you're not prepared to use overwhelming force to achieve it, then we don't have any business committing U.S. military forces into that civil war." Thanks to Alfonsi's presentism, it's not hard to hear Cheney's hint that he might have seen a massive U.S. invasion of Iraq aimed forthrightly at regime change as a viable option even back in 1991. Cheney's first comment now sounds like a display of loyalty to a realist president; his second now sounds like foreshadowing.

Warren Bass, a senior editor at Book World, was a contributor to "Triumph Without Victory: The History of the Persian Gulf War," by the staff of U.S. News & World Report.

NATO Soldier Among Dead In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, November 26, 2006

One NATO soldier and about 57 insurgents were killed in four separate attacks in southern Afghanistan, officials said Sunday.

Insurgents attacked NATO-led forces Saturday near Tirin Kot district in Uruzgan province. NATO returned fire and requested air support, killing approximately 50 insurgents, said the International Security Assistance Force of Afghanistan. One NATO soldier was also killed in the incident.

Also on Sunday, a suicide bomber attacked a restaurant in southeastern Afghanistan, leaving seven Afghans dead and 20 injured, the provincial governor said.

DOJ_NMG_0098168

The restaurant, located in Paktika province, was completely destroyed, said provincial governor Mohammad Akram Akhpelwak.

Akhpelwak told The Associated Press that the attacker was believed to be targeting an Afghan special forces commander and a district chief who were at the restaurant Sunday morning and were among the injured.

Paktika, which borders Pakistan, has been plagued by Taliban violence.

NATO said that as of mid-November, 97 suicide attacks this year in Afghanistan have killed 217 people.

In the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province, insurgents fired upon Afghan National Army and NATO soldiers Saturday. A retaliatory air strike killed approximately five insurgents, said the ISAF statement. Three NATO soldiers were injured.

In neighboring Zabul province, about 50 Taliban fighters attacked the Arghandab district chief compound on Saturday and clashed with police for about an hour, leaving one Taliban dead and three wounded, said district chief Fazal Bari.

On the Kabul-Kandahar highway in Zabul, Taliban fighters ambushed a police convoy Saturday night and exchanged gunfire with police for about 20 minutes, said Zabul highway police commander Jainani Khan. One Taliban was killed.

Attacks and clashes occur almost daily in the lawless southern provinces — the Taliban stronghold where the Afghan government wields little power.

Taliban, Convicts May Be Afghan Recruits (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Taliban militants and common criminals may have infiltrated an Afghan program that trains thousands of men affiliated with local militias to fight the country's growing insurgency.

The formation of the Afghanistan National Auxiliary Police reflects the growing questions about the ability of the existing security force's to beat resurgent Taliban rebels and other militants challenging government authority in parts of the country.

But though the training of the local militia members could give Afghanistan up to 11,000 on-call policemen to increase the ranks of security forces during times of need, some question the quality of the recruits and their effectiveness.

"There are criminals and drug users among them," said Col. Mohammed Hussain Andiwall, a senior police official in Kandahar province who coordinates between the Ministry of Interior and foreign experts training the auxiliary police force.

"Our constitution does not really provide "for these sort of people in our security forces," Andiwall said earlier this week. "The fact that they wear the same uniform as a regular police is very problematic."

Fighting between insurgents and NATO-led and Afghan government troops have halted development and reconstruction and endangered the efforts to normalize a country that once provided shelter for Osama bin Laden and his al-Qaida network.

Afghanistan, with its weak central government whose authority does not extend to some regions, has throughout years of war and conflict relied on its militias and warlords to serve as de facto regional security forces. That changed when the Taliban rose to power in 1996 and promised to rid the country of warlords.

Ross Davies, a Canadian police officer involved in the training of the auxiliary force in Kandahar province, said that despite a vetting process conducted by Afghan authorities, police trainers still "do not know really who these people are."

"We know that we are probably training some of the bad guys," he said, using an expression reserved mainly for the insurgents.

When Kandahar province held its first training session for the auxiliary police last month, some 200 men — most with long beards and turbans — showed up. But by the end of the 10-day course, only 77 remained.

Some were kicked out after they were found with hashish and heroin. Others had marks on their hands from injecting the drugs. Others refused orders to clean toilets, make their beds or take care of common areas. Dozens went back home for a religious holiday and never returned.

The 77 who did complete the training committed to a one-year contract with the auxiliary force. They can join the regular police force after a year if they choose.

DOJ_NMG_0098169

The 10-day training course includes lessons on the Afghan constitution, human rights, the use of weapons and basic police tactics. At the end of the course the recruits are given an automatic gun and sent to their home districts, largely in provinces most affected by the insurgency, in the country's south and east.

Village elders and local strongmen eager to protect their own interests in the face of the growing insurgency are providing the men for the new force, which will wear regular police uniforms and is meant to have 11,000 members by next year.

The auxiliary officers will receive $70 a month, the same amount the regular police receives, Zarifi said.

Gen. Nasrullah Zarifi, the commander of southern Afghanistan's police training center, asked cadets at the end of their training in Kandahar to swear on Islam's holy book that they will serve their country and not harass its people. The fear of God is Zarifi's only leverage.

"They swear on the holy Quran that they will behave when they go to their home districts," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

First Time As Tragedy, Second As A Musical (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

First came the books, then the television docudramas and feature-length films. And now "Enron: The Musical." Opening on Friday on a stage way, way off Broadway — at Lambert Hall in Houston — the revue is a send-up of the rise and fall of the infamous energy company.

In two acts, six local actors each play up to 10 roles, including those of the former chief executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, and the former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow. The songs are show-tune parodies — "Thank Heaven for Off The Books Deals," for example, instead of "Thank Heaven for Little Girls." The writer-director-producer is Mark Fraser, whose day job is selling janitorial supplies.

"I did a lot of research because even though it's satire I wanted it to be factually correct," said Mr. Fraser, adding that his sources included the memo in which an Enron vice president, Sherron S. Watkins, warned Mr. Lay about its accounting.

"A lot of the stuff in the play people will think I made up because it's so ludicrous," Mr. Fraser said. "But it's actually all true." KATE MURPHY

WHAT'S IN HIS WALLET It's great to be honored by one's peers, but even better to be paid top dollar. Richard D. Fairbank, the founder, chairman and chief executive of Capital One Financial, is enjoying both. He will be given the 2006 Banker of the Year Award on Thursday.

American Banker, the daily financial industry newspaper and sponsor of the award, says it is recognizing Mr. Fairbank for making credit more accessible, transforming lending practices and diversifying his bank's balance sheet.

Not that Mr. Fairbank need worry about his personal balance sheet. Last year, he was paid an eye-catching $249 million, making him the second-highest-paid executive in America, after only the home-shopping-channel magnate Barry Diller, according to the Corporate Library, a firm that examines executive compensation. ELIZABETH OLSON

BOARDROOM MULLIGAN Why should corporate directors be expected to monitor how executives handle stock options if they can't keep track of their own?

At Bally Total Fitness, five directors failed to notice that a deadline loomed last year for them to exercise all of their options on Bally stock. Then in December, Bally "erroneously permitted" two directors, James F. McAnally and J. Kenneth Looloian, to exercise options, according to a proxy statement filed last week. Dr. McAnally received $8,246 and Mr. Looloian $7,554.

After that misstep, the board blamed the directors' collective oversight on an "administrative error" and, in March, handed out $63,000 more in cash for then-worthless options held by the five directors — all of them members of the board's compensation committee.

John W. Rogers Jr. received $26,100; Eric Langshur, the only one of the five still on Bally's board, $16,500; Barry Deutsch, $14,300; Mr. Looloian, an additional $3,396; and Dr. McAnally, an additional $2,704. PATRICK McGEEHAN

STOCKS AND BOND Just how evil are short-sellers? Ask James Bond.

DOJ_NMG_0098170

In the new Bond movie, "Casino Royale," an odious villain — Le Chiffre, portrayed by the Danish actor Mads Mikkelsen — tries to make $100 million by short-selling a stock, then forcing the company into bankruptcy by blowing up its prototype product. Bond, played by Daniel Craig, foils the plot.

Along the way, the movie indicates that short-selling was somehow related to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, an idea raised at the time but never substantiated.

A generation ago, Bond villains plotted to start nuclear wars or to obtain world domination. Now they kill just to make a killing in the stock market. FLOYD NORRIS

NOT ON THE BLOCK Age may have slowed A. Alfred Taubman, the shopping mall tycoon and patron of the arts, but it has not dimmed his passion for business. The auction business, in particular.

Mr. Taubman, 82, pooh-poohed rumors that his recent sale of a controlling stake in Sotheby's means that he might quit the company entirely. (In 2001, a New York jury convicted Mr. Taubman of conspiring with a competitor, Christie's, to fix art-sale commissions. He spent 101/2 months in jail.)

"We have no plans for that," he said recently, dismissing talk of a sale. "We love the company. I went to prison for them." C. J. SATTERWHITE

AND THEY'RE OFF When the Museum of Modern Art announced the opening of its new education and research building in Midtown Manhattan last week, its patron, the retired investor Lewis B. Cullman, used the opportunity to speak up for his favorite cause — and his favorite candidates.

"I worry education has been put on the back burner," he said. "Every middle-class person I speak to has the same concern: 'I want to give my kids a good education, but I can't afford it.' "

To address the issue, Mr. Cullman said he would support Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa for president in 2008 and Gen. Wesley K. Clark, the retired NATO commander, for vice president.

The Museum of Modern Art celebrates the opening of the Lewis B. and Dorothy Cullman Education and Research Building on Tuesday. JANE L. LEVERE

Peer Pressure: Inflating Executive Pay (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

LIKE Lake Wobegon, Garrison Keillor's fictitious Minnesota town where all the children are above average, executive compensation practices often assume that corporate managers are equally superlative. When shareholders question lush pay, they are invariably met with a laundry list of reasons that businesses use to justify such packages. Among that data, no item is more crucial than the "peer group," a collection of companies that corporations measure themselves against when calculating compensation.

But according to a handful of pay experts who are privy to the design of pay practices at the nation's largest corporations, many of these peer groups are populated with companies that are anything but comparable. They also say corporate managers themselves — who have an interest in higher pay — are selecting which companies make it into a peer group. And because these companies are often inappropriate for comparison purposes, their use has helped inflate executive pay in recent years.

"The peer group is the bedrock of the compensation philosophy at a company," said James F. Reda, an independent compensation consultant in New York. "But a lot of people do it by the seat of their pants, and that is part of the reason why executive pay has really skyrocketed."

The use of peer groups to calculate executive pay has become ubiquitous in recent years. This is partly in response to the Securities and Exchange Commission's requirement that companies compare their stock performance with a peer group in tables in the section of their proxy filings devoted to shareholder returns. Theoretically, these tables allow investors to compare their company's performance against objective benchmarks.

But as is true with much about executive pay, details about exactly how peer groups are compiled have been kept under wraps. The worry among investors, of course, is that executives, consultants and directors simply cherry-pick peer-group members, thereby pumping up pay packages.

DOJ_NMG_0098171

Current disclosure rules require neither the identification of companies in a compensation-related peer group nor the rationale behind their selection. Usually, the most a shareholder learns about companies in a compensation peer group is that they are in the same industry or of a similar size.

This ambiguity will change when new Securities and Exchange Commission disclosure rules go into effect on Dec. 15. The rules will require a corporation to reveal which companies it uses in its peer group and to provide an extensive description of its compensation philosophy.

Under the new rules, company officials will also have to certify the accuracy of their pay disclosures. As a result, peer groups are likely to attract increased scrutiny, said Mark Van Clieaf, managing director of MVC Associates International, a consulting firm that specializes in organization design and pay-for-performance standards.

"Is benchmarking pay across companies truly comparing apples to apples?" Mr. Van Clieaf asked. "Failure to have a legally defensible process" can lead to "materially false" disclosures, he said.

POSSIBLE problems with the use of peer groups burst onto the scene in 2003, when the New York Stock Exchange disclosed that it had paid its chairman, Richard A. Grasso, about $140 million in total compensation. Amid a firestorm over the pay, Mr. Grasso resigned.

One reason for the outcry was the makeup of the peer group that the exchange's compensation committee used to determine Mr. Grasso's pay. The group included highly profitable investment banks and financial institutions that were far larger and more complex than the Big Board, which, at that time, was a nonprofit organization.

Brian J. Hall, a Harvard Business School professor and an expert on management incentive systems, conducted an analysis of Mr. Grasso's compensation and provided it to the judge overseeing the case that the New York attorney general's office filed against Mr. Grasso.

Mr. Hall, hired by the attorney general as an expert witness, found that the companies the New York Stock Exchange board used in its peer group had median revenue of $26 billion, more than 25 times that of the exchange. Median assets of companies in the group were 125 times the Big Board's assets, and the median number of employees in the peer-group companies was 50,000, or roughly 30 times that of the exchange.

The peer group was flawed, Mr. Hall contended, resulting in unreasonably high compensation for Mr. Grasso. Experts hired by Mr. Grasso concluded that his pay was, in fact, reasonable. But the judge presiding over the case ruled last month that Mr. Grasso must return as much as $100 million to the exchange. Mr. Grasso has continued to defend his pay as appropriate; earlier this month, he asked a state appeals court to block the judge from requiring him to return the money. A hearing on the matter is set for Wednesday.

Some state pension officials have become concerned that certain companies in their portfolios may be relying on peer groups that are flawed. "Peer-group comparisons assume that job responsibilities and job skills of the peer groups are similar and they may not be," said Denise L. Nappier, the treasurer of Connecticut and fiduciary of the state's $23 billion Retirement Plans and Trust Funds. "The thing about looking at C.E.O. pay of competitive companies, often companies will want a C.E.O. to be paid in the top quartile of his peers. But not everyone can be above average and this tends to ratchet pay up."

Peer groups typically appear twice in proxies: first, in portions of the reports disclosing the annual comparison of total stockholder returns at a company versus its peers, and, second, in a section devoted to the calculation of executive pay. In the pay section, shareholders are sometimes told the peer-group percentile in which their top executives' compensation falls. Typically, the filings state that corporate executives' pay was in the 50th or 75th percentile of the benchmark group. If an executive is in the 50th percentile, he or she is in the middle of the pack; the 75th percentile means that only one-quarter of the group is paid more.

Compensation experts note that when a majority of companies in any given industry are in the 75th compensation percentile, pay packages may be subject to the Lake Wobegon effect: that all chief executives are suddenly above average. Corporate directors argue that comparing pay practices with those of competitors is only fitting, given that those are the companies they usually look to when recruiting employees and executives. But pay critics contend that an unquestioning reliance on the use of such peer groups is too simplistic and contributes to a one-size-fits-all mentality in pay.

DOJ_NMG_0098172

"Sometimes it doesn't matter what the other guy is doing," said Brian Foley, an independent pay consultant in White Plains. "First and foremost is what makes sense for this company. If you're in a turnaround and you are comparing yourself to guys who never had a dip and are quite successful, it's a question not just of comparison based on size but also based on circumstances. I think these questions are asked sometimes, but sometimes they seem to be glossed over."

Ms. Nappier said her office was looking at how Eli Lilly used a peer group in its executive compensation practices. According to Lilly's 2006 proxy statement, the company judges itself against a group of eight companies: Abbott Laboratories; Bristol-Myers Squibb; GlaxoSmithKline; Johnson & Johnson; Merck; Pfizer; Schering-Plough and Wyeth. Lilly's stock underperformed the peer-group average in 2004 and 2005.

Comparing Eli Lilly with Johnson & Johnson, Ms. Nappier said, shows a stark difference, particularly when you look at the number of profit centers at J. & J. and the complexity of its business.

An official at Lilly did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Sometimes, compensation peer groups include companies that are not even in the same industry or are not of a similar size. An example is the peer group used by the Company">Ford Motor Company, which described its selection this way in its 2006 proxy: "The consultant develops compensation data using a survey of several leading companies picked by the consultant and Ford. General Motors and DaimlerChrysler were included in the survey. Twenty leading companies in other industries also were included." Ford, however, did not identify those companies.

Ford's proxy also stated that the peer group it used in the compensation section of its filing was larger than the peer group it used in the stock performance portion of the same filing because "the job market for executives goes beyond the auto industry." Ford said it chose the companies based on "size, reputation and business complexity" and said that over time, its goal was to peg its pay roughly at the median of the peer group, adjusted for company size and performance.

A Ford spokeswoman, Marcey Evans, declined to comment.

Mr. Reda, the compensation consultant, has a different perspective on how Ford uses peer groups. "That is just not appropriate," he said. "A peer group should be based on size, profit margin — financial success, perhaps — but you can't pick a company that has 15 percent profit margins when Ford is doing 8" percent.

Ford is by no means alone in extending its peer group well beyond its industry, Mr. Reda said. He noted that about 10 years ago, big brand-name companies began measuring themselves against other household-name companies, even though they were not in the same industry. Companies that made it onto Fortune magazine's list of "most admired companies," for instance, began to compare their pay to others on the roster.

Never mind that the connection was irrelevant, Mr. Reda said. "The result was a lot of pay got jacked up," he said, "because companies in low-margin industries that didn't do too well got pay hikes because they were in the 'most admired' candy store."

EVEN companies that have won kudos for corporate governance can fall prey to peer-group traps. Consider the proxy filed last month by Campbell Soup, which provides continuing education programs for its directors. The filing, made after the S.E.C.'s 2007 proxy rules were issued but before they took effect, noted that its compensation committee compared total pay levels at 29 companies "in the food and consumer products industries with which Campbell competes for attraction and retention of talent." Campbell's compensation committee approved the companies in the peer group but did not identify them.

In computing Campbell's total shareholder return, however, the company did not use the 29-company pay peer group as a benchmark. Instead, it used the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and the S.& P. 500 Packaged Foods Index, a subset of the S.& P. 500 that consists of only 11 companies, including Campbell. The company outperformed both benchmarks last year.

The use of dueling peer groups — one to measure stockholder return, another to calibrate executive pay — is common in corporate America. But Paul Hodgson, author of "Building Value Through Compensation," questions the practice. "Best practice would dictate that, if a compensation committee report is to include a graph showing the company's relative performance to peers, those peers should be the same as the group actually used to test performance," he wrote in his book.

Anthony J. Sanzio, a Campbell Soup spokesman, said: "In terms of recruitment, we believe the landscape needs to be broader to attract and retain the best talent. For talent, we compete with a much broader group of companies that are much larger." Mr. Sanzio declined to identify the 29 companies in the peer group but said Coca-Cola, Anheuser-Busch, Procter & Gamble and Johnson & Johnson were among them.

DOJ_NMG_0098173

Mr. Van Clieaf, the compensation consultant, said the composition of peer groups is usually more heavily weighted to larger companies, even though corporations typically look to companies smaller than themselves when they are recruiting top executives. This reality calls into question the oft-heard argument that outsized pay is based on market forces and that because companies have to jockey for the very best, enormous compensation deals are reasonable.

"Where would you really go to look for talent," Mr. Van Clieaf asked. "Either at the second or third layer down at bigger companies or the No. 1 role at smaller companies. Do you really think the C.E.O. of Johnson & Johnson is going to go to work at Eli Lilly?"

Even so, the pay handed out to executives at smaller companies — or to lower-level managers at larger concerns — are rarely included in peer groups, compensation experts and analysts say. Consider the pay awarded to the former Hewlett-Packard chief executive, Carleton S. Fiorina, which was based on a peer-group analysis. Although Hewlett hired Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive of the data processing giant NCR to succeed Ms. Fiorina as chief executive in 2005, Hewlett never included NCR in its peer group when calculating Ms. Fiorina's compensation, according to Mr. Van Clieaf.

In fact, Mr. Van Clieaf said, Mr. Hurd's pay while at NCR pay was 40 percent of Ms. Fiorina's compensation at Hewlett. If Hewlett had included NCR in its peer group — thus adding Mr. Hurd's lower compensation into the mix — Ms. Fiorina's compensation would have wound up in a far higher percentile of the peer group than the median percentile that Hewlett reported, Mr. Van Clieaf said.

THIS year, Hewlett-Packard changed its peer group from a so-called blended one that included technology concerns as well as those from other industries, to a group that is limited to technology companies alone. They are I.B.M., Dell, Apple Computer, Cisco Systems, Electronic Data Systems, EMC, Intel, Lexmark International, Microsoft, Motorola, Oracle, Sun Microsystems and Xerox.

"This ensures that the cost structures that we create will enable us to remain competitive in our markets," Hewlett's 2006 filing said of its switch.

While Hewlett also noted in the filing that it believed that the design of its compensation plan was appropriate, it — like Campbell and Ford — used a different set of companies to compare its stock performance for shareholders. This shareholder peer group does not contain Intel, Oracle or Cisco. The company declined to comment further.

In the meantime, analysts say, compensation practices continue to be built on the same cheery performance assumptions found at Lake Wobegon.

"I think it is safe to say that in various situations the peer-group analysis has been soft," said Mr. Foley, the compensation consultant. "And because it's been soft, the determinations made about pay have been somewhat soft as well."

The High Cost Of Too Good To Be True (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

AS the red-hot California real estate market sizzled in recent years, National Consumer Mortgage looked like just another residential mortgage company successfully riding the boom. It had lush offices in downtown Orange; the former baseball great Steve Garvey promoted its products in radio spots; and its founder, Salvatore Favata, a former local baseball hero himself, lived in a $1.7 million mansion in tony Yorba Linda and zipped around in a Mercedes roadster. An annual "Favata Fest" at the founder's home featured live music and photo ops with Mr. Garvey.

The little mortgage company was also ambitious. N.C.M. ran an investment arm that offered high-yielding notes to preferred clients, promising to use customers' funds to make short-term, high-interest loans to individuals and companies that needed money quickly. For customers like Bryan F. Downey, a 41-year-old father of three, it was a tantalizing pitch. Mr. Downey had a $125,000 inheritance that he wanted to put to work, and his younger brother had already invested his inheritance with N.C.M.

In April 2005, Mr. Downey invested the entire $125,000 in N.C.M. notes guaranteeing annual interest payments of 12.5 percent for two years. After the contracts were signed, Mr. Downey recalls, Mr. Favata, 46, tan and trim, glided into the conference room, which had a view of Angel Stadium, nearby in Anaheim. Mr. Favata greeted him like an old friend and shook his hand, saying, "Welcome to the family." It's a relationship Mr. Downey now wishes he could disown.

Earlier this spring, Mr. Downey, along with more than 200 others living mostly in California and Colorado, found out they were victims of a long-running Ponzi scheme that pulled in about $30 million before N.C.M. sought bankruptcy this spring, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission civil complaint and filings in a federal criminal case, both filed in United States District Court for the Central District of California in Santa Ana. Rather than using the money to make loans, authorities say, Mr. Favata wagered away about $10 million of it in Las Vegas and plowed through much of the rest in his business dealings and lavish lifestyle.

The N.C.M. scheme, of course, is hardly novel. It is not even all that big by recent standards. But it bears all the hallmarks that have made financial scams possible for generations: naïve trust, a speculative market offering seemingly easy riches, and gilded lures hitched to people's unending desire to keep up with the Joneses. So why is it that year after year, century after century, certain people fall for financial dodges, regardless of their provenance?

"You would think living in an information age it would be easier for people to sort out the fact that these schemes exist," says James H. Burrus, assistant director with the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Washington. "But so much information is available and coming at people at different ways that the fraudsters are much better at adapting to the environment to defraud the victims out their money.

"People believe their next-door neighbor is investing in property, flipping it and getting rich quick," Mr. Burrus added. "Everybody seems to be doing it. Fraudsters take advantage of those types of cycles."

But con artists don't use greed alone. Analysts say a variety of factors come into play when scams are afoot, many of which revolve around a fear of financial and emotional vulnerability — concerns about not having saved enough to send your children to college; the isolation and loneliness of the elderly; the stress that accompanies career changes; or the loss of a loved one.

MONEY, especially fast money, offers a buffer of sorts in an uncertain world. And con artists are only too happy to wear the guise of the market sage or guardian angel.

"The best scams start with a kernel of truth that are ripped right out of the headlines," explained Joseph P. Borg, director of the Alabama Securities Commission and president of the North American Securities Administrators Association. "Oil prices are up. There's a war in Afghanistan and Iraq. Tainted spinach. All of these can spawn frauds."

Faced with the opportunity to invest on the ground floor of something completely plausible and, better yet, exclusive, some jump in with both feet. "It's a combination of greed and a feeling of, 'If somebody is going to make money, why not me?' " Mr. Borg said.

The inner workings of the N.C.M. scheme, which snared wealthy professionals as well as retirees on fixed incomes, suggest that the common perception that only the elderly, less sophisticated or less well-off investors can be duped may be flawed — that a large cross-section of society can be swindled out of large sums.

Mr. Favata used existing investors, to whom he was faithfully making interest payments, to recruit their friends and family members. The promised returns were not so outsize as to raise the suspicions of more sophisticated investors. Payments, which came monthly or quarterly, lulled many into believing that their investments were safe and solid — at least for a while.

"They were really slick in how they presented themselves, how they looked, even where the building was located," recalled Mr. Downey, who attended college for two years and now licenses consumer products for a private company. "They looked like they were making lots of money and that they had lots of good investors."

Mr. Favata, who struck a plea deal with prosecutors in the federal district court in Santa Ana, declined to comment. "Mr. Favata has fully accepted responsibility for his actions," said his lawyer, Nathan J. Hochman, from Beverly Hills. "He is completely cooperating with federal and state authorities and will devote the rest of his life toward paying back the people he has taken money from."

Regulators have not accused Mr. Garvey of wrongdoing, and he does not appear to have invested in the scheme. Messages left for him with his agent were not returned.

Experts say that for those caught up in financial scams, especially schemes similar to the one Mr. Favata has acknowledged engineering at N.C.M., the early stages are exhilarating and therefore magnetic. Indeed, until the moment investors finally absorb the fact that they may have been duped and their money gone forever, speculating on a "sure thing" has all of the warm and fuzzy benefits of a freewheeling joy ride.

DOJ_NMG_0098175

In its purest form, being involved in a bogus get-rich-quick scheme is like a trip to Disneyland, says Anthony Pratkanis, a psychology professor at the University of California, Santa Cruz, and co-author of "Weapons of Fraud: A Source Book for Fraud Fighters." Professor Pratkanis equates being taken in by a fraud to riding the Pirates of the Caribbean attraction.

"You're experiencing the ride, singing, 'Yo ho ho! It's a pirate's life for me,' but you never see any of the trappings of the ride itself," he said. "Criminals call it, 'putting the victim under the ether.' "

In other words, once they have taken the bait, victims typically stop asking questions. While there are various estimates of how many people are taken in by cons and how much money they lose, experts and law enforcement authorities acknowledge that their best guesses are just that. The F.B.I., for instance, believes that more than $1 billion was lost to mortgage fraud last year. While that number seems substantial, experts note that it represents a minute fraction of the $3 trillion in mortgages issued last year.

There may never be a comprehensive tally of fraud, in large part because it is one of the most underreported crimes, authorities say. Some victims deny, even to themselves, that they have been defrauded, while others are simply too embarrassed to tell anyone. No demographic group is immune to fraud, and sophisticated con artists tailor their pitches to their audience.

A younger victim may be motivated by a rich payday, while the elderly appear to fall for schemes that claim to involve the government or a charity, said Sid Kirchheimer, author of "Scam-Proof Your Life," a book published by AARP.

"None of them say they wanted to get rich," Mr. Kirchheimer said of the elderly he counsels through his work at AARP. "They tell me that their grandson wants to go to college and they wanted to help him — at least that's what they tell me."

Fraud operators are also deft at using middlemen to become associated with a community group or religious organization. The authorities label these schemes "affinity frauds," because they take in people who have a common interest.

"Whether in a religious group or any other community-based organization, all you may need to do is scam one person very aggressively, in hope that this 'centerpoint' will start peddling the scheme to other members," said John Reed Stark, chief of the office of Internet enforcement at the S.E.C. "The centerpoint may not even profit or be at all complicit in the scheme, but he or she nonetheless becomes an important part of the overall con."

ONE investment pitch under investigation occurred in Indianapolis and involved Robert Penn, who owned several property management and real estate businesses and cut a charming figure in the community. Mr. Penn has been accused in a lawsuit — filed in Marion County Circuit Court in Indianapolis by the mortgage giant Countrywide Financial and other lenders — of orchestrating a scheme to use straw buyers to file hundreds of fraudulent mortgages worth upwards of $40 million.

In a response filed in court, Mr. Penn denied the allegations; he and his lawyers did not return phone calls seeking comment. Countrywide is contending that Mr. Penn and his associates sold it overpriced mortgages they took out in the names of his investors. Federal prosecutors are looking into the allegations.

Mr. Penn came across as savvy and self-assured, yet always concerned for the well-being of those around him, recall people who worked and invested with him. One of those people was Cynthia K. Hancock, who met Mr. Penn through her former colleagues in 2003.

Ms. Hancock, then an aide at an animal research lab at the Indiana University School of Medicine, describes herself as unsophisticated about finance and real estate. "I don't carry a Coach handbag; I have never had a manicure," she said. "I have just worked all my life and paid my bills. That's why I had such a great credit score. I thought for once my credit score could help me get a little ahead."

Ms. Hancock said Mr. Penn told her — as well as many individuals in rural Virginia, where his sister lived and his mother served as a lay minister to a small congregation — that their credit scores could help them make money the way rich people do: in real estate.

To Ms. Hancock and the others who heard the stories of easy money in real estate or read them in newspapers, it was a credible pitch. All they had to do was put their names on multiple mortgage applications, thereby "investing" their credit scores, they said Mr. Penn told them. The borrowers saw little downside; they were not asked to put any money down. They said Mr. Penn told them that he and his business associates would do that on each borrower's behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0098176

When some received a check for several thousand dollars, it seemed that the investment was paying off as it was billed. Then, they said, they discovered that they were on the hook for hundreds of thousands of dollars in inflated mortgages taken out on homes in Indiana, some of them in rundown neighborhoods. Ms. Hancock, who worked at Mr. Penn's property management company for a year and a half, owned five homes. Her daughter — a law student — was named as the buyer for four homes. All of the homes have been foreclosed on, and Ms. Hancock and her daughter are considering filing for bankruptcy protection.

IN hindsight, it is easy to see where Mr. Penn's investors made their mistakes: they were hurried through paperwork and did not read what they were signing. No one asked to see the properties they were buying or pressed for confirmation that rents were being collected and mortgages were being paid. And the investors said Mr. Penn also tapped into key vulnerabilities, particul arly those among the largely African-American, working-class investor group in Virginia. By investing in real estate, they said he told them, they could start to close the financial gap between them and white middle-class investors.

Many investors also dropped their guards because Mr. Penn's family, and his mother in particular, were viewed as religious leaders in the area. Spirituality and predatory practices never intermingle, investors believed.

"The whole basis of church affiliation is a sense of morality," Mr. Kirchheimer said. "Your natural resistance, your armor will probably be a little less because you are assuming people there are more moral."

Establishing — and ultimately violating — a bond of trust is at the heart of many frauds, whether it comes through a religious affiliation or a longstanding business relationship.

If there was one person whom Melissa A. Miller of Parker, Colo., thought she could trust, it was Robert O. Bryant, a friend and her insurance agent for 10 years. When Ms. Miller sold her dental practice in 2005, she said, she was not sure what to do with her money.

A fairly conservative investor, she said she was skeptical when Mr. Bryant first told her about Mr. Favata's private notes. She talked with her friends in the real estate business as well as her father, who owned rental property and had experience with similar instruments, eventually concluding that the notes were a safe bet because the properties served as collateral.

Ms. Miller, 39, and her husband, Sam, an airline pilot, who have three daughters and a son, invested $575,000 in N.C.M. notes. She recruited her father, Dennly R. Becker, and he invested $250,000. Aside from the few interest payments they received, the father and daughter believe that most of that money is lost.

"Yes, I am embarrassed," Ms. Miller said. "I am ashamed that I got my family involved in this. But it could absolutely happen to everybody.

"They seemed so trustworthy," Ms. Miller said of Mr. Favata and Mr. Bryant, "which is what got everybody.

"They were knowledgeable," she added. "They had every answer to every question you could ask about this scheme."

OR almost every answer. John P. Brincko, a management consultant advising the creditors committee in N.C.M.'s bankruptcy, said that none of the investors, to his knowledge, asked to see the deeds of trust that ostensibly backed their investments. Ms. Miller said that she asked to see them several times, but that Mr. Bryant rebuffed her with excuses: the dee ds would be available after the loans had been made; he would pick up the deeds when he visited Mr. Favata next; and, just before the scheme collapsed, he said he had forgotten to bring them back from California.

Mr. Bryant has not been charged with any crime. He did not respond to an interview request and is listed in N.C.M.'s bankruptcy filing as having lost close to $1 million of his own money.

In October, Mr. Favata agreed to plead guilty to one count of mail fraud in exchange for a five-year sentence, a $250,000 fine and repayment of more than $20 million to the victims, all of which is still to be approved by a judge. But it is unclear whether the victims will receive much beyond pennies on the dollar. His mansion in Yorba Linda will be sold to pay victims, but he appears to have few other hard assets, the authorities say. The Mercedes roadster and a Lincoln Town Car that he drove, for instance, were leased by N.C.M.

Brent G. Tabacchi, an assistant United States attorney based in Santa Ana, said the investigation was continuing but that the prosecutors had decided to settle with Mr. Favata because, among other reasons, he turned himself in, gave up his assets and agreed to a restitution plan.

But for the victims of fraud, there are some losses that can never be repaid.

DOJ_NMG_0098177

"I lost a lot of faith in human beings — I will really not trust someone with my money now," said Mr. Downey, who regrets losing his father's money. "He worked hard to become middle class, he left us a nice home that we sold, and we all got taken in by a clown in Orange County.

"I foolishly fell for this because I went into their beautiful building that was overlooking Angel Stadium," he added. "They even promised me box seats."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DeFazio Macing A Relic Of Old Style Of Pa. Corruption (PTR)

By Mike Wereschagin And Justin Vellucci, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 26, 2006

Former Allegheny County Sheriff Pete DeFazio's guilty plea to a misdemeanor macing charge is one of the last gasps of old machine-style politics that ruled Pennsylvania for a century, political experts say.

Macing -- the once-common practice of forcing public employees to contribute to political campaigns -- nearly vanished during the last 30 years or so. Macing was forced out by the rise of civil-service rules, unions and a public no longer willing to subsidize political paybacks, say experts.

The practices that snared DeFazio and three others in the Sheriff's Office are the same as those that powered the careers of people such as Gov. George Howard Earle III, who was indicted for macing in the 1930s, and Westmoreland County political boss Egidio Cerilli, who went to prison in 1980 for extortion and conspiracy.

"Human nature is such that corrupt individuals are always going to find a way to work the system. I think people can take some comfort in the fact that nowadays, people don't get away with it as much as they did in the old days," said former Pennsylvania Gov. and U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh.

DeFazio's plea Tuesday marked the end of a five-year investigation of the Sheriff's Office by U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan. Two high ranking officials -- including DeFazio's chief deputy, Dennis Skosnik -- are serving time in federal prisons and another is on a year's probation. DeFazio will be sentenced Feb. 23, though he is not expected to get jail time.

The investigation centered on officials who pressured workers to buy tickets to DeFazio's fund-raisers. Those who didn't were punished with undesirable assignments or denied vacation requests.

"Really, the sad part about the sheriff is he probably didn't think he was doing anything wrong," said former county Chief Executive Jim Roddey, who clashed repeatedly with DeFazio over budget and management issues when the two shared the County Courthouse.

Were DeFazio sheriff 40 years ago, he probably would have gotten away with it, said G. Terry Madonna, political science professor at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster County.

"That was a real common practice in courthouses around the state," Madonna said. "Courthouse gangs" of county officials ran Pennsylvania's local governments from around the end of the Civil War until the 1960s, he said.

Those who wanted a government job needed a local ward chairman's approval. Then they had to give as much as 6 percent of their salaries to the ruling party's campaign coffers, Madonna said.

Party chairmen who were successful macers in county governments sometimes were given a chance to ply their trade at the state level.

Then-Gov. Milton Shapp appointed Cerilli to run PennDOT, which was "a cesspool of corruption," said Thornburgh, who as U.S. attorney in Pittsburgh prosecuted Cerilli on extortion and conspiracy charges in the late 1970s. Thornburgh won the governor's office in 1979.

"The reason I was elected was I had a track record dealing effectively with public corruption. People were concerned about it," said Thornburgh, who became the first governor in decades to avoid a major corruption scandal in his administration.

Several high-ranking officials in the state Legislature and elected state row officers were indicted for corruption during his tenure. The most famous was R.Budd Dwyer, a state treasurer who was found guilty of accepting a bribe and shot himself in the head during a televised news conference the day before he was to be sentenced.

DOJ_NMG_0098178

"The tide kind of turned when it was clear that these kinds of activities weren't going to be tolerated," Thornburgh said. Prosecutors were emboldened to go after crooked politicians by a series of federal laws enacted in 1967, including one that allowed public-corruption cases to be prosecuted like racketeering cases.

"Parties became weaker. Unions got a toe-hold in municipal government," and civil-service rules became more widely used, Madonna said.

Many current politicians came of age while watching high-profile officials, such as former state Auditor General Al Benedict, go to jail, Roddey said. Benedict was sentenced to six years in prison in 1988 for tax evasion and racketeering.

"People that have gotten elected in the last few years are not part of that old machine," Roddey said.

In the 1970s, the Justice Department called Pennsylvania the most corrupt state. The department doesn't rank state corruption anymore, but a newsletter called "Corporate Crime Reporter" ranked Pennsylvania as the 14th most corrupt in 2004, based on the number of public-corruption convictions per 100,000 people.

Most corruption today involves politicians enriching themselves, rather than a political machine, said Nils Frederickson, spokesman for state Attorney General Tom Corbett. Instead of employees paying for a job, it's contractors and lobbyists.

"The glory days of Tammany Hall and other things like that -- maybe they have, indeed, gone the way of the dinosaur," Frederickson said. "That doesn't mean there aren't a few dinosaurs still wandering around."

The number of corruption cases nationwide rose sharply in the last six years, as the FBI increased the number of agents in its public-corruption task force from 358 in 2002 to 618 this year. Convictions rose from 584 in 2002 to 759 in 2005, according to the FBI. Of the number of public-corruption convictions this year, roughly 258 -- or 34 percent -- involved local-level government officials.

Pennsylvania Common Cause Executive Director Barry Kauffman won't say whether he believes macing is becoming less common.

"To what degree something is common or not common -- you're kind of playing with fire there," Kauffman said. "What's 'common?' Is it 10 percent? Is it 80 percent?

"One case of corruption's too much."

Getting About The Business Of Fighting Crime (MCA)

By Michael Kelley Contact

Memphis Commercial Appeal, November 26, 2006

The Memphis business community is "looking for a good old-fashioned business plan" that sets priorities on how to deploy resources and "move the needle on crime, violent crime in particular," says Blair Taylor, executive director of the business group Memphis Tomorrow.

To that end, an invited group of stakeholders on the crime-fighting front will conduct a summit Wednesday at the University of Memphis Holiday Inn to plot the implementation of a wide-ranging strategic plan.

It's not that Memphis and Shelby County haven't already been employing strategies to battle crime that go beyond routine law enforcement and prosecutorial tasks.

There's Project Safe Neighborhoods, a coordinated effort by federal and state officials to crack down on the possession of guns by convicted felons. There's the Crime Stoppers cash award program for tipsters. There's Blue Crush, a data-based, crime-mapping program that tells police where to deploy.

The district attorney general has a no-deals policy. There are various juvenile court programs involving volunteer probation officers and the like, a drug treatment court for nonviolent cases, public nuisance laws, anti-gang units, a multi-jurisdictional drug task force -- the list goes on.

Presumably, all those elements and others will find their way into Operation: Safe Community's strategic crime-fighting plan, which as of its most recent revision, included 15 strategies:

Expand data-driven police deployment, an extension of the Blue Crush program developed by Memphis police and University of Memphis professor Richard Janikowski that sends extra police officers to crime hot spots.

Expand effective law enforcement partnerships using as a model Project Safe Neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0098179

Toughen Tennessee laws dealing with illegal possession of firearms and gang-related violence.

Expand vertical prosecution of serious offenders -- assigning a single attorney to handle every step of a case as it makes its way through the system rather than using the current assembly-line approach.

Strengthen and expand the Shelby County Drug Court, now operating at about half capacity.

Design and implement a comprehensive gang intervention strategy that builds on the U.S. Justice Department's gang initiative.

Improve school safety, one part of a larger plan to design and implement a comprehensive youth violence intervention initiative.

Reduce truancy, another youth violence initiative that would start with a district attorney general's office pilot program under way at three Memphis middle schools.

Youth violence intervention, a comprehensive and coordinated approach to working with at-risk youth using various community resources.

A juvenile offender re-entry program aimed at reducing repeat offenses that would build on programs already in place at Juvenile Court.

Expand and coordinate adult offender re-entry programs to reduce repeat offenses of violent crime.

Establish a proactive, coordinated "problem properties" system to reduce crime by addressing neighborhood blight.

Develop a communication campaign that reinforces the message that there are tough consequences for committing crimes.

Implement a new domestic violence initiative.

Implement a local version of the Fugitive Safe Surrender program, developed in Cleveland, which allows suspects accused of committing nonviolent crimes to turn themselves in at a church.

The Commercial Appeal plans to examine each element of the plan in a series of articles to be published over the next several months. The list may change as the plan continues to develop. But the overarching goal will be the same: to reduce the crime rate and ease fears about crime that have contributed to middle-class flight and the city's image problems on the national stage.

These are trends that can't be turned around on a moment's notice. But organizers hope that the "business plan" on the table this Wednesday will be the catalyst to set positive change in motion.

Federal Crime Survey To Include SB County (SBCS)

By Jeff Horwitz, Staff Writer

San Bernardino County (CA) Sun, November 26, 2006

San Bernardino County is one of 18 areas chosen last week to be part of a federal program seeking to stem a nationwide rise in violent crime.

The Initiative for Safer Communities, sponsored by the Department of Justice, intends to "seek honest answers about what works, what doesn't, and why," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a speech last month before announcing the 18 target jurisdictions.

According to state crime data, the San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department documented increases in homicide, rape, and aggravated assault between January and June compared with the same period last year. Violent crime rose by 5.9 percent in that six-month stretch.

During that same time period, sheriff's departments in Los Angeles, Riverside and San Diego counties reported overall decreases in violent crime.

But San Bernardino County was not included based solely on its increasing crime. Other jurisdictions in California, such as Sacramento County, saw far greater increases in violent crime but were not included. Rather, the jurisdictions were chosen because they "represent a cross-section of the country in terms of size, geographic location and rate of violent crime," according to a statement from the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0098180

Sheriff's spokeswoman Cindy Beavers said it was likely that the diversity of her department's operations drew federal attention.

"We have so many different areas to deal with, from cities like Rancho Cucamonga to the Colorado River," Beavers said. "The Sheriff's Department has so many resources, we are able to support other resources that are much smaller within our county."

The program is slated to begin immediately. In a series of surveys and meetings with local law-enforcement departments, officials say, the Department of Justice will review problems such as the spread of gangs and the distribution of methamphetamine. The Department of Justice will then document successful approaches to tackling them, with the goal of developing better practices.

The program's launch follows a slight increase in violent crime nationwide after a decade of gradual decline. Between 2004 and 2005, the last full year Department of Justice data is available, violent crime rose 1.3 percent.

"Even a small up-tick in violent crime cannot be ignored, especially when we have made such great progress," Gonzales said in the speech announcing the program.

Hampton Roads One Of 18 Metro Areas In U.S. Crime Study (VP)

Virginian-Pilot, November 26, 2006

Hampton Roads is one of 18 metropolitan areas the government has selected to study for clues on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally.

The Justice Department study comes after FBI data in September showed violent criminal activity - including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault - rose by 2.2 percent from last year. That marked the first increase since 2001.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the study last month in Boston at a meeting of police chiefs and other law enforcement officials.

It will be rolled out in three phases: looking at crime increases in cities, analyzing those results for any trends and identifying federal programs that can help.

It was not clear whether more federal money will be available for cities, but federal officials said new initiatives could be created if necessary.

Locally, homicides were up in four of the five South Hampton Roads cities - Chesapeake being the exception - and aggravated assaults were up in all five between 2004 and 2005.

The trends with other violent crimes were mixed.

Amanda Howie, spokeswoman for Norfolk Commonwealth's Attorney Jack Doyle, said Friday that if the Justice Department contacts Doyle's office about the study, he will contribute what he can.

"It appears the idea here is to understand what has happened in order to prevent repeat performances," she said. "That's a concept we could support."

In addition to Hampton Roads, the cities and regions participating in the study are: Atlanta; Boston; Charlotte, N.C.; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Columbus, Ohio; Hartford, Conn.; Houston; Jersey City, N.J.; Kansas City, Mo.; Miami; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Nashville, Tenn.; Oklahoma City; Omaha, Neb.; Portland, Ore.; San Bernardino County, Calif.; and San Diego.

The Associated Press and staff writers Matthew Jones and Michelle Washington contributed to this report.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NAACP Wants FBI Probe Of Shooting (MOULTO)

By Kevin Hall

Moultrie (GA) Observer, November 26, 2006

MOULTRIE — A state leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on Saturday came to Moultrie and questioned accounts of the fatal shooting of Moultrian Willie James Banks.

DOJ_NMG_0098181

Banks, who was shot by police Nov. 16, was buried Saturday afternoon, and the president of the NAACP's Georgia State Conference held a press conference prior to the funeral service.

Edward Dubose said the NAACP is beginning its own investigation into the events that surrounded Banks' death, and the organization calls for action on the parts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Justice Department, the District Attorney's Office and the City of Moultrie police chief.

Banks, 43, who was mentally deficient, was working at a convenience store on First Avenue at Fifth Street Southeast when three Moultrie police officers arrived to arrest him in connection with a bench warrant. The officers said Banks resisted arrest, pulled a knife and ran toward one of them. One or more of the officers fired at Banks; he was hit three times in the chest.

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation is still investigating the incident, but Dubose expressed doubts Saturday about the officers' version of events.

"We are not convinced by the alleged statement of police officers that Willie J. Banks brandished a knife and ran towards police officers," Dubose said. "We are also not convinced that police officers felt that their lives were in danger prompting them to shoot and kill Willie J. Banks."

Dubose said Banks had no reputation for violence, and he said he would even be unlikely to disobey an officer.

"This was not ever a violent man," Dubose said.

Dubose said the NAACP is calling on the FBI and Justice Department to investigate the shooting as an excessive and unnecessary use of deadly force. It also wants the district attorney's office to convene a grand jury inquiry into the incident.

In addition, Dubose said, Moultrie Police Chief Frank Lang has avenues open to him that he has not explored, including an independent investigation to see if the officers' actions followed department policy and procedures.

"He doesn't have to take a complete hands-off [approach]," he said.

Pointing to the recent shooting of a 92-year-old woman by police in Atlanta, Dubose urged black people to stand up to police brutality.

"Today as Willie J. Banks is laid to rest our message is clear," he said. "We will not allow the continued shooting of innocent blacks by law enforcement officers for no other reason than being black."

Experts Concerned As Ballot Problems Persist (NYT)

By Ian Urbina, Christopher Drew

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

After six years of technological research, more than $4 billion spent by Washington on new machinery and a widespread overhaul of the nation's voting system, this month's midterm election revealed that the country is still far from able to ensure that every vote counts.

Tens of thousands of voters, scattered across more than 25 states, encountered serious problems at the polls, including failures in sophisticated new voting machines and confusion over new identification rules, according to interviews with election experts and officials.

In many places, the difficulties led to shortages of substitute paper ballots and long lines that caused many voters to leave without casting ballots. Still, an association of top state election officials concluded that for the most part, voting went as smoothly as expected.

Over the last three weeks, attention has been focused on a few close races affected by voting problems, including those in Florida and Ohio where counting dragged on for days. But because most of this year's races were not close, election experts say voting problems may actually have been wider than initially estimated, with many malfunctions simply overlooked.

That oversight may not be possible in the presidential election of 2008, when turnout will be higher and every vote will matter in what experts say will probably be a close race.

Voting experts say it is impossible to say how many votes were not counted that should have been. But in Florida alone, the discrepancies reported across Sarasota County and three others amount to more than 60,000 votes. In Colorado, as many as 20,000 people gave up trying to vote, election officials say, as new online systems for verifying voter registrations crashed repeatedly. And in Arkansas, election officials tallied votes three times in one county, and each time the number of ballots cast changed by more than 30,000.

DOJ_NMG_0098182

"If the success of an election is to be measured according to whether each voter's voice is heard, then we would have to conclude that this past election was not entirely a success," said Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, a nonpartisan election group that plans to release a report Wednesday with a state-by-state assessment of voting. "In places where the margin of victory was bigger than the margin of error, we looked away from the problems, but in 2008 we might not have that luxury."

Accusations of missing ballots and vote stuffing were not uncommon with mechanical voting machines. But election experts say that with electronic voting machines, the potential consequences of misdeeds or errors are of a greater magnitude. A single software error can affect thousands of votes, especially with machines that keep no paper record.

There were a few signs of progress this month. Several states that faced computer difficulties in the primaries fixed the kinks by Election Day and were better stocked with backup paper ballots. Fears that more stringent identification laws in Indiana and Arizona would create confusion at the polls did not pan out.

And though recent test runs of new computerized voter registration rolls in Indiana and Missouri revealed large numbers of errors, on Election Day reports of problems with the databases were few and isolated. The National Association of Secretaries of States, which represents top election officials from across the country, has said Nov. 7 was generally "a good day."

But some of the biggest states have not been able to overcome problems with new technology or rules and the lightly trained poll workers who must oversee them. In Ohio, thousands of voters were turned away or forced to file provisional ballots by poll workers puzzled by voter-identification rules. In Pennsylvania, the machines crashed or refused to start, producing many reports of vote-flipping, which means that voters press the button for one candidate but a different candidate's name appears on the screen.

Perhaps most notoriously, officials in Sarasota County say nearly 18,000 votes may never have been recorded by electronic machines in a Congressional race, even though many voters said they tried to vote.

The recent problems will probably help propel legislation that has stalled for months in Congress mandating that electronic voting machines have a paper trail to better enable recounts. Less clear, experts say, is whether anything will be done to address concerns about the lack of technicians to troubleshoot machines, polling places with too few machines and poorly trained workers, and a system run by partisan election officials who may decide conflicts based on politics rather than policy.

"These types of low-tech problems threaten to disenfranchise just as many people, if not more, but they tend to get less attention," said Tova Wang, an elections expert with the Century Foundation, a nonpartisan research group in New York. "We still have a long way to go toward fixing the biggest problems with our election system."

Election workers and experts say the advances in technology have simply overwhelmed many of the people trying to run things on the ground. At a hearing in Denver last week, one focus was on how hard it has become for the poll workers, often retirees getting paid $100 for a 14-hour day, and what it would take to attract younger people who are perhaps more savvy about computers.

"It used to be that you would come in, set up the machines, make a cup of coffee and say hello to your neighbors," said Sigrid Freese, who has worked at Denver polling places for more than 20 years. Now, she said, the job is complicated and stressful, and "I know a lot of people who said, 'Never again.' "

After widespread confusion and controversy caused by the hanging chads of the 2000 presidential election, Congress passed the Help America Vote Act in 2002 to help states phase out old-fashioned lever and punch-card machines and to introduce electronic voting equipment. But with malfunctions reported from a handful of states in the primaries earlier this year, many voting experts and state officials feared that the new technology might have only swapped old problems for newer, more complicated ones.

On Election Day, two voting-rights groups, Common Cause and the Election Protection Coalition, fielded nearly 40,000 telephone calls on two national hot lines from voters' reporting of problems or seeking information, and both groups are due to release their findings within the next two weeks. An initial review of their data, along with interviews with officials and experts, reveals that Florida, Maryland, Ohio and Pennsylvania were among the states with the most calls reporting trouble, including long lines, names missing from voter registration rolls, poll worker confusion and computer failures.

DOJ_NMG_0098183

In a few places, the difficulties started as soon as voters walked up to the sign-in tables.

In Ohio, even a congressman, Steve Chabot, a Republican, was turned away from his polling place because the address listed on his driver's license was different than his home address. Mr. Chabot was able to vote only after he returned with a utility bill. The state's top election official had to fax a midday notice to all precincts that such minor discrepancies were acceptable.

In Denver, the culprit was a new electronic poll book, which workers had to consult through laptop computers. The system was supposed to verify each voter's name in less than a minute. But it started slowing at 7 a.m. and eventually had to be turned off and rebooted, after taking up to 20 minutes to find each name.

As a result, voters waited in line for two to three hours. Liz Prescott, a computer industry executive, said she twice tried to vote but was deterred by the lines. "I'm just flabbergasted that this system at all levels failed," Ms. Prescott said.

John Gaydeski, Denver's election director, acknowledged that the system had not been tested properly before the election.

In Arkansas, Florida and Pennsylvania, the questions were about the voting machines themselves. In addition to the Sarasota issue, which may have been caused by a software problem, there were similar problems in the Florida counties of Charlotte, Lee and Sumter. In those counties, said Barbara Burt, vice president and director for election reform at Common Cause, more than 40,000 voters who used touch-screen machines seemed not to have chosen a candidate in the attorney general's race. But since one candidate won by 250,000 votes, the anomaly has been generally overlooked.

On election night in Arkansas, officials discovered that erroneous results had been tallied in Benton County. After retabulating the votes, they announced that the total number of ballots cast had jumped to 79,331 from 47,134, which meant a turnout of more than 100 percent in some precincts. After a third tallying, the total dropped to 48,681.

In Pennsylvania, computer problems forced polling places in Lancaster and Lebanon Counties to stay open late. In Westmoreland County, a programming error in at least 800 machines caused long lines.

Mary Beth Kuznik, a poll worker in that county, said she had to reset every machine after each voter, or more than 500 times, because the machines kept trying to shut down.

Howard Shaub, the elections board chairman in Lancaster County, counseled patience. "We used those old lever machines for 20, 30 years," Mr. Shaub said. "We just have to have better quality control and the new machines will work fine."

But Ms. Kuznik said one man refused to vote on the electronic machines and demanded a provisional ballot. "At least my vote will be on a piece of paper," Ms. Kuznik recalled his saying.

Déjà Vu In Florida (NYT)

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

One of the great hazards of the way electronic voting has been introduced in the United States is that it could end up undermining democracy by producing unreliable election results that cannot be truly audited or corrected. This month, that nightmare became a reality. Voting machines in a Congressional race in Florida — where else? — may have swallowed about 18,000 votes, far more than the nominal winner's razor-thin margin of victory. Because those votes were in the loser's strongest county, if there was a computer glitch it probably changed the outcome of the race.

Vern Buchanan, the Republican candidate in Florida's 13th Congressional District, was certified the winner, with 369 more votes than the Democrat, Christine Jennings. But voting machines in Sarasota County produced about 18,000 "undervotes," ballots on which the voter made other choices, but did not vote in the Congressional race. There have been reports of voters saying that their votes did not register when they chose Ms. Jennings, or that the race did not appear on their machines.

If the machines are to be believed — a big if — an extraordinary 14.9 percent of Sarasota County voters using the machines decided to skip the Congressional race, a highly publicized contest that voters knew could help decide which party controlled the House of Representatives. Among the absentee ballots, which were cast on paper, the undervotes were a more plausible 2.5 percent. The undervote rates in the district's other counties were far less than in Sarasota County.

There is a good chance that if something went wrong it changed the result. Sarasota was Ms. Jennings's strongest county, and The Orlando Sentinel's analysis of the ballots that did not register a choice in the Congressional race found that the votes cast in other races were more Democratic than Republican — and by a margin of more than the 369 votes separating Mr. Buchanan and Ms. Jennings.

DOJ_NMG_0098184

The Jennings campaign has filed a lawsuit challenging the results. There are, unfortunately, no voter-verified paper ballots, so all that can be done is to try to figure out what went on inside the "black boxes," as critics call electronic voting machines that do not produce a paper record for each vote.

The campaign wants its experts to review the machines' secret computer source code, the programming that runs the computer inside the machine, to look for problems. Election Systems and Software, the company that made the machines, is not saying whether it will allow this. If it resists, the courts should order the company to hand over the code — a requirement that should, in fact, be routine in all places where electronic voting machines are used.

As Ms. Jennings's suit proceeds, we should learn more about what, if anything, went wrong, and what the options are if any remedies are needed. But one verdict is already in: electronic voting without the full array of protections, including a voter-verified paper trail, is unacceptable.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Dept. Probe Eyes CME Clearing Operation (CRAINCB)

Crain's Chicago Business, November 26, 2006

Antitrust investigators target pricing power of merged CME/CBOT

Justice Department investigators probing the Chicago Mercantile Exchange's $8-billion acquisition of the Chicago Board of Trade are looking at the exchanges' clearing operation, a key profit center that some traders — and apparently regulators — fear could wield monopolistic pricing power.

Three people interviewed by lawyers from the DOJ's antitrust division in recent weeks said that interview questions focused on whether the Merc's clearinghouse, which guarantees $4.2 trillion in trades per day, functions as a limit on competition in futures trading. Investigators also asked whether the Merc could use its self-regulatory power to make rules that deter traders from using rival exchanges, according to the same sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the interviews were confidential.

Last year the CME clearinghouse guaranteed 90% of all futures contracts traded in the U.S., according to company filings. Clearing and transaction fees accounted for 76% of its $920.5 million in revenue.

The sources also identified the lead federal investigator on the case as George Baranko, the same Justice Department lawyer who six years ago put together a settlement that forced competition among the four U.S. options exchanges.

ENFORCING EXCLUSIVITY

In the options case, the exchanges agreed to list and trade each other's contracts. Futures exchanges still have the right to trade their own contracts exclusively. So, unlike stocks or options, futures contracts can't be bought at one exchange and sold at another, making it difficult for new entrants to break into the market.

The Merc's clearinghouse enforces its exclusivity by refusing to honor contracts from any other exchange except the Board of Trade.

"There is some analogy" between the former lack of competition among options exchanges and the exclusivity at futures exchanges, says Sandy Frucher, chief executive of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange, a signatory to the options settlement.

Philadelphia also runs a small futures market that has tried, unsuccessfully, to compete with the Merc's interest rate products.

"The clearing issue should be looked at, and the question of a regulatory monopoly," Mr. Frucher says. "If you deal with those issues, it's a good merger."

A DOJ spokeswoman confirmed the investigation but otherwise refused to comment. Mr. Baranko declined to comment.

The Justice Department routinely reviews big corporate mergers and can sue to block the deals if it believes they'll be anti-competitive.

'CONCERN' AMONG BROKERAGES

DOJ_NMG_0098185

The Merc already clears Board of Trade contracts under a 2003 agreement. The merger, though, would make that relationship permanent. A Merc spokesman says, "We're excited about this transaction and we don't think there are any obstacles that we wouldn't be able to overcome."

But the specter of a Chicago futures monopoly appears to have spooked some exchange customers.

Advertisement

Today's Headlines | Related Article Topics | Related Industry News "There is a concern in the broker community that the merger will result in pricing power returning to the exchanges," says Russell Andersson, a vice-president for HedgeStreet Inc., an electronic futures exchange based in San Mateo, Calif.

Column: Biggest Year Ever For Deals (SFC)

By Kathleen Pender

San Francisco Chronicle, November 26, 2006

Shoppers went a little crazy last week, and I'm not talking about consumers camping out in the dark for doorbuster deals.

I'm talking about companies and private equity firms gobbling up corporations, in whole or part, in a pre-Thanksgiving buyout binge. Last week alone, there were 379 deals valued at $118.6 billion announced worldwide, according to Dealogic. This includes $78.5 billion in deals for U.S. firms.

Among them: The Blackstone Group agreed to buy Equity Office Properties Trust for $20 billion, Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold offered $26 billion for copper miner Phelps Dodge, Bank of America said it would buy U.S. Trust from Charles Schwab for $3.3 billion, Russian steelmaker Evraz Group agreed to pay $2.5 billion for Oregon Steel Mills, and Nasdaq made a $5.1 billion hostile offer for the London Stock Exchange, which was rejected.

Last week's deals brought this year's total to $3.51 trillion worldwide, eclipsing the previous record of $3.3 trillion in 2000.

Although strategic mergers -- where one company buys another to expand or complement its business -- are strong, the real growth is merger activity in financial deals, where an investment firm buys a public company and takes it private, usually with loads of debt.

In 2006, takeovers by financial companies accounted for 17 percent of all global mergers, compared with only 4 percent in 2000, according to Dealogic.

What's fueling this merger mania, and why is it not generating the kind of backlash that the leveraged buyout craze did in the early 1980s, when takeover artists were called raiders or barbarians?

Here's a look at some factors:

-- Booming economies. "On a very basic level, it's the economic growth we're seeing both at home and abroad" that's driving merger activity, says John Orrico, manager of the Arbitrage Fund, which invests in companies involved in mergers.

As the U.S. economy recovered from its latest slump, many companies cut costs and refrained from making major investments, building up piles of cash. Now that demand is strong, companies are using their cash to expand by buying, not building.

"It's usually cheaper to buy a product line than taking time to build it," says Roy Behren, who helps manage the Merger Fund, which also invests in companies in the midst of takeovers.

"When you combine companies, there are synergies. The cost savings are very often real. The top-line synergies (such as increasing revenues by selling to the target company's customers) are harder to achieve."

Demand for energy and other commodities is especially strong, thanks to booming growth in countries like China and India. Companies that provide these products are making record profits and many are using it to buy competitors with the hope of cutting costs. In the commodity business, price is everything.

Also, Orrico points out, investment firms such as Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs and Lehman trade commodities. To augment this business, many are buying pipelines, barges and storage facilities.

"It gives them an edge if they control or have a hand in the distribution, supply and storage of energy (and other) products," says Orrico.

-- Low interest rates. Interest rates are still low by historical standards and relatively stable.

In addition, the difference in yield between safe U.S. Treasury bonds and risky corporate junk bonds is unusually small. That makes it easier to swallow a large company by putting a little money down and borrowing the rest (a leveraged buyout).

"The credit markets have been pretty friendly to these kinds of deals," says Matthew Toole, an analyst with Thomson Financial.

This month, Freescale Semiconductor sold almost $6 billion in junk bonds, and hospital firm HCA sold $5.7 billion worth to finance their takeovers by private-equity firms. Those were the two biggest high-yield bond sales ever after the $8.5 billion sold to finance the takeover of RJR Nabisco by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts in 1989.

-- Reasonable stock prices. Stock valuations are high enough that acquiring companies can use their shares to buy other companies, but they're not so high that target companies seem overpriced.

"The stock market has returned to levels at which target companies are not reluctant to sell themselves," says Behren. "When the market first cratered as a result of the tech bubble bursting, companies that would have been targets didn't want to sell at those depressed levels. Likewise, companies didn't want to use their low-priced stock to make acquisitions (because they would have had to issue more shares to reach a certain dollar price). Now that the market has rebounded, companies have more valuable currency to use to make acquisitions."

-- Private equity. Although private equity firms have been around for decades, their recent growth is helping fuel the merger boom.

Private equity firms -- such as Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, the Blackstone Group and the Carlyle Group -- raise money from pension funds, other institutional investors and wealthy individuals. They often use this money to buy out the shareholders of public companies, thus taking them private.

Typically, the buyers might put down 25 to 30 percent of the purchase price in cash and borrow the rest, often by selling high-yield bonds backed by the acquired company's assets. The private equity firm oversees the acquired firm, sometimes with the help of its old management.

The new owners try to improve the acquired company by cutting costs, shedding unprofitable operations and perhaps merging it with other companies they have purchased. It uses the acquired firm's cash flow to repay the bonds. The firm might pay dividends to investors but the real money is made when the acquired company is sold to another firm or back to the public in an initial public offering.

This process used to take years, but nowadays it can be done in months. PanAmSat, FTD Group and Celanese were all sold to the public within a year of going private via leveraged buyouts.

In recent years, private equity firms have been making outsize returns on their investments. Naturally, this has attracted billions of dollars into private equity and much of it is being used to buy out public companies.

"You have a ton, I mean a ton of private equity money on the sidelines waiting to be deployed. If you have $3 billion in private equity, that's going to buy $10 billion worth of companies," says Behren.

At some point the returns from private equity will fall, but nobody knows when or why. It could happen if private equity firms, so eager to put their money to work, pay too much for acquisitions.

When Sam Zell, founder and chairman of Equity Office Properties Trust and one of the smartest real estate guys on the planet, agreed to sell his company to Blackstone last week, some analysts took it as a sign that private equity firms were overpaying for assets, at least in real estate.

On the other hand, the premiums being paid for public companies do not seem out of control, especially given the surge in takeover deals.

This year, private equity firms paid 28.6 percent on average over the public company's market price, compared with 35.3 percent in 2003 and 43.6 percent in 2000, according to Thomson Financial.

That could be because "private equity players need to deliver a certain percentage return to their general partners, so they are probably much more aware of 'overpaying' and will walk away if the purchase price gets too high," says Thomson's Toole.

Or could it be that private equity firms are keeping prices in check by forming clubs to buy companies with each other rather than bidding against each other?

DOJ_NMG_0098187

The U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division has launched an informal investigation to determine whether private equity clubs are anti-competitive.

-- Why no backlash? Other than the DOJ investigation, private equity firms and buyouts in general are not generating the kind of negative publicity they got in the 1980s.

Back then, stocks in general were undervalued and selling for less than the sum of their parts in many cases. So-called corporate raiders could gain control of companies and sell them off in pieces, resulting in large layoffs and the disappearance of many venerable corporate names.

Sometimes all the raiders had to was buy a piece of the company, threaten to take it over, then sit back and wait until management paid them a higher price to go away. This tactic, known as greenmail, has since been outlawed.

Today, "public shareholders aren't complaining because they feel they are getting closer to full valuation," Orrico says.

Employees, by and large, aren't complaining because the big deals so far have not resulted in mass layoffs. That could change, especially if the economy turns down.

"If you're an HCA employee, you're not concerned, especially if you owned stock in HCA," Orrico says. But if HCA falters "and you get laid off in a year, you're going to get politicians pissed off, you're going to get unions angry."

Patient care could also suffer. "What are they going to do first? Pay interest or buy new equipment?" Orrico says.

"I think this can have some serious negative consequences for the economy down the road," he adds. "We haven't heard a lot of complaints yet because we don't know what the final outcome is going to be."

Net Worth runs Tuesdays, Thursdays and Sundays. E-mail Kathleen Pender at kpender@sfchronicle.com.

Page F - 1

As Cable, Broadcast Snit Boils, FCC Calls A Meeting (DMR)

Des Moines Register, November 26, 2006

Unless the situation is resolved, this is the last week for KDSM's Fox programs on Mediacom.

Treasure your football, Fox 17 viewers, because today could bring your last viewable NFL game on central Iowa cable for a long while.

A 12-state, Iowa-based game of broadcasting chicken between Mediacom Communications Corp. and Sinclair Broadcasting Group is scheduled to come to a head Thursday night. And so far, a last-minute meeting called by a federal communications official seems to be the only hope of stopping a crash.

According to Barry Faber, corporate attorney and vice president of Maryland-based Sinclair, Mediacom and Sinclair officials have been summoned to a Monday meeting in the Washington, D.C., office of Robert McDowell, a member of the Federal Communications Commission, to discuss the year-long battle between the companies that threatens to leave 250,000 Iowa households with no immediate access to some popular television programs.

The still-unresolved squabble means Mediacom, which operates cable television systems in 23 states, will lose the right to rebroadcast signals of 22 of Sinclair's television stations, including two in Iowa, beginning Friday morning.

For cable customers in Des Moines, that would mean an end to some NFL football games, no more "The Simpsons" and no more "American Idol" on KDSM, the local Fox TV affiliate.

Likewise, no more "Survivor" or "CSI" for cable customers who watch KGAN-TV, the CBS affiliate in Cedar Rapids.

Mediacom officials say the company provides television to roughly 450,000 households across Iowa, although roughly 200,000 of those homes - in areas outside the Des Moines and Cedar Rapids markets - receive multiple Fox or CBS channels and would not lose any network programming if Sinclair stations go dark.

The long-standing financial dispute, which also has grown to become a legal battle and a public relations war, involves a gap of roughly $1 million, according to the last numbers disclosed by either side.

"I would say it's extremely unlikely that we're going to be able to work anything out," Faber said. "There have not been any substantive conversations at all."

A Mediacom executive echoed that sentiment but sounded optimistic that his company would succeed on a series of complaints filed with the FCC, including charges that Sinclair has refused to negotiate with the cable company in good faith.

DOJ_NMG_0098188

Ed Pardini, Mediacom's senior vice president for its Des Moines offices, said he was hopeful the Federal Communications Commission would be able to force some sort of resolution, even if only temporarily. "Both parties are regulated by the FCC, and both parties have a lot to gain by creating a win-win scenario," Pardini said.

McDowell, the FCC commissioner, could not be reached for comment.

Failed negotiations

Mediacom has accused Sinclair in federal court papers of breaking U.S. antitrust laws by linking fee negotiations for 13 television stations that Mediacom wants to carry over its cable systems with nine other stations that it does not.

Sinclair, meanwhile, insists the cable company simply is unwilling to pay broadcasters on the same scale that it pays cable networks for signals such as the History Channel.

The two companies, which agree that Sinclair deserves some sort of payment, negotiated for roughly a year before Sinclair announced in September that it planned to take its stations off Mediacom.

Mediacom's lawsuit was filed in October, followed by repeated public statements from each company blaming the other for the deadlock.

In recent weeks, a Mediacom newspaper ad has accused Sinclair of "strong-arm tactics," while a Sinclair news release referred to Mediacom as a "near monopolist."

Drew McLellan, chief executive officer of McLellan Marketing Group of Des Moines, says much of the campaign has amounted to "sniping at each other," while not offering enough information for any observer to decide who's right or who's wrong.

Company executives say the ferocity of the licensing dispute is being driven largely by Sinclair's determination to raise the price that cable companies everywhere must pay to carry its signals.

Meanwhile, Sinclair's Des Moines and Cedar Rapids stations reportedly are ranked in the middle or bottom of their local markets.

"We're willing to pay a market rate of compensation," Pardini of Mediacom said. "But Sinclair is discriminating against Iowa consumers because it believes that the Des Moines market and the Cedar Rapids market are insignificant to its bottom line."

Said Faber, the Sinclair lawyer: "This is a long-term project to get paid appropriate compensation. So we have to be, and we are, willing to come off" of cable.

Satellite invitation

Faber's company has spent much of the last month urging Mediacom customers to jump ship with them. Throughout November, Sinclair has offered cable customers $150 to dump Mediacom in favor of a DirecTV satellite system.

Company officials plan to announce early this week that the $150 rebate offer, originally scheduled to expire on Wednesday, now will be extended to Dec. 31.

Pardini said earlier this month that he had seen no increase in cable disconnections attributed to the dispute.

A DirecTV spokeswoman last week said that "a nice number" of Iowans had taken advantage of the rebate. She declined to disclose a number.

DirecTV did provide the names of several customers who recently had switched from cable, but the only one who could be reached on Friday said the Fox 17 issue had no impact on his decision.

"I did not change because of this issue on TV programming," said Matt Anderson of West Des Moines. "I changed because my Internet service was not working, and I could not get anybody from Mediacom to answer the phone."

Josh Garrett of Des Moines, however, is pleased with Mediacom cable and has no intention of switching.

"I don't want a satellite dish," he said. "I just don't want it on my house."

Regardless of what happens Thursday at midnight, all Sinclair-owned stations will continue to be available for free in Iowa for viewers who own a broadcast antenna.

As for cable customers, Mediacom officials say federal law would keep them from offering replacement network programming in Des Moines or Cedar Rapids if Sinclair removes its channels from cable.

However, the company already has found an alternative for at least one key offering on Fox 17 - University of Iowa basketball games.

DOJ_NMG_0098189

Pardini said the cable company recently cut a deal with ESPN to rebroadcast any basketball games that are slated to air on KDSM. The tape-delayed games will air on Mediacom's Channel 22 roughly 30 minutes after their conclusion on KDSM and will be replayed the following day.

Reporter Jeff Eckhoff can be reached at (515) 284-8271 or jeckhoff@dmreg.com

Industry Denies Manipulation To Boost Profits (AP)

By Jeff Donn

AP, November 26, 2006

Oil companies face questions about creating tight supplies

BAKERSFIELD -- You'd think it was Texas. Dusty roads course the scrubland toward oil tanks and warehouses. Beefy men talk oil over burritos at lunch. Like grazing herds, oil wells dip nonstop amid the tumbleweed -- or even into the asphalt of a parking lot.

That's why the rumor sounded so wrong here in California's lower San Joaquin Valley, where petroleum has gushed up more riches than the whole gold rush. Why would Shell Oil Co. simply close its Bakersfield refinery? Why scrap a profit maker?

The rumor seemed to make no sense. Yet it was true.

The company says it could make more money on other projects. It denies it intended to squeeze the market, as its critics would claim, to drive up gasoline profits at its other refineries in the region.

Whatever the truth in Bakersfield, an Associated Press analysis suggests that big oil companies have been crimping supplies in subtler ways across the country for years. And tighter supplies tend to drive up prices.

The analysis, based on data from the U.S. Energy Information Administration, indicates that the industry slacked off supplying oil and gasoline during the prolonged price boom between early 1999 and last summer, when prices began to fall.

The industry counters that it's been working hard to meet untiring demand. It faults output quotas set by Mideast oil powers, global competition for oil from booming economies like China's, and domestic challenges like depleting wells, clean-air rules, and hurricanes. They do make things harder.

Yet the AP analysis found evidence of at least an underwhelming industry performance in supplying the domestic market, when profits should have made investment capital plentiful:

During the 1999-2006 price boom, the industry drilled an average of 7 percent fewer new wells monthly than in the seven preceding years of low, stable prices.

The national supply of unrefined oil, including imports, grew an average of only 6 percent during the high-priced years, down from 14 percent during the previous span.

The gasoline supply expanded by only 10 percent from 1999 to 2006, down from 15 percent in the earlier period.

The findings support a conclusion already reached by many motorists. Fifty-five percent of Americans think gas prices are high because oil companies manipulate them, a Pew Research Center poll found in October.

Even in Bakersfield, which lives off oil, many suspect that the industry goes easy on supply for its own reasons. "They ain't trying; that's more money for them," snorted JaRayle Madden, a construction worker filling up his little sedan recently at a local Shell station.

Shutting down

This fast-growing city of 300,000 shuddered in November 2003, when Shell confirmed it would soon close its local refinery. Plant workers, consumer activists and public officials rose up in resistance, firing off letters and demanding meetings.

The 70-year-old refinery only produced 2 percent of California's gasoline and 6 percent of its diesel fuel. Yet opponents feared its demise would push up prices in the tight markets all along the West Coast.

In these circumstances, surely the plant was worth something to someone, if not to Shell. After losing $57 million mostly in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the refinery was making money again, Shell acknowledged.

Though set back temporarily by the attacks, the oil business has profited handsomely since then. For example, the biggest six refiners -- Shell is only No. 12 nationally but powerful in California -- rang up $400 billion in profits since 2001, according to the consumer group Public Citizen and corporate reports. Even compliance with complex clean-air rules hasn't spoiled business.

DOJ_NMG_0098190

The industry also protected profits by not building any new refineries, instead expanding existing ones when it could.

Shell portrayed its Bakersfield refinery as old and unfit. One executive said there was "simply no longer an adequate supply of crude oil" nearby.

Growing demand

Drillers across the country complain of maturing wells that are slowly running low. Gas or liquid is sometimes injected into reservoirs at higher cost to keep up the flow.

However, oil reserves are expected to last for decades around Bakersfield and elsewhere, according to industry and government estimates. Fresh national reserves are found each year. To make up for older wells, oil companies regularly drill new ones -- about 9,800 last year. Underground discoveries and technological strides have kept domestic reserves at the same level as in 1999.

With demand growing, though, the United States has imported an expanding share of its oil from abroad -- and quotas kept by Mideast nations do lift its price.

It's also true there's a new big buyer of oil: China, with its flourishing economy. Yet even China hasn't outstripped the world's capacity to deliver more oil, at least so far. Since 1999, world supplies grew four times more than China's imports, federal data show.

Imports were impractical at inland Bakersfield, Shell explained. Lynn Laverty Elsenhans, the head of Shell Oil Products US, said the refinery here just wasn't viable anymore.

Shell's blunt tone began to trouble opponents of the plan. Union officer Ed Huhn, a former refinery worker who was trying to keep the place open, began to wonder if it was folly. "They were trying to discourage anybody from buying it," he says.

Skeptics like U.S. Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., got more vocal. They began to suspect that Shell wanted to shut the refinery to sell pricier gas from its bigger refineries elsewhere in the region. By taking a hit at Bakersfield, maybe Shell could come out ahead.

"They were trying to squeeze the market in every possible way," Wyden insists.

Shell spokesman Stan Mays denies that. He says it's "impossible to speculate" on whether Shell would have profited from closing the plant.

But he indirectly acknowledges that Shell didn't intend to make the refinery attractive for a competitor: "Who's going to want to buy it? We're not going to give crude supply with it."

Market manipulation

It turns out that the industry exerts quite a bit of control over supply.

For one thing, it decides to invest in new wells and refining equipment -- or not to. Though reserves have kept pretty steady, the oil industry taps those resources to varying degrees from year to year. The long price run-up first took off as the number of new wells abruptly dropped by a total of 59 percent in 1998-1999, federal records show.

One consumer advocate, Mark Cooper, refers to industry-induced supply bottlenecks as "strategic underinvestment." He views references to "discipline" in annual corporate reports as a code word for going easy on supplies.

"Anytime someone talks about 'discipline,' this suggests to me that they have market power. They're choosing what investments to make," said Cooper, research director for Consumer Federation of America.

There's evidence he may be right. A 2001 study by the Federal Trade Commission reported that some firms were deciding to "maximize their profits" by crimping supply during a Midwestern gasoline price spike. One executive told regulators "he would rather sell less gasoline and earn a higher margin on each gallon sold."

This year, the FTC reported that some oil companies were storing oil, instead of selling it right away, to await higher prices anticipated in the future.

The industry has shelved an average of 21 percent more unrefined oil from the start of 2004 through last June, the AP analysis indicates. Last spring, stocks of shelved crude reached their highest level in eight years, despite the fabulous riches at hand in high prices then.

DOJ_NMG_0098191

Such a strategy could conceivably extend to drilling, too. "If you think prices 10 years from now are going to be $100 a barrel, you might not be that enthused about producing as much as you can now," suggests energy economist Allan Pulsipher at Louisiana State University.

However upsetting to drivers, such tactics are usually viewed as legal. "A decision to limit supply does not violate the antitrust laws, absent some agreement among firms," regulators wrote in one FTC report.

Mergers Mean Quick Gains For Funds (WP/AP)

By Tim Paradis, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

The Trick Is Figuring Out Which Companies Will Be Sold Next

NEW YORK -- Investors observing the seemingly uninterrupted parade of corporate buyout announcements might wonder how much the deals and the attendant rise in stock prices will boost returns in their mutual funds. The answer depends on the type of funds they own.

Acquisition announcements often inspire investor confidence because the deals generally reflect a sense that the stock market offers bargains on desirable businesses. That notion can send stocks up in general, which benefits many mutual funds. And while the many merger announcements have prompted questions about whether the market is overvaluing some properties, mutual funds returns for the year are likely to get a boost from all the dealmaking.

One way investors can benefit from an acquisition is if a fund they own holds shares in a company being acquired. The fund's return can grow from the jump in a stock that often accompanies a buyout announcement. Shares of the company doing the acquiring typically fall, though generally only temporarily, as investors tend to frown upon the risk those companies are taking.

For Barry R. James, a portfolio manager at James Investment Research and president of the James Advantage Funds, the benefits of the buyouts are apparent, though he is quick to note potential pitfalls. The James Small Cap Fund, which has assets of $266 million and is up 13.5 percent this year, has advanced as five of the companies whose stock the fund holds were acquired in the past couple of months.

"Companies are awash in cash and they're just scratching their heads as to what do," James said of the recent flurry of deals. But he noted that even funds with narrow investment parameters can stray from a disciplined investing strategy and put returns at risk if they focus too much on anticipating the next acquisition target.

"We hope all our companies are bought out," he said. "We don't mind that at all but we're not trying to target ones that are going to be purchased."

The inherent diversity of a mutual fund, however, can limit the degree to which a jump in the price of a single stock can help the fund's return. The James funds' shares in companies that are being acquired generally rise 25 percent to 33 percent, but with positions of generally 2 percent to 4 percent, the overall effect on a fund's return is limited, James said.

Other funds seek to profit by buying shares of a company being acquired and, in a tactic known as shorting, bet that the stock price of the acquiring company will fall. Such arbitrage merger funds generally show little correlation to the overall direction of the stock market and instead benefit from an increase in acquisitions simply because that means there are more deals from which to choose.

John S. Orrico, who runs the Arbitrage Fund, said that as the world's economies grow, the possibilities increase for funds that capitalize on the spreads between stock prices and acquisition prices.

"We can cherry-pick through deals from across the globe," Orrico said. "Globalization is going to continue to be the fuel that feeds consolidation."

The Arbitrage Fund has assets of $173 million and a return this year of 5.4 percent. While the returns haven't matched those of other funds that have benefited from surging stock prices, he noted that the fund has gained during down years in the stock market.

Orrico's fund focuses on finding deals that are most likely to close and have the least shareholder opposition, financing difficulties and antitrust concerns. In doing so, the funds are less likely to bet on a deal that ultimately falls apart.

"Our approach is capital preservation while generating a return that exceeds the fixed income markets," Orrico said.

DOJ_NMG_0098192

While many types of mutual funds can benefit from increased acquisition activity, the recently announced mergers haven't been concentrated in one sector, making it difficult to pinpoint what the next takeover target might be, said Todd Trubey, an analyst at Morningstar, which tracks funds.

In any case, funds that buy stock in a company shortly before it is acquired can incur short-term capital gains taxes. Still, if the stock price rises enough, the deal could ultimately still prove beneficial for a fund's returns, Trubey said.

While mutual fund holders might welcome an increase in merger activity, there is a risk that buyout prices could become inflated and cause other stock prices to move too high.

"There's a lot of speculation driving share prices higher and people are looking at [buyout] valuations and applying those to companies that are not in deals," Trubey said. "That's a risky business."

Airline Mating Dances Pick Up (HC)

By Bill Hensel Jr., Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, November 26, 2006

Continental prepares in case it must choose

If you could take two big airlines and put them together to make one really big airline, which ones would you pick?

This has become a serious question since US Airways made a hostile bid for Delta Air Lines.

If it succeeds — and that's far from certain — it could trigger further industry consolidation.

If Houston-based Continental Airlines were left behind, it could find itself at a competitive disadvantage to far bigger competitors.

Consolidation in the airline industry has long been a topic on Wall Street.

"This has been waiting to happen for long time, everyone has been expecting consolidation," said Alan Sbarra, an industry consultant with Roach & Sbarra. "Nobody considered US Airways a player, but this clearly is a signal that everybody is in play."

Last year's merger of US Airways and America West — which has had promising results so far, but there is still difficult work to be done — revitalized the view that there are huge profits to be made through mergers and acquisitions, De- Paul University professor Joe Schwieterman said.

"The possibilities now are enormous, and every airline will be feverishly studying their options," Schwieterman said.

A quick study shows some pairings make more sense than others, and all of them present challenges.

Take a marriage between Continental and United Airlines. It's a matchup that analysts have increasingly discussed as a possibility ever since US Airways made its Delta bid.

A Continental-United pairing could raise fewer regulatory concerns than some others, JP- Morgan analyst Jamie Baker wrote in a recent report. That's because it offers a high concentration of competing service in only a handful of cities.

To pull it off, Continental would have to finance a deal and sell the unions on the benefits of combining the bigger carrier and its culture with Continental's team.

Continental won't talk specifically about what it is doing in the wake of the US Airways offer for Delta.

Larry Kellner, Continental's chairman and chief executive, indicated the carrier would consider a merger to stay competitive.

"If the landscape of the U.S. airline industry does indeed change, we'll do what we need to do to act in the best interests of you, our customers, our shareholders and the communities we serve," Kellner said in a recent recorded message to employees.

Other possibilitiesOther possible pairings that have been discussed include Continental and Northwest Airlines, American and Northwest, Delta and United or Delta and Northwest.

Discussions about what it would take to put these carriers together lead into their often-complicated histories and the nitty-gritty of their operations.

Northwest has two strikes against it: It is operating in bankruptcy, and it is fighting with its flight attendants union. No airline is keen on inheriting labor strife.

DOJ_NMG_0098193

But it could play a big role in Continental's future because it holds a so-called golden share of Continental, meaning it could stop another airline from taking over the Houston carrier. That means any pairing involving Continental would likely require that Continental be the buyer, which would mean Northwest would not have a say.

While Wall Street sounds high on the combination of US Airways and Delta, the carriers have some operational problems to solve, according to aviation consultant Mike Boyd of the Boyd Group.

"The fleets are the economic equivalent of the Hatfields and McCoys," Boyd wrote in a recent report he posted on his Web site. "777s and A330s. 737s and A320s. And a hodgepodge of other aircraft."

When the realities of maintenance programs, training curriculums and parts inventories are considered, combining two carriers with a complex mix of jets could be a big deal, he said.

Where they overlapOne of the most quantifiable factors in this discussion is the overlap — the number of cities where the two carriers compete aggressively. When federal regulators review these deals, they take a hard look at specific routes where a merger could eliminate competition, leading to higher fares.

JPMorgan determined that a merger between Delta and Continental — a deal that was considered several years ago — has a higher overlap than any other pairing, at 32 percent.

The overlap between Delta and US Airways is 18 percent, according to JPMorgan.

But the Department of Justice has been increasingly willing of late to allow mergers that once would have been thought to be anticompetitive, Judy Gechman, an antitrust specialist at Houston-based Jenkens & Gilchrist law firm, said last week.

Gechman cited the joining this year of Whirlpool and Maytag, in which the merged company wound up with 70 percent of the market, she said.

However, that trend might not continue when it comes to the airline industry.

"I think they are going to have to be very careful when they look at this because the airline industry is so critical to our country," Gechman said. "Not that clean clothes aren't."

But Schwieterman says the US Airways offer to buy Delta looks like a long shot.

"It is a bold, daring move that probably faces long odds," he said. "But it also was a wake-up call about the inevitability of consolidation."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

On The Move To Outrun Climate Change (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

SEATTLE -- As the Bush administration debates much of the world about what to do about global warming, butterflies and ski-lift operators, polar bears and hydroelectric planners are on the move.

In their separate ways, wild creatures, business executives and regional planners are responding to climate changes that are rapidly recalibrating their chances for survival, for profit and for effective delivery of public services.

Butterflies are voting with their wings, abandoning southern Europe and flying north to the more amenable climes of Finland. Ski-lift operators in the West are lobbying for leases on federal land higher up in the Rockies, trying to outclimb snowlines that creep steadily upward.

Polar bears along Hudson Bay are losing weight and declining in number as the ice shelf melts and their feeding season shrinks. Power planners in the Pacific Northwest, which gets three-quarters of its electricity from hydroelectric dams, are meeting in brainstorming sessions and making contingency plans for early snow melts, increased wintertime rainfall, lower summertime river flows and electricity shortfalls during hotter, drier summers.

With the issue of a warming planet shifting rapidly from scientific projection to on-the-ground reality, animals and plants are being compelled, along with businesses and bureaucracies, to take action aimed at self-preservation. They are doing so even as the Bush administration eschews regulations, laws or international treaties that would require limits on carbon dioxide emissions, which scientists say are the main cause of global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0098194

A newly published synthesis of 866 peer-reviewed studies of the effect of climate change on wild plants and animals has found what its author, Camille Parmesan, an assistant professor of integrative biology at the University of Texas at Austin, describes as a "clear, globally coherent conclusion."

Flora and fauna are migrating north or climbing to higher ground if they can, said Parmesan, whose paper appears in the December issue of the Annual Review of Ecology, Evolution, and Systematics. If they cannot move, she said, their numbers are often declining, their health is getting worse, and some are disappearing altogether.

"Wild species don't care who is in the White House," Parmesan said. "It is very obvious they are desperately trying to move to respond to the changing climate. Some are succeeding. But for the ones that are already at the mountaintop or at the poles, there is no place for them to go. They are the ones that are going extinct."

Among the most affected species, Parmesan said, are highland amphibians in the tropics. She said more than two-thirds of 110 species of harlequin frogs, which occupy mountain cloud forests in Central America, have become extinct in the past 35 years.

Meanwhile, many pest species -- including roaches, fleas, ticks and tree-killing beetles -- are surviving warming winters in increasing numbers. "We are seeing throughout the Northern Hemisphere that pests are able to have more generations per year, which allows them to increase their numbers without being killed off by cold winter temperatures," said Parmesan.

Federal scientists say that the first six months of this year were the warmest on record in the United States and that the five warmest years over the past century have occurred since 1998. In her review of studies measuring the impact of climate change on wild plants and animals, Parmesan said this "sudden increase" in temperatures appears to have been a tipping point, triggering substantial responses from a broad range of species.

"The magnitude of impacts is so overwhelming that many biologists are now calling this the single most important problem they need to work on," said Parmesan. "You can save all the habitat you want, but if it is not any good climatically, what is the point?"

Though President Bush has said that human activity has contributed to climate change, he has consistently rejected the idea of imposing mandatory curbs on carbon dioxide emissions.

In an interview shortly after this month's congressional elections, James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said the country would be better off setting a voluntary goal -- such as increasing the use of renewable fuels -- than dictating industrial greenhouse-gas emission levels.

"Setting a reasonably ambitious target and then exceeding it is a good way to make reasonable progress," Connaughton said.

The Bush administration has outlined a strategic plan that calls for developing technology that would reduce carbon dioxide pollution. It now spends $3 billion a year on energy research and development. But when adjusted for inflation, this money is a fraction of what the federal government spent in the past. Researchers such as Reuel Shinnar and Francesco Citro, two chemical engineers at the Clean Fuels Institute at the City College of New York, estimate the country would have to spend hundreds of billions of dollars a year to make the transition to a carbon-free society.

From the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific Northwest, the effects of global warming -- along with the responses of animals, people, businesses and bureaucracies -- are being woven into the fabric of everyday life.

On Cape Sable, on the far southwestern edge of Florida, boaters, sportsmen and scientists have watched as a rising sea level has transformed a freshwater marsh into a portion of the sea.

Where there had been saw grass, the distinctive vegetation of the Everglades, there are now mangrove trees, which thrive in salt water and open water. Redfish inhabit areas that once had been wetland. The endangered bird named after the area, the Cape Sable seaside sparrow, has fled northward.

Using historic photos and tidal gauge records, University of Miami professor Harold Wanless, chairman of the geology department, has studied the changes. Between the sinking of the land and the rise of the seas since the 1930s, the relative water level has risen nine inches, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0098195

"Freshwater marshes on Cape Sable are now evolving into more or less open marine waters," he said. "We're not talking about global warming as something that will happen in the future. Its happening right now. All the king's horses and all the king's men won't be able to put Cape Sable together again."

In the high country of western Montana, ski resort manager Tom Maclay is trying to outrun climate change by persuading the U.S. Forest Service to lease 12,000 acres across Carlton Ridge and Lolo Peak. The land, which lies above property he owns, would allow his resort to reach a top elevation of 9,100 feet.

Maclay is well aware how climate change is transforming his business and how nearby resorts have suffered from a lack of snow in recent years. At nearby Glacier National Park, the U.S. Geological Survey quantifies the change, noting that there has been a 73 percent decline since 1850 in the area of the park covered by glaciers. Many smaller glaciers are now gone, it says, and larger ones have shrunk by about two-thirds.

Maclay and his resort's chief executive, Jim Gill, are negotiating with snowmaking manufacturers who are asking for tens of millions of dollars for their services.

"Now with the snowline creeping up the hill, it's tougher and tougher for the areas that are struggling at the margins to keep their base areas full of snow," Gill said. "If you don't have a good snowmaking operation, you're not going to be able to compete."

In the Pacific Northwest, which depends far more on hydroelectricity than any region of the country, research findings on global warming from the University of Washington's Climate Impacts Group have prompted utilities, federal agencies and regional planning groups to convene brainstorming sessions in the past year.

They are looking at possible ways of mitigating power shortages as the summer flows of the region's rivers decline -- a result of less snow in the mountains and early melt.

For decades, the Pacific Northwest has had a surplus of power to send south to California during hot summer months. But if Northwest rivers run low as summers get hotter, the region could end up competing with California for power, said John Fazio, a senior power systems analyst for the Northwest Power and Conservation Council, a regional planning group.

"More and more, global warming is becoming a serious part of the planning process," said Fazio.

Climate In The Court (WP)

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

ON WEDNESDAY, the Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in what could prove to be one of the most fateful environmental cases in a generation -- or not, depending on what the justices do with it. Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency is a challenge by states and environmental groups to the Bush administration's refusal to regulate greenhouse gases as pollution.

The question of how to handle global warming is the chief environmental issue of our era. Yet the Environmental Protection Agency has refused to assume regulatory authority over greenhouse emissions. It claims that the Clean Air Act gives it no power to do so. The law, however, gives the EPA power over "any air pollutant from any class or classes of new motor vehicle . . . [that] may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." What's more, it specifically identifies effects on "climate" as an aspect of that public welfare.

The EPA goes on to argue that even if it has the power to regulate carbon emissions, it doesn't have to -- and it doesn't want to. The government cites "scientific uncertainty as to the mechanisms of global climate change." But the law on this point is clear as well: The EPA, it says, "shall" regulate any pollutant from new motor vehicles that it expects to do harm. And while all the mechanisms of climate change are not understood, greenhouse gases certainly can be expected to do harm.

The tricky legal question is whether the states and environmental groups -- or anyone else, for that matter -- have standing to bring the case. To establish standing, one has to show both that an actual injury has occurred and that winning the case would redress that injury. The problem of climate change is so huge that it creates a paradoxical barrier to litigation: Regulating one relatively small component of the problem -- emissions by new vehicles in the United States -- probably wouldn't do much overall to stop global warming. Depending on how the justices treat this question, the case could peter out.

DOJ_NMG_0098196

That would be frustrating and unfortunate. Nowhere is this administration's resistance to action on global climate change more aggravating than in its persistent refusal to use the legal powers already at hand. What an irony it would be if its lawless inaction survived judicial review because the problem is too big.

Clean Up The Navajos' Poisoned Land (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

DURING WORLD WAR II, the federal government made a deal with Navajos: If the tribe allowed uranium mining on its 27,000-square-mile reservation, the land eventually would be returned "in as good condition as received."

Instead, when the diggers left by the mid-1960s, the land was scarred by open shafts, contaminated well water and radioactive piles — often without fences or warning signs. As a Times series (latimes.com/navajo) reported last week, federal inspectors knew about the damage but did little to prevent or fix it.

What followed was unconscionable. Navajos drank from contaminated pools, slept on radioactive floors and fed their herds on land irrigated with death. Children suffered mysterious, painful illnesses and died young. One couple, Helen and Leonard Nez, lost six of their children; Helen had drunk poisoned water while pregnant.

Blame can be laid at the feet of the mining companies and even the tribal government. But it is the job of the Environmental Protection Agency and the Bureau of Indian Affairs to prevent environmental wreckage and safeguard the tribe's interests. Both fell down on the job spectacularly.

Cleanup of toxic sites has happened only in fits and starts. One obstacle is that the federal government, unaccountably, has failed to conduct the comprehensive health and environmental studies necessary to determine the extent of the harm done. After several unsuccessful efforts to obtain funding, the tribe solicited the EPA's Superfund program, to help squeeze money out of mining companies or draw from the fund's $1.6-billion cleanup money. But the low population density of the area has prevented Navajos from qualifying.

Now the tribe is once again making the case to have its radioactive land placed on the Superfund list. This should be an EPA priority; if it takes an act of Congress, then fine. The country has a historical, ethical and contractual obligation to remove the toxic health hazard it created on Navajo lands.

Mining companies, excited about cleaner new technologies and an exponentially growing demand for uranium, are once again knocking on Navajo doors, offering jobs and swearing environmental responsibility. The tribe has said no, and no it should remain — at least for now. The government should not buy from any tribal mines until the country proves that its promises and contracts aren't as flimsy as the onion-skin paper on which they were once typed.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Crackdown Sends Meth Labs South Of Border (LAT)

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

GUADALAJARA — The methamphetamine laboratories that once plagued California's hinterlands and powered a national explosion of drug abuse have been replaced by an increasing supply from Mexico, U.S. law enforcement officials say.

Methamphetamine production has surged south of the border, from Baja California ranches to the highlands of Michoacan to the industrial parks here in Mexico's second largest city, where authorities in January busted the largest laboratory ever discovered in the Americas.

The fortress-like compound ringed by high brick walls housed 11 custom-designed pressure cookers that could produce 400 pounds of the drug per day. It dwarfed anything ever found in California, where the standard cooking tool is a 23-quart beaker and a 20-pound batch is considered a good production day.

"It was the mother lode of mother lodes," a U.S. law enforcement official said.

The boom in Mexican methamphetamine production stems from successful efforts in the U.S. to control the sale of chemicals used to produce the drug, including the cold medicine pseudoephedrine.

Drug traffickers, some of them ex-convicts and fugitives from the United States, including a former chemistry professor from Idaho arrested last month, authorities say, have resettled in Mexico because of the easy access to pseudoephedrine and other chemicals.

The largest share of the chemicals is believed to be shipped to Mexico from factories in China and India and routed through Hong Kong. China has emerged as the top concern for U.S. authorities.

Like traffic in heroin and cocaine, the methamphetamine economy has become a global phenomenon. So too is the battle to control what most U.S. law enforcement authorities consider the country's greatest drug threat.

'A new ice age'

"The cliche is coming true: We've entered a new ice age," said Misha Piastro, an agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration who has worked on the U.S.-Mexico border, referring to the smokable form of the drug called ice.

The trend began surfacing about two years ago as a crackdown on the bulk distribution of ingredients cut off producers from supplies in the U.S. and, later, Canada.

The rural fringes of California metropolitan areas, including the Inland Empire, which once were centers of methamphetamine production, remain important distribution hubs. But the number of "superlab" discoveries in California has dropped from 125 in 2003 to 12 through mid-October this year, according to the DEA. Nationwide, the numbers have dropped from 130 to 19 during the same period. Superlabs are operations that can produce more than 10 pounds of methamphetamine per cooking cycle.

Authorities now estimate that 80% of the methamphetamine on U.S. streets is controlled by Mexican drug traffickers, with most of the supply smuggled in from Mexico. Methamphetamine seizures at the U.S.-Mexico border jumped 50% from 2003 through 2005, from 4,030 to 6,063 pounds.

Mapping the methamphetamine production network is difficult in a country of remote ranchlands and under-patrolled metropolitan areas. Few law enforcement authorities are trained to recognize the signs of a drug lab, including the fumes and pollutants that pose significant environmental hazards.

Nonetheless, the number of labs discovered by Mexican authorities nearly tripled from 2002 to 2005, from 13 to 37, and methamphetamine seizures more than doubled, to 2,169 pounds, during the same period. U.S. authorities believe the numbers are a fraction of actual activity, as signs of an extensive production infrastructure have surfaced in the last year or so.

Among those signs: Mexico's importation of cold medicines jumped suddenly in recent years, from 92,000 tons in 2002 to 150,000 tons in 2005. Though recently imposed restrictions have cut legal imports by about half this year, U.S. authorities believe significant amounts are still being smuggled through corruption-ridden Mexican ports.

Last December, Mexican authorities at the Pacific Coast port of Manzanillo found 5.1 million pseudoephedrine tablets hidden in a cargo of ceiling fans from China. The cache would have been enough to produce about 3 tons of finished product, authorities said.

Last November, China toughened its reporting and licensing requirements for those manufacturing, shipping, trading and exporting bulk chemicals such as pseudoephedrine, a step welcomed by international drug enforcement officials.

But Beijing did not impose limits or reporting requirements on end users. Smugglers are still free to buy millions of cold tablets, hide these in Chinese export products and ship them to Mexico or other destinations, as seen with the ceiling-fan discovery.

China also faces problems similar to those in Mexico — budget constraints, corruption, turf battles and inadequate detection and monitoring equipment.

Public health problem

In Mexico, meanwhile, drug lab discoveries have spanned the country. In Mexicali, several labs have erupted in flames. In Michoacan, authorities have discovered large production operations and believe lab activity is rife in the state's rural areas.

Producers also have flooded the Mexican domestic market with the drug, creating an epidemic of methamphetamine addiction and drug-related crime in many cities.

"It's a grave public health problem of enormous dimensions," said Victor Clark Alfaro, a border expert and director of the Binational Center for Human Rights in Tijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0098198

Guadalajara, capital of the western state of Jalisco, has emerged as a production hub for methamphetamine, authorities say. Lab activity is easily camouflaged in the metropolitan area of 4 million people, which encompasses isolated ranchlands, industrial areas and densely packed urban neighborhoods where exhaust and sewer smells mask the fumes of superlabs.

The ease of operating in Guadalajara was vividly illustrated in October, officials say, when authorities acting on an anonymous tip arrested Frederick Wells, a former Idaho State University professor who was allegedly running a superlab in his pink stucco home half a mile from the U.S. Consulate.

Wells, 57, who fled the United States in 1998 after being charged with operating a drug lab in his university office, had only to walk down the street to purchase industrial chemicals at a storefront business in Guadalajara. Authorities say Wells told them that neighbors in the quiet area of neat homes never noticed the smells during the nearly two years he operated the lab.

The enormous lab discovered in January was in a gritty area of chemical plants, small ranches and cornfields outside the city.

"We smelled things but didn't know what it was. There are lots of factories around here; you never know what you smell," said Armando Murillo, who lives behind the former lab on a small ranch where he raises goats and sheep.

Murillo's property was transformed into a campground for about 150 soldiers who guarded the lab for weeks. The suspects, a trio of chemists and former classmates at the University of Guadalajara, left behind more than 1,000 pounds of powdered methamphetamine in three barrels, and enough precursor chemicals to produce another 1,000 pounds, authorities said.

After the arrest of one suspect, authorities found four more superlabs they said were tied to the group. Another suspect is believed to have been killed by a local paramilitary-style gang, which is charged with burying alive five men at a ranch, one of them an ex-convict from Riverside County who had moved to Jalisco to get into the methamphetamine trade, a U.S. law enforcement source said.

Two other ex-convicts — one from Riverside County, the other from Phoenix — were arrested in August on suspicion of operating a lab at a ranch where Mexican authorities discovered 220 pounds of methamphetamine.

The migration south of fugitives and ex-convicts worries authorities who say it coincides with the release from U.S. prisons of many drug traffickers who have finished serving sentences dating from the early era of the methamphetamine trade.

Scarce resources

With narcotics-related violence flaring across the country, experts say Mexico is ill-prepared to open another front against methamphetamine production. The DEA has donated equipment and begun to teach their Mexican counterparts how to find drug labs, but resources for a wide-ranging enforcement effort are scarce.

Authorities in Guadalajara, for instance, delayed dismantling the lab in January because the nearest lab truck, filled with protective suits and equipment to safely dispose of chemicals, was five hours away, in Mexico City.

"The problem is too new," said Marcos Pablo Moloeznick Gruer, a political science professor at the University of Guadalajara. He said Mexican law enforcement was not "aware or concerned enough" about the rise in methamphetamine production.

Heroin Use Rising In Indy (INDYSTAR)

By Will Higgins

The Indianapolis Star, November 26, 2006

Popularity of addictive drug could lead to increased thefts

Heroin, the scourge of the '70s, is back.

While the drug still makes up a minority of the cases at Indianapolis' drug court, heroin is increasingly easy to find on the city's streets, according to police, as it is elsewhere in Indiana and the nation.

"I'm seeing a lot, lot more heroin," said Jamie Guilfoy, an IPD narcotics detective since 2001. "I never saw any up until the last year."

Guilfoy and other Indianapolis Police Department narcotics investigators have confiscated nearly 1,000 grams -- about 2.2 pounds -- of heroin this year, more than 10 times what they seized in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0098199

Indiana State Police project they will investigate close to 700 heroin cases this year, twice as many as last year and three times as many as in 2004.

Another possible indicator: A 2006 Indiana University survey found that 2.2 percent of Indiana high school seniors have tried intravenous drugs -- a 25 percent jump from the previous year. The needle is the preferred method of heroin users.

The emerging trend is nationwide, with cities such as Minneapolis; Dallas; Covington, Ky.; and Salt Lake City also reporting heroin upswings. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has confiscated heroin in slightly declining amounts the past two years, but from 2001 to 2005, seizures were up more than 50 percent compared with the previous five years.

The trend is alarming, noted a U.S. Justice Department study released last week, because heroin, more than other abused drugs, is a multifaceted plague.

"Although overall abuse levels for heroin are lower than levels for other drugs, including cocaine and marijuana, the consequences of heroin abuse are far-reaching in terms of heroin-related deaths, treatment admissions and emergency department mentions," said the National Drug Threat Assessment 2007.

Nonviolent crimes such as burglary and theft, which are already on the rise in Marion County, are likely to increase with heroin use as addicts seek ways to finance their habit, police say.

Why the surge?

Robin Parsons, director of adult services at Fairbanks Indianapolis drug and alcohol treatment center, says the heroin surge is a result of a police crackdown on OxyContin, a commonly abused prescription painkiller.

"There was an OxyContin crisis in 2000 to 2004," she said, "then law enforcement got an inkling of what was happening, and OxyContin became harder to get."

And heroin became easier.

Heroin production has expanded in Afghanistan and Mexico, according to the DEA. The Afghans mostly ship their heroin to Asia and Europe; the Mexican-produced heroin comes to the U.S. So does heroin from Thailand.

The prices of OxyContin and heroin vary, but these days, heroin's street price is higher, according to police and others. In Indianapolis, OxyContin costs about $10 a pill, compared with $20 for a comparable amount of heroin, about a tenth of a gram.

Both drugs are opiates, but OxyContin's high pales next to heroin's, said K., a 27-year-old Indianapolis woman who has tried both. "Oxy tides me over, but it's nothing, really. It's not much. Nothing like the boy."

Agreeing to an interview only if her name was not used, K., who is serving a five-month sentence for drug possession and is in the custody of the Marion County Jail, said that when she started using heroin four years ago, she had one source. Today, she said, she knows eight heroin dealers -- and all of them deliver.

The drug has cost her custody of her three children; it has driven her to prostitution. Still, K. rhapsodizes about it: "The best feeling. No worries."

A deadly habit

The typical heroin user takes three or four hits a day, said DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney, costing $60 to $80. But veteran junkies build up a tolerance to the drug, so $200-plus-a-day habits aren't unheard of.

Most of Indianapolis' heroin comes through Chicago, plagued recently by a rash of overdoses due to a deadly mixture of heroin and fentanyl, an extremely potent painkiller.

About 500 deaths have been reported this year throughout the country, though the fentanyl scare has not reached Indianapolis.

Heroin overdoses, instead of having a chilling effect, actually whet users' appetites. "When users see an OD death, they seek out that heroin, thinking it must be some really good stuff," Courtney said.

Joanna Zoltay, of the DEA's office in Chicago, said the Chicago Police Department began distributing fliers last summer aimed at alerting heroin users to the locations where the deaths had occurred. The plan was to warn them away from the area.

"Unfortunately," Zoltay said, "that seemed to . . . make people want to buy it more. They literally had traffic problems in those areas."

DOJ_NMG_0098200

Heroin is different from cocaine and methamphetamine, which are stimulants that send their users on wired, manic runs. Heroin, an opiate, relaxes a person, makes him mellow, sluggish. The strong drive for another hit, experts say, comes from the sick feeling that comes from withdrawal.

"When you're on heroin, you have to do it or else you'll be sick," said Nate Rush, an Indianapolis social worker and former heroin addict who has been clean since 1991. "And it's the worst kind of sick -- body cramping, throwing up. It's like the worst case of the flu ever. The pain goes all the way to the bones."

Impact of addiction

"People on heroin aren't the most productive people," said Eric Lawrence, director of forensic analysis at the Indiana State Police Crime Lab System. "They are unable to maintain employment. They have no money, and they have to have (the drug)."

The upshot: "If there's a continued rise in the use of heroin, you can expect a proportionate rise in burglaries, thefts and robberies," Lawrence said.

For the first eight months of this year, 508 burglaries were reported in Indianapolis, nearly twice as many as in the same period last year, though police can't say for sure that heroin is to blame.

K. has funded her habit through prostitution. Men, some of them "real nice guys," call her up; she invites them over. Her boyfriend is uncomfortable with the arrangement, she said, "but he spends the money and gets high with me after."

Like many of today's heroin users, K. didn't start off injecting the drug with a needle. She started the more palatable, less violent way: She snorted it in powder form.

Snorting gained popularity in the 1990s, according to a study by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, as heroin became more pure, more potent. Free from the needle's stigma, heroin found new converts, drug experts say.

"I told myself I'd never inject," K. said. "I was scared to death to inject it."

But the high through injection is more intense, and in just two months, K. -- like seven of 10 heroin users -- was injecting.

By then, heroin had consumed her. She gave up her children and her hobbies, which included swimming and bowling.

In jail, where she has been since September, she frequently dreams about the drug. She sees it, loads it into a syringe, and just as she sticks the needle into her arm, she wakes up, disappointed.

She has been clean since August but has twice before flunked out of rehab.

She is due to be released from prison Dec. 3. She wonders -- and fears -- what she'll do then.

Call Star reporter Will Higgins at (317) 444-6043.

IMMIGRATION:

Border Group's Finances Scrutinized (HC)

By Susan Carroll, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, November 26, 2006

Minuteman founder reveals figures, but some still wonder where the money went

For the first time, the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps has revealed a smattering of intriguing details on its finances, but some former Texas members say they're still not sure how the group has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in contributors' money.

Chris Simcox, founder of the nonprofit border watch group, posted IRS forms and an audit on his Internet site Nov. 15 in response to media reports raising concerns about how the organization was handling its contributions.

The new documents offer a glimpse into the group's finances, former Minuteman loyalists say, but leave unanswered questions. Among them: How is the group spending thousands of dollars in membership fees they've collected in the past 19 months? And what companies or other nonprofits received $277,000 — amounting to more than half the group's contributions in 2005 — for unspecified "personnel services?"

Already, questions about the group's finances and other concerns have prompted some leaders to quit. Bill Parmley, the former head of the Texas chapter of MCDC, was one of the first leaders to leave in July 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0098201

"There were just too many irregularities," Parmley said in an interview. "I just didn't want to be involved in something like that."

Simcox and his spokeswoman, Connie Hair, did not respond to repeated phone calls or messages.

In barnstorming stops across the country last year, Simcox told crowds of new recruits that the organization charged a mandatory $50 membership fee for background checks. He made exceptions for anyone who already had a concealed weapons permit, which requires an extensive background check, and for former law enforcement officers.

But the group's recently posted IRS Form 990 — a public record required for all nonprofits — shows that the group spent only $1,074 on background checks for volunteers in 2005 while charging new recruits $50 each and collecting more than $54,000 in registration fees.

Kenneth Buelter and his wife, Daphne, former Minuteman loyalists, recalled meetings where MCDC leaders explained the $50 registration fee.

"They told us it was for background checks," said Daphne Buelter.

Kenneth Buelter, a concealed-weapons permit holder, went ahead and paid the $50, considering it a donation. "I thought it was the right thing to do," he said.

'Unanswered questions'But months later, the couple decided to distance themselves from the movement, even though they still believe in the cause. "There were a great deal of unanswered questions," Daphne said.

The records Simcox posted on the Web site seem to answer some of the more serious questions raised by former MCDC members in media reports published this summer. The Washington Times reported in July that some former leaders had resigned because of financial questions, and pressed in editorials for Simcox to account for the group's donations.

The audit Simcox made public shows that an accredited firm signed off on the group's finances for the 2005 tax year, supporting his assertion that the money was handled properly.

The IRS documents filed by the fledgling organization showed that it received more than $418,000 in contributions during 2005 and owed about $31,000 at the end of the tax year. Independent accountants who reviewed the report at the Houston Chronicle's request said MCDC's finances appear to be in line with many not-for-profits that are just starting out.

Simcox defended the spending on the group's Web site. According to the IRS documents, MCDC dedicated 62.5 percent of contributions to programs, 5.2 percent to management and administration and 32.3 percent to fundraising. In his Web posting, Simcox wrote that the breakdown was "much better than most first-year start-up national organizations."

He also lashed out at the press for stories questioning the group's financing, accusing the media of "egregiously false or erroneous reporting as well as some outright malicious lies."

The Minuteman Project, the original name for the civilian patrol group, kicked off in April 2005 in Arizona amid a media frenzy. More than 100 reporters turned up for the first patrol, documenting volunteers watching the border from lawn chairs and tailgates.

Report cites resignationsThis summer, the Washington Times reported that some former top Minuteman leaders, including the former national coordinator, had quit because of their concerns over finances.

Parmley, who joined the movement out of frustration over the relentless flow of illegal immigrants across his ranch land in South Texas, said he resigned mainly because he was concerned about suspicions of racist attitudes in one Minuteman branch. He said he was also troubled because he couldn't get straight answers on money management, including what happened to the registration fees.

Kim Fromme, the former director of operations for the Minuteman chapter in Texas, had similar concerns and quit in February.

He said he could never figure out where the money for programs was going.

"It didn't go down to the border, that's for sure," Fromme said.

He said he and other members approached Simcox with questions, but came away disappointed.

During the early days of the Arizona-based movement, no one addressed the finances publicly "because the mission was so important," said Shannon McGauley, who formed a splinter group called the Texas Minutemen around the same time that MCDC launched in Arizona.

DOJ_NMG_0098202

"Now all these people are quitting because of questions about the money," he said. "When a couple people quit and start bad-mouthing, you can believe MCDC. But when you talk to them and every single one of them says the same thing, that warrants some investigating."

But MCDC still has plenty of supporters and they rallied behind Simcox in the group's Internet forum.

Chronicle reporters Terri Langford and Chase Davis contributed to this report.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Hail To The Chief (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, November 26, 2006

ANN ARBOR, MICH. -- In July 1987, then-Representative Dick Cheney, the top Republican on the committee investigating the Iran-contra scandal, turned on his hearing room microphone and delivered, in his characteristically measured tone, a revolutionary claim.

President Reagan and his top aides, he asserted, were free to ignore a 1982 law at the center of the scandal. Known as the Boland Amendment, it banned US assistance to anti-Marxist militants in Nicaragua.

"I personally do not believe the Boland Amendment applied to the president, nor to his immediate staff," Cheney said.

Most of Cheney's colleagues did not share his vision of a presidency empowered to bypass US laws governing foreign policy. The committee issued a scathing, bipartisan report accusing White House officials of "disdain for the law."

Cheney refused to sign it. Instead, he commissioned his own report declaring that the real lawbreakers were his fellow lawmakers, because the Constitution "does not permit Congress to pass a law usurping Presidential power."

The Iran-contra scandal was not the first time the future vice president articulated a philosophy of unfettered executive power -- nor would it be the last. The Constitution empowers Congress to pass laws regulating the executive branch, but over the course of his career, Cheney came to believe that the modern world is too dangerous and complex for a president's hands to be tied. He embraced a belief that presidents have vast "inherent" powers, not spelled out in the Constitution, that allow them to defy Congress.

Cheney bypassed acts of Congress as defense secretary in the first Bush administration. And his office has been the driving force behind the current administration's hoarding of secrets, its efforts to impose greater political control over career officials, and its defiance of a law requiring the government to obtain warrants when wiretapping Americans. Cheney's staff has also been behind President Bush's record number of signing statements asserting his right to disregard laws.

A close look at key moments in Cheney's career -- from his political apprenticeship in the Nixon and Ford administrations to his decade in Congress and his tenure as secretary of defense under the first President Bush -- suggests that the newly empowered Democrats in Congress should not expect the White House to cooperate when they demand classified information or attempt to exert oversight in areas such as domestic surveillance or the treatment of terrorism suspects.

Peter Shane, an Ohio State University law professor, predicted that Cheney's long career of consistently pushing against restrictions on presidential power is likely to culminate in a series of uncompromising battles with Congress.

"Cheney has made this a matter of principle," Shane said. "For that reason, you are likely to hear the words 'executive privilege' over and over again during the next two years."

Cheney declined to comment for this article. But he has repeatedly said his agenda includes restoring the presidency to its fullest powers by rolling back "unwise" limits imposed by Congress after the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal.

"In 34 years, I have repeatedly seen an erosion of the powers and the ability of the president of the United States to do his job," Cheney said on ABC in January 2002. "I feel an obligation...to pass on our offices in better shape than we found them to our successors."

Cheney's ideal of presidential power is the level of power the office briefly achieved in the late 1960s, the era of what historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr. called the "imperial presidency."

DOJ_NMG_0098203

Early in the Cold War, presidents began invoking national security to seize greater power from Congress. This concentration of authority peaked under President Richard Nixon, who famously asserted that "when the president does it, that means it's not illegal." But Watergate reawakened Congress, which passed new laws to regulate presidential power.

Cheney was a close observer of that era. He landed his first job in the federal government in 1969, when Donald Rumsfeld hired him as an assistant at the Office of Economic Opportunity. The antipoverty agency, set up by Congress during the Johnson administration, was unpopular among conservatives, and Rumsfeld's and Cheney's job was to help Nixon impose greater political control over the office.

A chief target was the agency's legal aid program, headed by Terry Lenzner. Now a private investigator, Lenzner said in a recent interview that the White House pressured him to fire lawyers who filed class-action lawsuits on behalf of the poor. But Lenzner said he could not fire them because of the way Congress had written the agency's statute.

"I was being told, 'You have to put a stop to this, you have to control these lawyers,'" Lenzner recalled. "But I said that 'If I do what you want me to do, it will violate the law.'"

The orders to fire lawyers, Lenzner said, came from other White House aides, not Rumsfeld or Cheney personally. Still, in November 1970, Rumsfeld summoned Lenzner to his office, and, with Cheney at his side, fired Lenzner because he was unwilling to follow orders.

In August 1974, Nixon resigned rather than face impeachment by Congress. The new president, Gerald Ford, asked Rumsfeld to be his White House chief of staff, and Rumsfeld again made Cheney his deputy. A year later, Rumsfeld became secretary of defense, and Cheney replaced him as Ford's top aide.

In his new role, Cheney was exposed to national security issues from the perspective of a White House that wanted to preserve secrets in the face of congressional demands for more openness. Soon after Rumsfeld and Cheney took on their new posts, Congress passed a bill to strengthen the Freedom of Information Act. The bill allowed judges to review classified documents to determine if they were being shielded for political purposes.

In October 1974, Ford vetoed the legislation, telling Congress that the bill "would violate constitutional principles." Congress, however, overrode his veto, and lawmakers soon threatened to impose further limits on presidential power.

In December 1974, The New York Times reported that the CIA had engaged in an illegal domestic spying program for two decades, tapping phones, opening mail, and breaking into homes of antiwar protesters. The article, by investigative reporter Seymour Hersh, prompted a congressional uproar.

In a memo to Ford, obtained at the Ford Presidential Library in Ann Arbor, Mich., Cheney urged the swift creation of a presidential commission to investigate the CIA. Cheney wrote that doing so was "the best prospect for heading off congressional efforts to further encroach on the executive branch."

Ford created the commission, but Congress moved in anyway. A Senate committee chaired by Idaho Democrat Frank Church began demanding access to secret documents. But Cheney soon saw a chance to convince the public that investigating intelligence operations was dangerous and unwise.

In May 1975, Hersh wrote an article discussing how US submarines eavesdropped on the Soviet Union's undersea cables. Fearing that the article had damaged national security, Cheney pushed the idea of indicting the reporter using the 1917 Espionage Act.

Making an example out of Hersh, Cheney wrote, would "create an environment" that might intimidate both the press and Congress. "Can we take advantage of it to bolster our position on the Church Committee investigation? To point out the need for limits on the scope of the investigations?" Cheney wrote. The idea, however, was scrapped to avoid attracting the Soviets' attention to Hersh's article.

The next spring, after revelations that the National Security Agency had monitored the phone calls of American civil rights and antiwar activists, Congress drafted legislation to require warrants for domestic surveillance. Cheney's allies, including Defense Secretary Rumsfeld and then-CIA director George H.W. Bush, opposed such a bill as a derogation of presidential power. But Ford decided not to fight it.

Congress passed the warrant requirement as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 -- the same law that the Bush-Cheney administration later bypassed with its warrantless wiretapping program.

DOJ_NMG_0098204

After Ford lost the 1976 presidential election to Jimmy Carter, Cheney returned to Wyoming and in 1978 won a seat in Congress, where he specialized in intelligence matters. During the Iran-contra hearings, Cheney failed to convince a majority of his colleagues that the Reagan administration was justified in ignoring the Boland Amendment, but he moved quickly to block new congressional encroachments on what he saw as a president's exclusive turf.

When the Senate passed a bill forcing presidents to notify Congress of all covert operations within 48 hours, Cheney led a successful fight to defeat the bill in the House. He argued that Congress was prone to leaks and had no authority to force the commander-in-chief to share information about covert operations.

"The 48-hour bill would 'get back' at President Reagan by tying the hands of all future presidents," Cheney wrote in a May 1988 Wall Street Journal column. "That approach will achieve nothing useful."

The next year, Cheney became defense secretary under President George H.W. Bush. In his new position, Cheney again pushed for an expansive view of presidential power -- most dramatically in late 1990, when Cheney urged Bush to launch the Gulf War without asking Congress for authorization.

For all major overseas wars from 1789 to 1950, presidents obeyed the constitutional provision giving Congress alone the power to declare war. But in Korea and Vietnam, Presidents Truman, Johnson, and Nixon defied this constraint. They asserted that the commander-in-chief had "inherent" power to take the country to war on his own.

Seeking to restore its constitutional role, Congress passed the War Powers Resolution in 1973, requiring presidents to consult Congress when sending troops into battle.

After Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait in August 1990, Bush sent 500,000 US troops to Saudi Arabia. As they prepared to attack the Iraqi forces, Cheney told Bush that it was unnecessary and too risky to seek a vote in Congress.

"I was not enthusiastic about going to Congress for an additional grant of authority," Cheney recalled in a 1996 PBS "Frontline" documentary. "I was concerned that they might well vote 'no' and that would make life more difficult for us."

But Bush rejected Cheney's advice and asked Congress for a vote in support of the war. The resolution passed -- barely. Had Congress voted no, Cheney later said, he would have urged Bush to launch the Gulf War regardless.

"From a constitutional standpoint, we had all the authority we needed," Cheney said in the 1996 documentary. "If we'd lost the vote in Congress, I would certainly have recommended to the president that we go forward anyway."

As the Gulf War proceeded, Cheney fought with Congress on other fronts. After civilian Pentagon lawyers clashed with military attorneys over the handling of any bodies contaminated by biological weapons, Cheney asked Congress to change the law to place all military attorneys under the control of civilian political appointees. Congress rejected Cheney's proposal. But in March 1992, Cheney's deputy issued an administrative order defying the expressed will of Congress.

At the same time, Cheney was thwarting Congress by refusing to issue contracts for the V-22 Osprey, a plane that was plagued with technical problems. Cheney opposed the V-22 program, but Congress appropriated funds for it.

By refusing to issue contracts, Cheney revived a Nixon-era tactic of "impounding" funds -- refusing to spend money for programs that he didn't like. Congress had passed a law in 1974 to ban impoundment. Cheney, who later said he believes the anti-impoundment law unconstitutionally infringes on executive power, ignored it.

But Congress forced Cheney to back down in July 1992, when his top assistant, David Addington, was nominated to be the Pentagon's general counsel and came before a Senate confirmation hearing.

"How many ways are there around evading the will of Congress? How many different legal theories do you have?" Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, thundered at Cheney's aide.

"I do not have any, senator," said Addington. He was confirmed only after promising that the Pentagon would restore the military lawyers' independence and issue V-22 contracts as quickly as possible.

Cheney left government after Bill Clinton was elected president in 1992, but he returned as a deeply influential vice president eight years later. His aide Addington became a dominant member of the administration's legal team, and together, Cheney and Addington made the assertion of sweeping executive powers a hallmark of George W. Bush's presidency.

One of Cheney's first acts as vice president was to convene an energy policy task force, inviting energy company lobbyists to suggest a package of tax breaks and other incentives for their companies.

DOJ_NMG_0098205

When Congress and watchdog groups requested his task force's records, Cheney successfully fought a court battle to keep them secret, arguing that presidents needed greater power to solicit candid advice. The decision gutted the Federal Advisory Committee Act, a 1972 law in which Congress tried to require such policymaking to be subject to public scrutiny.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, military lawyers objected to the administration's assertion that a president has the power to detain and interrogate terrorism suspects outside the restrictions of the Geneva Conventions. In response, the administration renewed Cheney's attempt to put military lawyers under the control of civilian appointees.

Citing a need for secrecy, the administration also erected new roadblocks to Freedom of Information Act requests, restricted access to historic presidential records, and threatened to prosecute journalists who published classified information using the 1917 anti-spying law -- the same idea Cheney toyed with in 1975.

In signing statements and legal memos, the administration, with Cheney and Addington as its driving force, has repeatedly used the war on terrorism to advance the idea that the president has vast "inherent" authority to bypass laws enacted by Congress. Even when Congress voted, a week after the 9/11 attacks, to authorize the use of military force against Al Qaeda, the administration quickly seized the moment to lay down its marker.

"[Congress cannot] place any limits on the president's determinations as to any terrorist threat, the amount of military force to be used in response, or the method, timing, and nature of the response," the Justice Department asserted in a September 2001 memo solicited by the White House. "These decisions, under our Constitution, are for the president alone to make."

The following year, the administration drew up secret legal opinions informing military and CIA interrogators that the president has the power to authorize them to violate laws banning torture.

"In order to respect the president's inherent constitutional authority to manage a military campaign against Al Qaeda and its allies, [the anti-torture law] must be construed as not applying to interrogations undertaken pursuant to his commander-in-chief authority," said an August 2002 memo, which was leaked to the media only after the abuse of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib came to light.

Then, in December 2005, The New York Times revealed that the administration was wiretapping Americans' international phone calls and e-mails without warrants, violating the 1978 surveillance law.

Three days later, Cheney sat down with reporters and laid out his belief "in a strong, robust executive authority." Bypassing the warrant law, he asserted, was "consistent with the constitutional authority of the president."

Cheney also indicated that he hopes to establish further precedents for the expansion of presidential authority. Listing other statutory constraints on presidential power, he said they "will be tested at some point." When Cheney was asked whether he believed that the pendulum of executive power had swung back far enough in the direction he desired, or whether it needed to swing back further, he demurred.

"I do think that to some extent now, we've been able to restore the legitimate authority of the presidency," he replied.

Charlie Savage is a reporter in the Globe's Washington bureau. E-mail csavage@globe.com.

As Power Shifts In New Congress, Pork May Linger (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 — Senators Ted Stevens of Alaska and Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii are the best of friends in the Senate, so close they call each other brother. Both are decorated veterans of World War II. They have worked together for nearly four decades as senators from the two youngest and farthest-flung states. And they share an almost unrivaled appetite for what some call political pork.

Mr. Stevens, an 83-year-old Republican, and Mr. Inouye, an 82-year-old Democrat, routinely deliver to their states more money per capita in earmarks — the pet projects lawmakers insert into major spending bills — than any other state gets. This year, Alaska received $1.05 billion in earmarks, or $1,677.27 per resident, while Hawaii got $903.9 million, or $746.05 per resident, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan group that tracks such figures.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader, and many Democratic candidates have railed for months against wasteful “special interest earmarks” inserted into bills “in the dark of night.” Now their party’s electoral victories mean that Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0098206

Stevens will hand Mr. Inouye the gavel of the Senate defense appropriations subcommittee, which presides over the largest pool of discretionary spending and earmarks. But if the Democratic leaders are talking about "earmark reform," that may be news to Mr. Inouye.

"I don't see any monumental changes," Mr. Inouye said in a recent interview. He plans to continue his subcommittee's approach to earmarks, he said. "If something is wrong we should clean house," he said, "but if they can explain it and justify it, I will look at it."

Meet the new cardinals, as the chairmen of the House and Senate appropriations subcommittees are known on Capitol Hill. Many have a lot in common with the Republicans they will succeed.

All have worked for years to climb to their posts, where the authority to grant earmarks puts them among the most powerful lawmakers in Congress. Like Mr. Inouye and Mr. Stevens, many have developed unusual bipartisan camaraderie while divvying up projects. By longstanding, informal agreement, the majority typically doles out about 60 percent of the money for earmarks and lets the minority pass out the rest. And they form a united front against limitations on the earmark process.

"What is good for the goose is good for the gander," Senator Patty Murray, the Washington Democrat who is set to become chairwoman of the transportation subcommittee, said last fall in a speech defending an Alaska Republican's allocation of more than $200 million in federal money for a bridge to remote Gravina, Alaska, with a population of 50. It became notorious as the "Bridge to Nowhere."

"I tell my colleagues, if we start cutting funding for individual projects, your project may be next," Ms. Murray warned. To anyone who might vote against the bridge, Ms. Murray threatened that her subcommittee would be "taking a long, serious look at their projects." Every Democrat on the Appropriations Committee voted against an amendment to strike the bridge, and after threats from Ms. Murray and Mr. Stevens, only 15 senators voted for the amendment. The bridge's future is unclear.

Earmarks became associated with corruption in Congress because of their role in bribery scandals involving the lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Representative Randy Cunningham of California. But the number and cost of such projects has soared for years. The Congressional Research Service found that over the last 12 years, the number of earmarks had tripled to 16,000, worth $64 billion a year. Critics argue that the system fosters waste and cronyism by allowing individual lawmakers to direct federal money to pet projects with little vetting or oversight, often anonymously.

Democratic Congressional leaders have pledged to end the anonymity by requiring disclosure of the lawmakers who sponsor earmarks, and some have proposed ending the practice of "airdropping" items into a bill just before final passage. But the appropriators and their allies often complain that such measures single them out unfairly, and Democratic draft proposals introduced this year left loopholes for many projects.

Some critics argue that the Democrats' proposal to disclose authorship may not do much to curb earmarks. "Transparency would be enough if we had any shame, if you were embarrassed to get an earmark for the National Wild Turkey Federation," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, referring to a $234,000 earmark in a recent agricultural bill. "But Republicans and Democrats have shown that is no longer any embarrassment." Mr. Flake recently recommended to Ms. Pelosi a rule change that would make it easier to strip members' projects out of spending bills, but no one expects either party to take that up anytime soon.

Like their Republican counterparts, many Democratic appropriators consider earmarks a venerable tradition dating to the Constitution, which gives Congress the power of the purse. They argue that lawmakers know their constituents' needs better than bureaucrats do.

"I happen to be a supporter of earmarks, unabashedly," said Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa, the Democrat set to become chairman of the appropriations subcommittee for labor, health and human services. "But I don't call them earmarks. It is 'Congressional directed funding.' "

Fourteen years ago, Mr. Harkin recalled, he started the practice of directing millions of dollars in defense spending each year toward breast cancer research. "Now, was that bad?" Mr. Harkin asked. "If you left it to the Defense Department, they never would have done it."

Many of the new Democratic chairmen are among the most experienced purveyors of political bacon. The next chairman of the full Senate Appropriations Committee is Senator Robert C. Byrd, 89, the West Virginia Democrat who may be the foremost master of the art. Dozens of West Virginia bridges, roads and public buildings bear his name. Among his recent appropriations feats was putting the Coast Guard's Operations System Center, its National Vessel Movement Center and, next summer, its National Maritime Center in his landlocked state, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense.

DOJ_NMG_0098207

The elevation of Mr. Inouye, who will oversee $400 billion a year in military spending, is good news for the Hawaiian health care system. He has directed billions in military money to such services, including a $22-million earmark for the Hawaiian Federal Health Care Network in the fiscal 2006 defense bill. And his rise may spell bad news for the brown tree snake, a nonnative predator that stalks birds. Mr. Inouye has directed several million dollars a year in spending bills to eradicate the snake from the islands, including $1.7 million in military spending in 2006.

Representative David R. Obey, the Wisconsin Democrat set to become chairman of the full House Appropriations Committee as well as the subcommittee for labor, health and human services, boasts on his Web site of securing for his district a $300,000 grant to a single dairy in Arpin, $6 million in military money to develop an airless tire in Medford and $8 million to research plastic food containers for the military in Rhinelander.

Like many members of Congress, Mr. Obey and his Republican predecessor heading the full committee, Representative Jerry Lewis of California, have relatives in government relations. Mr. Lewis's brother John works for Loma Linda University, a Seventh-day Adventist school in Representative Lewis's district that tops lists of education earmarks, thanks to his influence. A spokesman for Mr. Lewis said his brother did not lobby the federal government.

Mr. Obey's son Craig earns about $117,000 a year as vice president for government affairs at the nonprofit National Parks Conservation Association, according to its tax filings. In an interview, Mr. Obey said he had been a "zealot" about expanding the national parks since before his son was born and that, unlike some Congressional relatives, his son worked for "a public interest organization."

For his part, Mr. Obey said he had previously proposed a rule requiring lawmakers to certify that they had no financial interest in their earmarks requests. "My problem with earmarks is that it has gotten incredibly out of hand" under the Republicans, he said. With such an explosion, "it is damn near impossible to track them and protect the body."

Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, who is set to take back the gavel of the defense subcommittee, has used his authority over military spending to turn the impoverished former steel town of Johnstown, Pa., into a national hub of military contracting. Mr. Murtha recently said in a news release that he had played a role in "creating at least 7,000 defense jobs in and around the 12th District."

Although Mr. Murtha recently lost a bid to become the second in command for House Democrats, the Democratic takeover will still increase his considerable clout. In addition to delivering projects to his district, he has granted military earmarks to other lawmakers to build a singular power base within the House, and, with the Democratic takeover, three of his close allies will become cardinals as well.

One is Representative Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia, who resigned as the top Democrat on the ethics committee amid questions about his earmarks to nonprofits he founded and to a real-estate partner. Mr. Mollohan is expected to become chairman of the Science, State, Justice and Commerce Committee. So far, Democratic leaders have given no indication that they might block his ascent at the subcommittee. Another is Representative Peter J. Visclosky of Indiana, who is poised to become chairman of the Energy and Water Committee. The third, Representative Norm Dicks of Washington, a member of the defense panel, is set to be chairman of the Interior and Environment subcommittee.

Several Democratic appropriators, though, sought to tamp down expectations about how much they could spend. Senator Byron L. Dorgan, the North Dakota Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the energy and water subcommittee, said Democrats were limited by the deficit, the cost of the war in Iraq and their party's pledges of fiscal restraint. "This is going to be a very rough time," Mr. Dorgan said.

Still, he said, he hoped to expand spending on renewable energy sources and, as the senator from a semi-arid state, on water projects.

Ms. Murray, the Washington Democrat, said her party would take a less political approach to earmarks than the Republicans did. She said Republicans had bribed lawmakers with earmarks to persuade them to vote for barebones domestic spending bills. "They stuffed them with earmarks to buy votes," she said. "We are not going to do that."

DOJ_NMG_0098208

Still, in an interview with The Honolulu Advertiser the day after the election, Mr. Inouye said he and Mr. Stevens did not plan to rock the boat. “I had a chat with Senator Stevens before the election,” Mr. Inouye said. “We pledged to each other that no matter what happens, we will continue with our tested system of bipartisanship, and we’ve been doing this for the past 25 years, and it’s worked.”

Democratic "Old Bulls" To Take Charge (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Rep. John D. Dingell was new to Congress, Buddy Holly ruled the charts, Rosa Parks refused to budge from her seat on a segregated bus and Dwight D. Eisenhower occupied the White House.

And on Capitol Hill, congressional committee chairmen ruled like feudal lords over federal policy, pursuing pet causes and waging vendettas with near impunity.

In time, Dingell became one of the most fearsome.

Now Dingell, the longest-serving member of the House, and other veteran Democrats are poised to take charge of the most powerful committees when Congress convenes in January.

In the four decades that Democrats were the dominant party, chairmen's foibles, however egregious, did not threaten the party's grip on power. But with narrower margins of control and an electorate willing to switch allegiances, there is no such assumption these days.

The question now is whether the "old bulls" like Dingell know it, and if they know it, whether they can adjust.

"This majority is not the kind of majority that we used to have, and it remains to be seen whether they understand that," said one senior Democratic staffer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Building an empire

For 14 years, Dingell, a Michigan Democrat, presided over the Energy and Commerce Committee. Under his forceful and often uncompromising leadership, the panel expanded into an empire that famously claimed jurisdiction over "everything that moves, burns or is sold" in the United States.

It was in part because of the reputation of longtime chairmen like Dingell that former Speaker Newt Gingrich, who led the Republican insurgency that took control of Congress in 1995, imposed term limits for committee chairs, restricting them to three consecutive two-year terms.

But the Democrats have kept the tradition of assigning committee chairmanships by seniority. And that will elevate some of the most veteran — and oldest — members of Congress to committee leadership posts.

All but one of the new Senate chairmen are at least 60, and three are in their 80s. Three also have served for more than four decades.

The oldest is Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), who is 89 and is about to retake the helm of the Senate Appropriations Committee. He sometimes tires, aides say, but he still has full command of his senses and the respect of his peers.

It is in the House, however, where the phenomenon has attracted more attention. That's partly because Democrats have been shut out of power for 12 years, while their Senate colleagues have been in the minority for just four. And it's partly because of the irascible personalities of some of the incoming chairmen, known collectively as the "old bulls."

The three best-known are Dingell, Rep. John Conyers Jr. from a neighboring district in Michigan, and Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York. They are 80, 77, and 76 years old, respectively.

No green bananas

About two-thirds of the incoming House chairmen are older than 60.

"I don't buy green bananas," Rangel quipped recently, referring to his age.

Conyers, who served on the panels that considered the impeachment of Presidents Nixon and Clinton and who has mused about the possibility of impeaching the current president, is expected to take the helm of the Judiciary Committee.

Rangel, one of the most outspoken members of Congress, is set to lead the Ways and Means Committee, which sets tax policy.

DOJ_NMG_0098209

On Capitol Hill, staffers trade stories about the old bulls and their infirmities, shaking their heads over Dingell's hearing problems or Conyers' "senior moments." But the same staffers insist that the incoming chairmen are not only capable of taking the reins, but of handling them better than anyone else.

"There is a lot to the concept of seniority," said Jeremy Mayer, who studies Congress at George Mason University in Virginia.

"Should the people who have been in Congress the longest have the most power? The simple answer is yes, because they have more experience and they can't be steamrolled by the administration. Dingell, for instance, knows all the intricacies of the funding of at least seven federal agencies."

Another argument in favor of seniority is that it limits intraparty fighting.

The party leadership elections this month illustrated how divisive competition for leadership posts can be. A rigid, impersonal system for naming chairmen is one way to keep the peace.

"Seniority has always been a way to prevent bloodshed," Mayer said.

The downside is that it can foster autocratic behavior. In the past, Democratic leaders found the chairmen hard to control, in part because their positions did not depend on the party, and the chairmen tended to outlast the leadership.

Steven Smith, a social sciences professor who studies government and political parties at Washington University in St. Louis, says political parties have evolved since then.

"Before the 1980s, committee chairs pretty much went their own way. But since the 1980s, chairs are expected to look out for the party's overall interest," he said. "There will be some tension between committee chairs and party leaders on this."

One potential point of tension is that many of today's old bulls are old-fashioned liberals. Dingell introduces a proposal for nationalized healthcare in every session of Congress. Conyers has used his staff to pursue favorite concerns of left-wing bloggers, such as voting irregularities in the 2004 elections.

By contrast, the freshman class of Democrats includes a number of centrist or conservative Democrats, many of them uncomfortable with liberal positions on such issues as abortion, gun control and same-sex marriage.

Democratic leaders have already set their sights on 2008, with the goal of regaining the White House and expanding their margin of control in Congress.

"Democrats know that they won this election by appealing to the middle of the spectrum," Smith said. "And they know that the first rule is to do no harm, to not alienate the folks who gave them the election."

Doing that will require the incoming House Speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), herself a traditional liberal, to keep her chairmen focused on issues that promote the party's broader agenda, not necessarily their own favorite issues.

"For some, it will take a little relearning," said Smith. "They will have to make a choice: Do they want to start making a record for themselves and their party going into 2008? And what kind of record do they want it to be — a record of legislation, or a record of position-taking and rhetoric?"

Toeing the line

So far, the old bulls have stayed on message — mostly.

Conyers has stopped talking about impeaching President Bush.

Dingell has lauded the benefits of bipartisanship while promising tougher oversight of the administration.

And Rangel has remained coy about the fate of the tax cuts passed by Republicans in recent years, though he caused some heartburn when he brought up his desire to bring back the draft.

Democratic insiders say the old bulls won't overreach. They say they know better than most what it's like to gain and then lose a majority. And they haven't been in a deep freeze for the last 12 years; rather, they've been strategizing with their colleagues about how to return to power.

Steve Elmendorf, who served as senior advisor to former Rep. Richard Gephardt, who led the Democrats in both the majority and the minority, says there are two big reasons why no one in the party even whispers about challenging the old bulls, no matter how old or intemperate.

DOJ_NMG_0098210

"One, a lot of these chairman worked hard to help win. And when you win, the people who helped are going to move up," Elmendorf said. "Two, they have a tremendous amount of institutional knowledge. They served in the majority, and they can hit the ground running."

Success Of Drug Plan Challenges Democrats (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

It sounded simple enough on the campaign trail: Free the government to negotiate lower drug prices and use the savings to plug a big gap in Medicare's new prescription-drug benefit. But as Democrats prepare to take control of Congress, they are struggling to keep that promise without wrecking a program that has proven cheaper and more popular than anyone imagined.

House Democrats have vowed to act quickly after taking power in January to lift a ban on Medicare negotiations with drugmakers, which they hope will save as much as $190 billion over a decade. But House leaders have yet to settle on a strategy and acknowledge that negotiation is, in any case, unlikely to generate sufficient savings to fill the "doughnut hole," the much-criticized gap in coverage that forces millions of seniors to pay 100 percent of drug costs for a few weeks or months each year.

Drug-company lobbyists, Bush administration officials and many congressional Republicans are preparing to block any effort to increase federal control over drug prices, saying the Medicare benefit is working well. They contend that instead of saving money, government negotiations could raise drug prices for all consumers while limiting choices for people on Medicare.

"This is going to be much more of a morass than people think," said Marilyn Moon, director of the health program at the American Institutes for Research and a former trustee of the Social Security and Medicare trust funds. Negotiating drug prices is "a feel-good kind of answer, but it's not one that is easy to imagine how you put into practice."

The Medicare drug benefit, one of the Bush administration's signature domestic programs, was created in 2003 and took effect in January. It has enrolled 22.5 million seniors, some of whom had no previous drug coverage.

Polls indicate that more than 80 percent of enrollees are satisfied, even though nearly half chose plans with no coverage in the doughnut hole, a gap that opens when a senior's drug costs reach $2,250 and closes when out-of-pocket expenses reach $3,600. By the latest estimates, 3 million to 4 million seniors will hit the doughnut hole this year and pay full price for drugs while also paying drug-plan premiums.

The cost of the program has been lower than expected, about $26 billion in 2006, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. The cost was projected to rise to $45 billion next year, but Medicare has received new bids indicating that its average per-person subsidy could drop by 15 percent in 2007, to $79.90 a month.

Urban Institute President Robert D. Reischauer, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office, called that a remarkable record for a new federal program.

Initially, he said, people were worried no private plans would participate. "Then too many plans came forward," Reischauer said. "Then people said it's going to cost a fortune. And the price came in lower than anybody thought. Then people like me said they're low-balling the prices the first year and they'll jack up the rates down the line. And, lo and behold, the prices fell again. And the reaction was, 'We've got to have the government negotiate lower prices.' At some point you have to ask: What are we looking for here?"

Republicans contend that Democrats were looking for a campaign issue.

In the Nov. 7 elections, public anger over the doughnut hole helped many Democratic candidates, who pointed to the ban on government negotiations and accused Republicans of selling out to the pharmaceutical industry.

Republicans, by and large, did a poor job of defending the program, said Thomas A. Scully, a Republican and the former head of the federal unit that runs Medicare. He played a key role in creating the drug benefit.

"Black voters, poor voters -- people who generally vote Democratic -- they got the biggest benefit in 40 years and nobody told them that," Scully said.

According to those involved in the 2003 negotiations, even some Democratic bills to create a Medicare drug benefit included a ban on direct government negotiations. The reason: Seniors purchase half of all prescription drugs. The drug industry argued that a government program representing seniors would not negotiate prices, it would set them.

DOJ_NMG_0098211

If government price controls were effective, the theory goes, they could significantly lower drug-company profits and discourage medical innovation. If price controls were not effective, they could drive prices higher. If companies were required to sell to Medicare at 15 percent off the average wholesale price, for example, they might just raise the wholesale price.

"At the extreme, if everybody gets a discount, then nobody does," said Mark B. McClellan, who took over from Scully in running Medicare and recently left the job.

Proponents say the program, as it now operates, avoids that problem by relying on dozens of private insurers, which bid to offer coverage to Medicare recipients. Some offer low premiums and lots of generic drugs, while others have high premiums but offer brand-name drugs and full doughnut-hole coverage. Medicare averages the bids and sets a per-person subsidy. Pressure falls on the insurers to negotiate the best drug prices.

Consumer advocates contend that if Medicare were permitted to negotiate prices, its purchasing power would produce drug discounts similar to those obtained by the Veterans Affairs Department, which covers 4.4 million people. As it is, Medicare prices are significantly higher than VA prices, according to Families USA, a nonprofit association of health-care consumers that analyzed 20 drugs commonly prescribed to seniors.

Even Medicaid, the federal health program for the poor, appears to employ better negotiators than the private Medicare plans. On Jan. 1, 6 million elderly and disabled people were switched from Medicaid pharmacy plans to the new Medicare program. Overnight, many drugmakers began selling the same drugs at higher prices. Pfizer, for example, reported saving $325 million in Medicaid discounts during the first six months of this year "due primarily to the impact of" the Medicare drug benefit, according to a company report to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"At some point, someone has to stand up to these industries that are doing so well in this program," said Robert M. Hayes, president of the Medicare Rights Center, a New York advocacy group. "It only makes sense that if the industries do less well, the taxpayers and the consumers will do better."

Medicare officials say it's not fair to compare their prices with those of Medicaid and Veterans Affairs, which do not reflect certain overhead costs in their drug prices and offer a limited number of drugs. Limiting choice would be unacceptable to many Medicare beneficiaries, said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. "I don't think seniors want the government in their medicine cabinets," he said.

For now, it is not clear how aggressively Democrats are willing to push price negotiation. Ideas range from simply repealing the ban on negotiations -- which would accomplish little if the Bush administration refuses to negotiate -- to creating a separate, government-run Medicare drug program with strong negotiating power.

Rep. Fortney "Pete" Stark (D-Calif.), who is in line to become chairman of a key health subcommittee, said he prefers a middle path, with Medicare setting ceilings from which private insurers could negotiate downward.

But Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the incoming Senate Finance chairman, is cool to the idea of government negotiation, and has committed only to holding hearings to "determine what the result would be of eliminating" the no-negotiation clause.

W.J. "Billy" Tauzin, president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said the drug lobby will "aggressively defend" the current plan. But John C. Rother, policy director for AARP, the powerful lobby for elderly Americans, said he has no doubt that the next Congress will give government some role in negotiating Medicare drug prices.

"This is an idea that's favored by 90 percent of the American public," Rother said. "It's not like you have to convince the American public that this is a good idea."

On Drug Prices, Are Democrats In A Fix? (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — With millions of seniors facing premium hikes for their Medicare prescription plans, Democrats say they have a solution: Use the government's massive buying power to bargain for rock-bottom drug prices. The Department of Veterans Affairs does it for 5 million patients, they point out, so why not Medicare with its 43 million?

DOJ_NMG_0098212

Medicare already sets rates for hospitals, doctors and medical equipment such as power wheelchairs — as well as drugs administered in doctors' offices. It was only the Republicans' ideological commitment to the private sector that led them to bar the government from negotiating discounts with drug companies, Democrats contend.

But the VA model may not be readily adaptable to Medicare, some independent experts say. And policy differences among Democrats, along with the Bush administration's opposition to government price-setting, may further complicate the task of reaching a goal that Democrats have set for themselves when they take over Congress in January.

In addition, newly announced discounts by drug companies could have an impact on the Democrats' effort before it gets started. At least one major manufacturer is offering help to seniors who have trouble paying for their drugs.

"From a rhetorical perspective, Democrats may feel like they gain a lot with this issue, but there are many substantive hurdles that the government faces in trying to negotiate prices," said Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm that tracks the Medicare prescription program.

"If you look historically at the government's experience in trying to regulate prices, it's poor."

VA's lower prices

Although costs for the Medicare drug program are lower than the government originally projected, there is evidence that prices could be lower still. A recent Consumers Union study of the prices charged in South Florida for six widely used drugs found that the Veterans Administration's average prices were 54% lower than Medicare's.

"Medicare is overwhelmingly the largest purchaser, and it's ridiculous for Medicare not to get the best deal of all institutional purchasers," said Ron Pollack, executive director of the advocacy group Families USA. The VA's experience shows what the potential could be, he added.

Yet applying the VA approach to Medicare may prove difficult. For one thing, Medicare is much larger and more diverse.

VA officials can negotiate major price discounts because they restrict the number of drugs on their coverage list. Instead of seven or eight drugs for a given medical problem, the VA list may contain three or four. If a drug company fails to offer a hefty discount, its product may not make the cut.

For example, VA beneficiaries can get Zocor for high cholesterol, but not Lipitor. In all, the VA covers about 1,300 medications. By comparison, the most popular Medicare plan — AARP MedicareRx — covers about 4,300.

But VA patients who want drugs that are not on the department's list must go outside the system.

In other words, the VA offers lower drug prices, but fewer choices.

American consumers have repeatedly resisted efforts to save money on medical care by restricting choice. Health maintenance organizations, for example, were once seen as the answer to rising healthcare costs, but millions of people rejected the approach, saying they wanted the freedom to choose their doctors.

One prominent advocate of government-negotiated prices has had a change of heart. Tommy G. Thompson, President Bush's first Health and Human Services secretary, once expressed regret that he hadn't been given the power to bargain.

But in a recent interview he said: "This plan is working much better than ever anticipated. When you've got a law that is working well in the federal government, why change it?"

If Medicare had the legal authority to negotiate prices, some experts predict it would do well in categories of drugs where there are lots of choices, such as blood pressure pills. But for new or cutting-edge drugs, a manufacturer could have the upper hand. A company could launch a television ad blitz to pressure Congress into raising Medicare prices.

"For categories of drugs that are not competitive, my guess is the manufacturer would not cave in on prices," said economist John E. Calfee of the business-oriented American Enterprise Institute. "Those are the drugs that have defied price controls."

Other experts say it wouldn't be that easy to push Medicare around.

"The VA had to resort to a preferred drug list, but I don't think that Medicare would have to restrict its list very much because it is such a huge purchaser," said Dr. David Blumenthal, a professor of medicine and public health at Harvard University. "Medicare's power in the marketplace is such that I think every manufacturer would have to take its prices."

Two possible paths

DOJ_NMG_0098213

House Democrats have promised action in the first 100 hours of the new Congress to give Medicare bargaining power. One poll showed that 77% of Americans supported the idea.

When the GOP-controlled Congress created the Medicare prescription plan in 2003, it expressly barred the government from negotiating prices on the theory that private insurance plans — which were assigned the job of delivering the benefit — could do a better job of getting discounts.

Critics called it a giveaway to the pharmaceutical industry.

"In the current program, there are no protections for beneficiaries that aren't exceeded ten times over by benefits to the pharmaceutical industry," said Rep. Pete Stark (D-Fremont), who is expected to lead the House subcommittee that oversees Medicare.

Democrats haven't spelled out a specific proposal, and Stark said there were at least two possibilities.

One would repeal the prohibition on negotiating and order Medicare to set a top price for each drug available under the program. Private insurers would still be free to bargain for even lower prices.

Such an approach would be similar to how Canada and European countries control prescription drug prices. Canadian prices are 30% to 60% lower than in the U.S. Some critics say Canadian price controls mean that patients there are not always able to get the latest medications.

The other possibility is to set up a Medicare-run plan to compete against the private plans. That is, Medicare would set up a plan using drug prices it negotiated with manufacturers. The plan, available nationwide, would compete with the privately operated plans — encouraging private plans to bargain harder for lower prices.

The two approaches aren't mutually exclusive, Stark said.

The proposal to let the government bargain with manufacturers could face additional hurdles in the Senate, where a prominent Democrat is among the leading skeptics.

As chairman of the finance committee, Sen. Max Baucus of Montana will have jurisdiction over Medicare. This year he was one of only two Democrats to vote against allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices.

A spokeswoman said Baucus planned to hold hearings next year but had not made up his mind on the issue.

The drug industry hopes that even if it loses the first high-profile battle in the House, it can still win the legislative war.

"We fully expect that Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi will deliver on her political promise, but after that we are equally confident that we will have an opportunity to educate both the members of Congress and beneficiaries across America about the benefits of the current program," said Ken Johnson, senior vice president of communications at the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

Corporate outreach

Reaching out to seniors in the Medicare prescription plan, one major drug company has launched a discount program that softens one of the most worrisome gaps in the current benefit, known as the doughnut hole. Under that provision — created to save money for the government — seniors must pay the full cost after their annual drug spending exceeds $2,250; coverage kicks in again once the total exceeds $5,100.

To help seniors caught in the doughnut hole, AstraZeneca has created a program called AZ Medicine & Me.

It makes brand-name medications such as the widely used breast cancer drug Arimidex available to qualifying seniors at $25 or less for a 30-day supply. Arimidex could cost ten times that at regular prices.

The plan was announced two days after the election.

The timing was purely coincidental, said AstraZeneca spokeswoman Abigail Baron. The company's plan had been in the works for months and was announced as soon as it received government approval, she explained.

Said Johnson: "I think you are going to see more and more of our companies trying to assist seniors who hit the doughnut hole."

ricardo.alonso-zaldivar@latimes.com

Here Come The Economic Populists (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

FOR years, the Clinton wing of the Democratic Party, exercising a lock on the party's economic policies, argued that the economy could achieve sustained growth only if markets were allowed to operate unfettered and globally.

Overcoming protests from labor unions, a traditional constituency, the Clinton administration vigorously supported free trade agreements like Nafta and agreed to China's admission into the World Trade Organization. If there was damage to workers, then the Clinton camp proposed dealing with it after it occurred — through wage insurance, for example, or worker retraining and other safety-net measures.

This approach coincided with a period of economic prosperity, low unemployment and falling deficits. Over time, this combination — called Rubinomics after the Clinton administration's Treasury secretary, Robert E. Rubin — became the Democratic establishment's accepted model for the future.

Not anymore. With the Democrats now a majority in Congress, and disquiet over globalization growing, a party faction that has been powerless — the economic populists — is emerging and strongly promoting an alternative to Rubinomics.

The populists argue that the national income has flowed disproportionately into corporate coffers and the nation's wealthiest households, and that the imbalance has grown worse in recent years. They want to rethink America's role in the global economy. They would intervene in markets and regulate them much more than the Rubinites would. For a start, they would declare a moratorium on new trade agreements until clauses were included that would, for example, restrict layoffs and protect incomes.

"We are at a point where the Reagan era might finally be over, including the eight years of Bill Clinton," said Jeff Faux, a fellow at the Economic Policy Institute, a labor-oriented research group partly financed by the A.F.L.-C.I.O. "The historic juncture here is whether the Democrats can come up with policies that get to the level of the problem."

The split is not over the damage from globalization. Mr. Rubin and his followers increasingly say that globalization has not brought job security or rising incomes to millions of Americans. The "share of the pie may even be shrinking" for vast segments of the middle class, Mr. Rubin's successor as Treasury secretary under President Clinton, Lawrence H. Summers, recently wrote in an op-ed in The Financial Times. And the populists certainly agree.

But the Rubin camp argues that regulating trade, or imposing other market restrictions, would be self-defeating.

"You pay a steep economic cost when you adopt market interventions," said Peter R. Orszag, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a leader of the Rubin group. He argued, for example, that restrictions on layoffs "would impede the ability of markets to reallocate labor efficiently."

As a result, the Rubinites contend, there would be slower economic growth and less national income to distribute — equally or unequally. It was an argument that President Clinton embraced 15 years ago in pushing Congress to approve the North American Free Trade Agreement. For workers who were damaged by free trade, the administration offered a safety net, not immunity from damage.

The economic populists argue that the trade agreements themselves are the problem. They cite several studies showing that more jobs shifted to Mexico as a result of Nafta than were created in the United States to serve the Mexican market.

"I don't see Congress passing any bilateral trade agreement that does not have strong labor and environmental standards written into it," Representative Sherrod Brown of Ohio, a Democrat just elected to the Senate, said in an interview last week.

Economic populists in and out of Congress are organizing to push their proposals, coalescing around the Economic Policy Institute. The A.F.L.-C.I.O. is a very visible member of this coalition. Unions have gained political influence because of their get-out-the vote role in battleground states like Ohio, where Democrats made substantial gains in the midterm election.

"We feel we have a stronger voice now in the deliberations of the Democratic Party," said Ronald Blackwell, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s chief economist.

Just as the populists have organized, tentatively calling their group Shared Prosperity, so has the Democratic establishment. Its counterpart is "the Hamilton Project," formed last spring to elaborate policies in anticipation of a Democratic Congress and, in 2008, a Democratic victor in the presidential election. Mr. Orszag, who was a senior economist in the Clinton administration, directs the project. The financing comes from wealthy Democrats, among them Mr. Rubin.

DOJ_NMG_0098215

As the two groups face off, Lawrence Mishel, president of the Economic Policy Institute, contends that the populists are pushing much harder than the Rubinites for government-subsidized universal health care. They also favor expanding Social Security to offset the decline in pension coverage in the private sector.

Apart from such differences, there are nevertheless crucial issues on which the groups agree. Both would sponsor legislation that reduced college tuition, mainly through tax credits or lower interest rates on student loans. Both would expand the earned-income tax credit to subsidize the working poor. Both would have the government negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare's prescription drug plan. And despite their relentless criticisms of President Bush's tax cuts, neither the populists nor the Rubinite regulars would try to roll them back now, risking a veto that the Democrats lack the votes to override.

"Any solution that you put up is going to get knocked down before you put it up," Mr. Rubin said in an interview last week, referring mainly to taxes.

Noting the Democrats' slim majority in Congress, he added, "I think you need a process that involves the president of the United States, the leaders of both parties and the leaders of both houses."

The threat of a Bush veto affects another piece of the Democratic agenda — an increase in the minimum wage. Both Democratic factions support a bill, to be introduced in January, that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15. The increase would come in three steps, spread over more than two years, with the final $7.25 not reached until spring 2009 at the earliest.

That is the same $7.25 that would be effective today if Congress had given its approval when Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts first proposed the increase in 2004. Yet Mr. Kennedy is the chief sponsor of the new attempt to raise the minimum, his strategy being that the $7.25, stretched out to 2009, is mild enough to be acceptable to Mr. Bush and many Republicans.

"After we successfully pass this increase," Mr. Kennedy said last week, "I plan to introduce a new proposal right away that will ensure that minimum-wage workers never again fall so far behind in our economy."

The minimum wage debate illustrates that in the end, economic policy might be determined less by partisan goals than by the constraints of pragmatic politics.

Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, a Democrat whose New York district includes Kingston and other economically struggling cities, asserts that the federal minimum should be $10 an hour now. Going that high right away is unrealistic, he acknowledged, but in the Congressional debate over the Kennedy proposal, Mr. Hinchey will push to have the $7.25 effective no later than the spring 2008, not 2009.

"If I went out on the street in Kingston," Mr. Hinchey said, "and said to people that the minimum wage is not going up to $7.25 until 2009, they would say to me, 'That is all the Democrats are going to do? Why did I vote for you?' "

OTHER NEWS:

State Chiefs Credit Dean For Victory (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 26, 2006

Democratic state chairmen, decrying postelection bickering, say the party's gains were in large part a result of National Chairman Howard Dean's 50-state strategy, which helped make deep inroads into Republican territory.

The state chairmen, describing themselves as angered by infighting among party leaders in the House of Representatives as well as criticism of Mr. Dean by two prominent Democratic campaign consultants, credited the Dean strategy for their victories.

The efforts of Mr. Dean, the former presidential candidate and Vermont governor, put them in a stronger position for the 2008 race for the White House, the chairmen said.

"Those folks who are criticizing him do not understand this is not a two-year strategy, but a 10-year or longer strategy to reclaim voters in the Midwest, West and South," said Lawrence Gates, the Democratic chairman in Kansas.

DOJ_NMG_0098216

Campaign consultants James Carville and Stan Greenberg have contended that Mr. Dean did not provide enough funding to win more seats as the Democrats reclaimed power in Congress.

But Mr. Gates said Mr. Dean's state-partnership program, which placed three to five full-time organizers in each of the 50 states, resulted in "a tremendously successful cycle for us in Kansas."

In the heavily Republican state, Democrats kept a hold on the governor's office, denied Republican Rep. Jim Ryun's bid for a sixth term and made gains in the Republican-dominated state legislature.

New Mexico's Democratic chairman, John Wertheim, said additional organizers and funds provided by Mr. Dean increased party turnout and helped Democrats make "huge gains in the state legislature and win control of all but one constitutional office in the state."

Mr. Gates, Mr. Wertheim and other chairmen said there was unanimous support in their ranks for the Dean plan.

"Carville and the other Washington insiders don't know what they're talking about," one chairman said.

In an analysis of the elections last week, Mr. Carville attacked Mr. Dean for not taking fuller advantage of the anti-Republican wave by pouring more funds into voter-turnout efforts in 14 House contests where Republicans held on to their seats by one percentage point or less.

Charging that Mr. Dean "should be held accountable" for those losses, Mr. Carville asked, "Do we want to go into '08 with a C-minus general at the DNC?"

Other Democratic campaign officials have been critical of Mr. Dean's emphasis on his 50-state organizing strategy, including Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee fought with Mr. Dean over funding for House races. He, Mr. Carville and Mr. Greenberg were all White House political advisers to President Clinton.

The internal bickering erupted during a parallel battle within the Democrats' leadership ranks between House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and incoming Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who won his post over Mrs. Pelosi's choice, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

Party chairmen were reluctant to publicly criticize their leadership, but some made it clear they did not think the latest squabbles were good for the party's image as it prepares to take control of Congress in January.

"To fight like this in public is embarrassing for our party," an official said.

"Democrats have been doing this for 35 years. A little success causes us to start bickering again," Mr. Gates said. "The Democrats are a feisty, independent-minded bunch. We'll have our family fights, and then we'll go on together."

But pollster John Zogby said the carping and postelection leadership fights signaled deeper problems for the Democrats and their party's future.

"This election was a rare opportunity for the Democrats. The Republicans were so wounded, you've got to ask why the Democrats did not pick up 50 seats, and we're seeing the answer right now. They couldn't agree on a campaign message, they can't agree on their leadership and they don't seem to be able to agree on anything," Mr. Zogby said.

But even some of Mr. Dean's strongest defenders acknow-ledged they sometimes wondered whether more money for voter turnout might have tipped a close race into the Democrats' win column.

"There were not a shortage of resources in New Mexico," Mr. Wertheim said. But, he added, "I might have tried to put more expenditures in chasing absentee ballots. I probably could have put more money into that if I had asked for it. It might have helped on the margins."

He noted that as things turned out, a Republican incumbent, Rep. Heather A. Wilson, won re-election by a razor-thin 875 votes.

The Hill May Look Steep For Republicans In 2008 (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

As the 2006 congressional campaign fades from memory, the 2008 Republican campaign to retake the House and Senate will get underway in coming months.

DOJ_NMG_0098217

This year, scandal and a strong anti-GOP tide were fortuitous forces for Democrats, who picked up seats that were squarely in Republican territory. Those seats are likely to be top prospects for Republicans to recapture in 2008.

In contrast, Democratic gains in swing districts in the Midwest and Democratic-leaning districts in the Northeast will be much tougher for Republicans to seize.

Target No. 1 for the GOP may well be Tom DeLay's old district in Texas. Former majority leader DeLay resigned earlier this year amid campaign finance charges, and courts said the GOP could not name a replacement on the ballot.

In a district where President Bush got 65 percent of the vote in 2004 some believed Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the Republican write-in candidate, could eke out a victory against Democrat Nick Lampson, but Lampson won.

Similarly, Republicans will probably target former representative Mark Foley's district in Florida. His safe seat turned into a tossup after Foley resigned in the page scandal that consumed Washington in the last part of the campaign. There was not enough time for the Republicans to name a replacement candidate on the ballot, according to Florida law, and Democrat Tim Mahoney won against Joe Negron, the Republican stand-in, in a close race.

Other scandal-plagued seats Republicans may target in 2008 include former representative Robert W. Ney's Ohio district and Rep. Don Sherwood's Pennsylvania district. Other heavily Republican seats captured by the Democrats include two in Indiana, one in Kansas and one in North Carolina.

But even if Republicans were to take back these seats, they would have to win about six others to take the House in 2008 -- and those six are not so clear. The Democrats will have roughly a 14-seat advantage in the House.

On the Senate side, the GOP faces more trouble. The Republicans need at least one seat -- and maybe two, depending on who wins the presidential race -- to take back the upper chamber. But while 12 Democrats are up for reelection in 2008, 22 Republicans are.

Only a few Democrats and Republicans, however, are considered vulnerable. Still, Republicans could be buffeted by a string of retirements that would make the field more competitive. As of now, the two most vulnerable Democratic senators appear to be Tim Johnson (S.D.) and Mary Landrieu (La.), while the most vulnerable Republicans are Wayne Allard (Colo.), Norm Coleman (Minn.) and John E. Sununu (N.H.).TV Ads Exceed Coverage

Television viewers in crucial Midwest states got more political information in the weeks leading up to the midterm elections from campaign advertisements than from news coverage, according to a new study.

In the seven markets studied, newscasts aired almost 4 1/2 minutes of paid political ads during a 30-minute broadcast, while only offering 1 minute 43 seconds of election news coverage.

The study was done by the Midwest News Index, a project of the University of Wisconsin's NewsLab, with support by the Joyce Foundation, a nonprofit affiliated with political reform organizations. The report studied major markets in Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin.

Most news coverage, moreover, focused on political strategy, with far less examining policy differences among candidates, according to the report. More than 10 percent of news stories were about or featured political ads.

"The data here are unambiguous: Local television news provides less news on politics than many other topics and the coverage is overwhelmingly characterized by stories on strategy, horse race, and the game of politics," Ken Goldstein, a political science professor at Wisconsin, said in a statement. "Any intelligent debate needs to begin from that starting point."

News stories, on average, lasted 76 seconds, shorter than the 89 seconds recorded in a similar study in 2002. About two in five election stories aired during the final week of the campaign. While much of the attention was focused on the horse race for Congress, one in four election stories in the Midwest looked at the state's gubernatorial race.

Denver Poised To Land '08 Democratic Convention (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, November 26, 2006

DENVER -- The Mile High City is enjoying a surge of momentum in its bid for the 2008 Democratic National Convention, thanks to Colorado's electoral tilt to the left and a well-timed burst of union activity.

DOJ_NMG_0098218

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is expected to announce the convention site in early December, and some Denver residents already are predicting their city will trump New York as the party's pick.

"I think we're a shoo-in," said Jon Caldara, president of the Independence Institute, a conservative think tank. "The Democratic Party should be rewarding the success of Democrats here because of this year's incredible election sweep."

In a state where Democratic registration ranks third behind that of Republican and unaffiliated, the Democrats reclaimed the governor's office after an eight-year Republican run, bolstered their majorities in the state legislature and captured a previously Republican House seat.

"We believed all along that if we elected a Democratic governor, our chances would be stronger," said Denver City Council member Rosemary Rodriguez, who also sits on the Denver 2008 Host Committee.

Mrs. Rodriguez noted that Denver, which last hosted a national party convention in 1908, made unsuccessful bids to host the 2000 and 2004 Democratic conventions. "We're always a bridesmaid," she said, "but I think it's finally our time."

Those previous campaigns were pretty much doomed from the start as a result of one glaring flaw: Denver had no unionized hotels. The city's private sector has long been cool to union activity, and organized labor holds a virtual veto over the Democratic Party's convention sites.

"Denver hasn't needed it [labor organizing]. The hotel industry in general takes pretty good care of its employees," said Ilene Kamsler, president of the Colorado Hotel and Lodging Association and a convention committee member.

At the same time, she said, "it's advantageous to have a union hotel because I don't think we would get the convention without it."

In April, the Denver Area Labor Federation voted to oppose the city's convention bid, citing the lack of a unionized hotel. But in late September, employees at the year-old Hyatt Denver Convention Center Hotel announced they had unionized.

Credit Mrs. Rodriguez for encouraging labor to take another stab at organizing in Denver. She met with AFL-CIO representatives earlier this year to extol the benefits of a unionized hotel in downtown Denver.

"At the meetings, I said, 'This would be good for all of us. The Democrats won't write us off immediately. It's good for the West, and it fits in with Howard Dean's 50-state strategy,' " Mrs. Rodriguez said.

Making the process more difficult was the hotel's neutrality agreement. Built with funding from a 1999 bond election, the Hyatt is run by the city hotel authority and management is forbidden from interfering in union organizing.

As a result, the mayor and City Council were unable to assist or endorse labor efforts to unionize the hotel, Mrs. Rodriguez said. "They [union organizers] were disgruntled about that, I'll be honest," she said.

Unite Here, a hotel-workers union, ultimately gained a majority of signatures in a "card-check election," in which workers only have to sign a card to approve union representation. The process allowed organizers to move much more quickly than they would have under a secret-ballot election.

"It was serendipitous timing, certainly," said Debbie Willhite, executive director of the convention committee.

Unless, of course, you're a Republican. "The downside is that the Democrats will have their big party, leave after a week," Mr. Caldara said, "and we'll be stuck with a union hotel."

Romney Leaving Mass. With Mixed Record (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

BOSTON -- He has been a successful venture capitalist and management consultant, and he saved the tainted 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympics from scandal. But it is his single term as Massachusetts governor that is Mitt Romney's chief credential in his bid for the Republican nomination for president.

He began his term four years ago on a high note, rescuing the state from an inherited budget deficit. But now, as he prepares to leave office and focus full time on his White House aspirations, his tenure is being viewed in a more mixed fashion.

While he can point to a major policy success in health care, his relationship with the Democratic-controlled legislature that made it possible is in tatters. His efforts to challenge the Democrats and promote Republican candidates for the legislature failed. His partner in the statehouse, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, lost a bid to succeed him. And Romney is leaving office with the state GOP weaker than when he arrived.

DOJ_NMG_0098219

Massachusetts is a liberal state and was the first in the nation to permit same-sex marriage. But Romney is a staunch conservative who finds himself running against all that his state symbolizes to national Republican voters -- he opposes single-sex marriage, stem cell research and abortion. That may help him with GOP conservatives who hold sway in the party's primaries. But if he wins the nomination, Romney could find himself in the same position as Al Gore in 2000 -- losing his home state in the general election.

In fact, Romney has commented that if he had known he was going to seek the presidency, he probably would have chosen to plant his flag not in Massachusetts but in Michigan, where his father, George Romney, served as governor and where the political culture is more compatible with his conservatism.

In a recent interview reflecting on his administration, Romney said he accomplished his main goals of balancing the budget, resisting any general tax increase and launching initiatives that can spur growth. He said he has shown he can surround himself with smart advisers and set high expectations.

"I am used to debating things back and forth," he said. Credited even by critics with having an agile mind, Romney said he has learned to manage by "hiring people smarter than I am and then arguing with them," adding: "I will by nature disagree when everybody has the same view; I want to hear an alternative."

Romney has run Massachusetts's government with a handful of close aides, many of them drawn from Bain & Co., the consulting firm whose venture capital arm he ran. It is top-down management, designed to keep control firmly in Romney's hands and to deliver a single, upbeat message to voters through a relentless public relations offensive.

Even before he was sworn in, Romney ordered a reorganization of the executive branch, designed to improve the coordination of government services. Warned by a predecessor, Gov. William F. Weld (R), that the departments of transportation and environment were perpetually at war, Romney ordered them to join the housing and energy agencies in a new Office for Commonwealth Development. To the surprise of many business supporters, he named Douglas Foy, a prominent environmentalist, to head the super-agency, which has worked to concentrate business development and housing close to transit lines and reduce sprawl.

Romney ordered a similar consolidation of the business, finance and economic agencies into another super-department and picked another Democrat, Robert Pozen, to run it. Foy and Pozen, along with then-Chief of Staff Beth Myers and a handful of others, formed an inner circle of decision-makers, working more or less smoothly with Romney's political team from the 2002 campaign.

Their initial challenge, a threatened state budget deficit of almost $3 billion, was created by the dot-com collapse. Having vowed in the campaign to oppose any general tax increase, Romney quickly won approval from the legislature for a variety of spending cuts.

But when those came far short of balancing the budget, Romney turned to closing what he called "loopholes" in the corporate tax code. That, along with higher local property taxes, produced millions in new revenue -- and allowed critics to challenge Romney's claim that he held the line on taxes.

As the budget crisis eased, fights with the legislature became more frequent and bitter. Romney failed to develop the warm personal relationships with Democratic leaders that Weld had enjoyed with some of their predecessors. The Democrats had no compunction about rejecting Romney's initiatives, including his push to reduce the state's top income tax rate.

Frustrated by seeing big parts of his program roadblocked, Romney mounted a major effort to change the makeup of the legislature in his midterm election in 2004. He campaigned and financed races in dozens of districts, spending $3 million, and when the returns came in, Republicans had two fewer seats than before -- leaving the Democrats with an overwhelming, veto-proof majority in both the state House and Senate.

The result has been a series of fights that have left the state politically polarized, and that reality has shaped -- and limited -- Romney's actions in the past two years. Where the Democrats have been motivated to act, he has had notable successes. His plan for health care treats it much like car insurance, requiring people to buy it or face a fine. It was tweaked and substantially expanded by the legislature, and in the final analysis, the negotiations that led to success were managed more by the Democratic leaders of the House and Senate than by the governor.

DOJ_NMG_0098220

But Romney could claim parenthood of the plan, and he presided with pride over the bill-signing ceremony, cheered on by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D) and prominent leaders of business, labor and the health-care industry.

Romney has taken the health-care bill on the road as he has carried on his undeclared campaign for the presidential nomination. He has also emphasized his efforts to hold down taxes, restore the death penalty, block research on embryonic stem cells and oppose same-sex marriages.

His national effort to portray himself as a counterforce to the liberalism of his state has not gone down well with many at home. In the 2006 campaign, Deval Patrick, the Democrat who will succeed Romney as governor, spoke out in defense of his state and its traditions.

Patrick's victory over Healey marked a kind of repudiation of the Romney legacy in Massachusetts. The Republican Party there, never robust, is now at its weakest point in years.

Romney's campaign travels as head of the Republican Governors Association kept him on the road much of the past year. But he was on the job, and deeply immersed in the details, when the collapse of a concrete ceiling in a "Big Dig" tunnel in Boston killed a motorist this summer. He forced the legislature to give him control of the independent Turnpike Authority -- power it had previously denied him -- and he fired the administrator and moved in his own people.

"He was 100 percent engaged in all the critical decisions," said Myers, the former chief of staff.

As Romney turns his focus to the presidential race, those decisions and his record will receive greater scrutiny than ever.

Romney Reaches For Reagan Touch (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, November 25, 2006

The day after the midterm elections, Governor Mitt Romney, reflecting on the GOP's punishing losses, issued a clarion call to conservatives: "We must return to the common-sense Reagan Republican ideals."

Three days later, at a State House Veterans Day ceremony, Romney invoked the former president again, saying, "As Ronald Reagan once said, 'I have seen four wars during my lifetime and none of them began because America was too strong.' "

And then last Friday, asked by a Fox News interviewer whether he was running for president, Romney said he was giving it some serious thought, because the stakes were so high. "We're going to have to make sure that we have the kind of Reagan optimism that America's looking for," he said.

Romney's repeated references to the nation's 40th president in two weeks illustrate how the governor, as he builds toward a 2008 presidential bid, is increasingly trying to cast himself in the Reagan mold -- as a patriotic, small-government conservative from outside the Beltway who's bent on repelling taxes, moral relativism, and foreign threats.

Like many Republicans, Romney has long described Reagan as one of his heroes, but as the governor's White House hopes have gained steam, his admiration has turned to emulation: Romney seems to be channeling the former president's conservative convictions, his hopeful message, and even his witty, folksy style of connecting with voters from South Carolina to Southern California.

There are many similarities between the two: Reagan and Romney portrayed themselves as bulwarks against the perils of liberalism in their home states -- Reagan in California, Romney in Massachusetts. Both have benefited from their Hollywood looks. Both have had experience in working with Democratic legislatures.

"Reagan was able to run against Washington, including people in his own party in Washington, by talking about what he achieved as governor and saying he would take those ideas to Washington," said Republican strategist Charlie Black, who was a senior Reagan adviser. "Romney can do the same thing."

Like other potential GOP candidates, Romney is also negotiating a delicate relationship with the legacy of President Bush, who is respected by Republicans for his tough tactics in fighting terrorism but continues to be plagued by low job-approval ratings. Reagan's legacy, by contrast, is seen by Republicans as largely unassailable.

DOJ_NMG_0098221

While Republican presidential hopefuls routinely try to claim the mantle of Reagan conservatism, Black said, Romney can make a good case, in large part because of his charisma and his ability to give a stirring speech. Black said he hears observers of the 2008 race describe Romney as "Reagan esque."

Romney's message on the stump often carries echoes of Reagan, who died in 2004.

Consider the acceptance speech Reagan gave in July 1980 after he won the Republican nomination for president.

"Never before in our history have Americans been called upon to face three grave threats to our very existence," Reagan said, warning that the United States was spending beyond its means, facing unprecedented danger from Soviet communism, and maintaining an unhealthy dependence on foreign oil.

And yet, Reagan voiced optimism: "There are no words to express the extraordinary strength and character of this breed of people we call Americans."

Compare those remarks with Romney's in July of this year, at a GOP luncheon in Ames, Iowa.

"We're under attack from jihadists, we're spending way too much money -- way more money than we're taking in -- [and] we're using way too much oil," Romney said, asserting that the American people were up to the test. "We face some real challenges . . . but we will rise to the occasion, as we always do."

He added, "I love America and what it stands for. I will fight for it, as you will."

Romney's evolution on abortion mirrors Reagan's, too: Like Reagan, Romney once expressed support for abortion rights but became solidly antiabortion as the presidential campaign neared.

And Romney has had help from a California humorist, Doug Gamble, who once wrote laugh lines for Reagan.

Jared Young, a spokesman for Romney's political action committee, the Commonwealth PAC, said Reagan is a worthy model.

"The governor is a conservative much like Reagan was and agrees with the Reagan principles that the Republican Party, up until recently, has sought to follow very closely," Young said. "He is a very optimistic leader, much like President Reagan was."

Ed Rollins, a veteran Republican strategist who ran Reagan's 1984 reelection campaign, said that while he wouldn't necessarily call Romney an heir to Reagan, he did see a connection.

"He shares the same principles," Rollins said. "And Reagan was about three things when he ran . . . lower taxes, less government, and national defense."

But some critics of Romney's record as governor say his tenure does not reflect a commitment to lower taxes and less government. They argue that Romney's administration -- by raising many state fees, raising corporate taxes by closing loopholes, and implementing a new comprehensive healthcare program -- has actually done the opposite.

Romney's views on national defense are less well known, and some political observers say his lack of foreign policy experience could be a liability, especially if the war in Iraq continues to dominate the headlines.

And Romney is hardly the only candidate to invoke Reagan in looking toward 2008. US Senator John McCain of Arizona, who, along with former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani, could prove to be Romney's chief rival, gave two major speeches in Washington last week laced with references to Reagan. In fact, McCain aides said they hoped the speeches would be reminiscent of an address Reagan delivered in the political vacuum after Republicans lost the White House in 1976.

But McCain, after bucking the party's right wing on immigration, taxes, and, most recently, the treatment of terrorism suspects, has not been a favorite of conservatives. So Romney, in an effort to position himself as the McCain alternative, has spent much of the past year trying to draw those voters to him.

Do We Need Another T.R.? (LAT)

By Matt Welch

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

YOU CAN READ 1,000 profiles of GOP presidential front-runner John McCain without encountering a single paragraph examining his core ideological philosophy. His career is filled with such distracting drama — torture at the Hanoi Hilton, noisy conversion to the campaign-finance-reform faith, political suicide on the Straight Talk Express — that by the time you're done with the highlights, and perhaps a few "maverick" anecdotes, time's up.

DOJ_NMG_0098222

People are forever filling in the blanks with their own political fantasies. Third party candidate! John Kerry running mate! Far-right warmonger! Republican In Name Only! But with the announcement that the popular Arizona senator has formed his presidential exploratory committee, it's time for our long national guessing game to end.

Sifting through McCain's four bestselling books and nearly three decades of work on Capitol Hill, a distinct approach toward governance begins to emerge. And it's one that the electorate ought to be particularly worried about right now. McCain, it turns out, wants to restore your faith in the U.S. government by any means necessary, even if that requires thousands of more military deaths, national service for civilians and federal micromanaging of innumerable private transactions. He'll kick down the doors of boardroom and bedroom, mixing Democrats' nanny-state regulations with the GOP's red-meat paternalism in a dangerous brew of government activism. And he's trying to accomplish this, in part, for reasons of self-realization.

The first clue to McCain's philosophy lies in two seemingly irrelevant items of gossip: His father was a drunk, and his second wife battled addiction to pain pills. Neither would be worth mentioning except for the fact that McCain's books and speeches are shot through with the language and sentiment of 12-step recovery, especially Steps 1 (admitting the problem) and 2 (investing faith in a "Power greater than ourselves").

Like many alcoholics who haven't quite made it to Step 6 (becoming "entirely ready" to have these defects removed), McCain is disarmingly talented at admitting his narcissistic flaws. In his 2002 book "Worth the Fighting For," the senator is constantly confessing his problems of "selfishness," "immaturity," "ambition" and especially "temper," though he also makes clear that his outbreaks of anger can be justifiable and even laudable when channeled into "a cause greater than self-interest."

"A rebel without a cause is just a punk," he explains. "Whatever you're called — rebel, unorthodox, nonconformist, radical — it's all self-indulgence without a good cause to give your life meaning."

What is this higher power that ennobles McCain's crankiness? Just as it is for many soldiers, it's the belief that Americans "were meant to transform history" and that sublimating the individual in the service of that "common national cause" is the wellspring of honor and purpose. (But unlike most soldiers, McCain has been in a position to prod and even compel civilians to join his cause.)

Liberals and conservatives alike fail to truly reflect his views, McCain writes, because "neither emphasizes the obligations of a free people to the nation." His main governmental inspiration is Teddy Roosevelt, the "Eastern swell who became a man of the people," whose great accomplishment was "to summon the American people to greatness." In Roosevelt's code, McCain writes approvingly, it was "absolutely required that every loyal citizen take risks for the country's sake." This is an essentially militaristic view of citizenship, one that explains many of McCain's departures from partisan orthodoxy. Unlike traditional Republicans, he will gladly butt into the affairs of private industry if he perceives them to be undermining Americans' faith in government; unlike Democrats, he thinks the executive branch generally needs more power, not less.

"Our greatness," he wrote in "Worth the Fighting For," "depends upon our patriotism, and our patriotism is hardly encouraged when we cannot take pride in the highest public institutions." So, because steroids might be damaging the faith of young baseball fans, drug testing becomes a "transcendent issue," requiring threats of federal intervention unless pro sports leagues shape up. Hollywood's voluntary movie-rating system? A "smoke screen to provide cover for immoral and unconscionable business practices." Ultimate Fighting on Indian reservations? "Barbaric" and worthy of government pressure on cable TV companies. Negative political ads by citizen groups? They "do little to further beneficial debate and healthy political dialogue" and so must be banned for 60 days before an election if they mention a candidate by name.

If his issues line up with yours, and if you're not overly concerned by an activist federal government, McCain can be a great and sympathetic ally. But chances are he will eventually see a grave national threat in what you consider harmless, or he'll prescribe a remedy that you consider unconscionable. Nowhere is that more evident than in his ideas about the Iraq war.

McCain has been banging the drum from nearly Day One to put more boots on the ground in Iraq. "There are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this," he said on "Meet the Press" on Nov. 12, "but they all require the presence of additional troops." McCain is more inclined to start wars and increase troop levels than George W. Bush or Bill Clinton. He has supported every U.S. military intervention of the last two decades, urged both presidents to rattle their sabers louder over North Korea and Iran, lamented the Pentagon's failure to intervene in Darfur and Rwanda and supported a general policy of "rogue state rollback." He's a fan of Roosevelt's Monroe-Doctrine-on-steroids stick-wielding in Latin America. And — like Bush — he thinks too much multilateralism can screw up a perfectly good war.

DOJ_NMG_0098223

The price of all this war-making, in money and manpower, would be staggering; it's hard to imagine without a draft (McCain has long been a fan of mandatory national service, at the least). But the costs to his political ambitions may even be greater. The nation is in no mood for the war we've got now, let alone a doubling-down on Iraq and ramped-up unilateralist tough talk in the Middle East. The trend lines of public opinion on these counts are not pointing in McCain's direction.

One of the many charming confessions in "Worth the Fighting For" is McCain's complaint that the man he replaced in the Senate — Republican icon Barry Goldwater — was "never as affectionate as I would have liked." Small wonder.

Goldwater, a man who seemed to emanate from Arizona's dust, was the paragon of limited government, believing to his core that the feds shouldn't tell you how to run a business or whom you can sleep with. McCain, on the other hand, is a third-generation D.C. insider who carpetbagged his way into office, believing to his core that "national pride will not survive the people's contempt for government." On Nov. 7, those conflicting worldviews collided when Arizonans voted on whether to outlaw gay marriage. McCain campaigned in favor of the ban, in the name of "preserving the sanctity" of heterosexual unions. His exhortations went down to surprising defeat. Not, one suspects, for the last time.

A Democratic Tidal Wave In New Hampshire (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

When the pack of presidential hopefuls and the reporters who follow them descend on New Hampshire in January, as the 2008 campaign begins, a surprise awaits them. For the first time in anyone's life, New Hampshire has turned into a bright blue Democratic state.

Buried in the news of the national Democratic midterm election victory was an even more dramatic power shift in the state that has become famous as the site of the first presidential primary in each cycle.

In the words of veteran New Hampshire Republican leader Tom Rath, it was "beyond historic" when the Democrats took complete control of the handsome state capitol in Concord for the first time since 1874.

Democratic Gov. John Lynch won a second term with 74 percent of the votes, providing coattails for many others on the ticket.

The Executive Council, which has the power to confirm appointees and approve state contracts, switched from 4-1 Republican to 3-2 Democratic.

The state Senate, which Republicans controlled 16-8, is now Democratic by a 14-10 margin.

The state House of Representatives, which is dwarfed in size only by the British House of Commons and the U.S. House of Representatives, went from 242-150 Republican, with eight vacancies, to 239-161 Democratic.

In addition, Democrats defeated both incumbent Republican congressional representatives in a powerful demonstration of party-line voting.

New Hampshire was not alone. Iowa, whose presidential caucuses come even earlier than the New Hampshire primary, also elected a Democrat as governor and saw both houses of its legislature flip to the Democrats.

Democrats now control both houses in 24 states; Republicans do so in 16; and nine states have split control. (Nebraska has a nonpartisan unicameral legislature.)

These numbers become more important as we approach 2010 and another census, which will provide the raw material for the next round of line-drawing for congressional and legislative districts. If Democrats can maintain their legislative advantage along with their new 28-22 lead in governorships, they will be in the driver's seat on that redistricting.

Dante Scala, a professor of political science at St. Anselm College and authority on New Hampshire politics, said there were 80,000 straight-ticket Democratic votes -- almost twice the number of straight Republican ballots in the state.

The Democrats, who for decades were a scorned minority in New Hampshire, "had much better organization and far outclassed the Republicans this time," Scala told me. "Combined with the national trend and the popularity of Governor Lynch, the Republicans were just overwhelmed."

DOJ_NMG_0098224

Rath used similar language, speaking of "an enormous surge we [Republicans] couldn't stop." It was fueled, he said, by the same anger at Washington, frustration over Iraq and disgust with the Republican Congress that prevailed nationally. But it was abetted in New Hampshire by the growing number of political independents who this year joined the Democrats in voting for change.

The force of the movement spared no one. Peter Spaulding, a longtime member of the Executive Council and a leader in John McCain's victorious 2000 New Hampshire primary campaign, lost his seat to a 71-year-old opponent who barely made any effort and who was vacationing in Belgium when the election returns came in. Dozens of longtime citizen-legislators, serving part time for $200 a term and rarely having to bother to campaign, found themselves voted out of office.

"The only successful Republicans were the ones who were not on the ballot in 2006," such as Sens. Judd Gregg and John Sununu, Rath said.

The fathers of these two senators were famous for steering the New Hampshire campaigns of Republicans who became president, but that was in the days when Republicans were dominant. Now, with Democrats resurgent and independents ever more influential, the kingmaker role may no longer be available to GOP operatives.

Republicans such as McCain, Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani may face a more hostile climate, in both New Hampshire and Iowa. And Democrats will be dealing with a constituency that, this year at least, was strongly antiwar and anti-Washington politician.

Lynch, who helped power the Democratic victory this year, has announced no favorite for the presidential nomination. He has stayed above the political battle at home, hoarding his political capital. If he chooses to endorse, it will carry more weight than any Democratic endorsement in a long time.

Dems Look To Big Sky (DENP)

By Karen E. Crummy

Denver Post, November 26, 2006

Helena, Mont. - In a state where voters backed a Republican candidate in nine of the past 10 presidential elections, Democrats suddenly find themselves in control of almost everything.

In the past two years, the party has taken control of the governor's office, the state Senate, and - depending on a Tuesday recount - has maintained a split in the state House. In the November general election, the party's U.S. Senate candidate also beat an entrenched Republican incumbent.

That makes Montana a political laboratory for national Democrats trying to determine what elements are needed for retaking the White House in 2008.

And when sorting through the reasons Democrats have taken hold in a conservative state, fingers frequently point first at Democratic Gov. Brian Schweitzer.

Midway through his first term, Schweitzer, a relative political newcomer, is a self-described "pickup-driving, God-fearing, gun-toting, red-meat- eating, take-responsibility-for-my- actions, invest-in-education kind of Democrat."

In a state where cattle outnumber people nearly 3-1, Schweitzer's prairie populist message, gift for storytelling and homespun charm have won him approval ratings upward of 70 percent.

His ability to suddenly shift from flattery and enticements to hardball tactics and steely negotiations have led to comparisons to former President Lyndon B. Johnson.

It has also led some Republicans to label him a bully, contending Schweitzer uses his popularity to threaten and intimidate freshman GOP lawmakers - or anyone else who stands in his way.

"He's a political gangster," said state Senate Minority Leader Bob Keenan.

He's got "the thing"

Love him or hate him, people appear to agree that Schweitzer has a political magnetism that can't be pinpointed, bottled or even adequately described but might need to be copied by Democrats seeking to win over independent-minded voters.

"He's that rare, high-energy individual that has 'the thing.' That Bill Clinton-Barack Obama thing," said Jerry Calvert, a political science professor at Montana State University.

DOJ_NMG_0098225

He's a 6-foot-2-inch back- slapping, bear-hugging guy's guy who gave his wife a revolver for her birthday and takes his dog to the office - every day. He's also a calculating politician who chose a Republican for his running mate, and an expert on renewable resources, a master's degree holder and an Arabic speaker.

Two days with him reveal a man obsessed by the challenges his state faces today but intrigued enough about his own future and national politics to spend hours reading blogs or watching

Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer walks his border collie, Jag, to the governor s mansion along with Mary Lou Zimmerman in Helena, Mont. Schweitzer takes Jag to work every day. (Post special / Jon Ebelt) simulcasts of Don Imus, the New York radio talk host.

Most people at the State Capitol had just arrived for work Monday and were searching for a cup of coffee, as Schweitzer - an Energizer Bunny clad in Levis, brown cowboy boots and a blue bolo tie - hurries down the hall to his office, followed closely by Jag, his border collie.

He has a critical meeting with one of the state's tribal leaders in an hour.

"I want to find a solution, but I'm going to tell him that people already think I'm too much of an Indian-lover," Schweitzer says as he plunges into a small chair. "It's not going to hurt me."

It's this image of a plain- spoken, don't-push-me-around Democrat that helped sweep Schweitzer into the governor's office two years ago - four years after his first run for office, a failed attempt to win a U.S. Senate seat.

"He showed Montana voters that he was just like them," said David Sirota, who was a political strategist for Schweitzer's gubernatorial run. He emphasized fishing and hunting access on public lands and health care for small businesses, where 85 percent of Montanans work.

But what really makes the 52-year-old Schweitzer tick is energy independence and the jobs it can bring to Montana. The cattle rancher and mint farmer received a master's degree in soil science and spent seven years in Saudi Arabia developing crop irrigation systems.

"We have to be self-reliant. We can't keep relying on dictators," he said.

His Volkswagen Jetta runs on biodiesel; small windmills sit on his window sills, and tubular devices that among other things turn sunlight into hydrogen are scattered across his desk.

He whips out a lump of coal and four test tubes filled with canola, saffron and camelina from his briefcase and is ready to launch into a lecture on renewables when he is cut short by the arrival of the tribal leader.

Despite his reputation for good relations with the state's tribes, negotiations over a gambling contract this day aren't going so well.

The tribal leader points a finger toward Schweitzer's face. The governor leans back in his chair and brushes one hand across the table.

"If we can't make a deal," he says, "I will go to radio, TV, I'll go to all the papers and tell them you rejected a good deal because you got greedy."

Two hours later, after meeting with his top aide, and exacting promises from people that they can deliver "a dozen or more Republicans" to get a deal done, Schweitzer hasn't found a solution.

But he hasn't made good on his threat either, preferring to keep talking. And now he needs to dab on his Mary Kay powder to tape a public service commercial about Indian education.

"Don't write that I'm a girlie- man," he instructs.

Before the day is out, he will have spent another few hours meeting with energy moguls from all across the country, finally inviting them to his residence to discuss ideas over cocktails.

After they leave, Schweitzer is sitting on a white, microsuede couch in the governor's mansion, actually a ranch-style home. He reaches into a blue plastic box and pulls out a .38 Smith & Wesson revolver - with laser sight. He gave it to his wife, Nancy, for her birthday a few days earlier. Is it really what she wanted?

"She didn't know it was what she wanted," he says, although he admits next year he might consider jewelry.

Drinking red wine before switching to whiskey, the father of three is flanked by his wife and 17-year-old daughter, Katrina. He also has two older sons, Khai and Ben.

DOJ_NMG_0098226

Katrina is a typical teen, rolling her eyes at him when he mimics her by saying "whatever" and letting out a long "Daaaaadd" when she finds him geeky or embarrassing. She wants a new car, but so far, she isn't getting one.

Her cellphone plays "Under Pressure" by Queen and David Bowie when Schweitzer calls.

Playing the political game

It's only 9 a.m. Tuesday and Schweitzer has already been up for five hours reading the blogs, papers and jogging on the treadmill while watching Imus on MSNBC.

He's hurtling down the hall - again - toward his office, Jag trailing quickly after him.

"We're going to change the world!" he proclaims, waving a stack of papers revealing good news about Montana's capabilities for further energy development. This leads him another step close to what he calls "The big Kahuna": his plan to deliver Montana-produced electricity to Las Vegas and Los Angeles.

"Those that are bold ... are going to be rewarded six, eight, 10 years from now," he said.

Though he gives every appearance of governing from his soul, Schweitzer has a keen political side. He quickly reviews his latest poll numbers, a 70 percent job-approval rating - down 7 percent from before the election, he says, but still high.

He has spent months of political capital trying to help Democrats win, and although he campaigned successfully for now U.S. Sen.-elect Jon Tester, results in the statehouse were mixed. The 2004 election gave Democrats a 27-24 state Senate majority, and the House was split 50-50. But this year, Republicans were able to make gains, including picking up two Senate seats.

Democrats retained control of the Senate, primarily because a Republican lawmaker defected to their side. But Democrats are down one seat in the House and waiting for a recount in a tied race. If it stays a tie, Schweitzer gets to pick the winner, splitting the House down the middle.

After reviewing his poll numbers, Jag and Schweitzer go for a walk. (He auctions off the chance to walk with him for charity. Today earned $500 for National Public Radio.) He engages in a cleansing ritual called smudging with leaders of the Crow nation before discussing oil drilling on the reservation.

Meetings with executives from Westmoreland Coal follow, and Schweitzer ducks out about 45 minutes later to give a presentation on energy.

Later, he downplays talk that he might run for the U.S. Senate in two years - "don't hold your breath" - and says he finds the bloggers' trying to recruit him to run for president entertaining.

For now, his main concern is bringing jobs and infrastructure to Montana, and he has a warning for other governors.

"If you ever see me getting off a plane in your city, know that I'm there to steal jobs," he says.

The Gospel According To Jim Wallis (WP)

By David Paul Kuhn

Washington Post Magazine, November 26, 2006

JIM WALLIS IS PREACHING ABOUT A BIBLE TORN APART. Wallis tells the crowd at the Seattle Pacific University chapel that when he was in seminary, a fellow student took hold of an old Bible and cut out "every single reference to the poor."

"And when we were done, that Bible was literally in shreds. It was falling apart in my hands. It was a Bible full of holes. I would take it out to preach and say, 'Brothers and sisters, this is our American Bible.'"

Wallis pauses. "It's like someone has stolen our faith. And when someone tries to hijack your faith, you know what? There comes a time when you have to take it back!"

For nearly two years, Wallis has traveled across the country attempting to do just that. And some would argue that those efforts have begun to bear fruit, as demonstrated by gains in the recent elections. But Wallis, America's leading progressive evangelical, contends that the issue is far larger than any one election, that the Christian conservative movement has remade Christ in its own image. "What's at stake here is not politics or social action," he insists, "but the very integrity of the word of God."

Wallis's book, God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It, spent 15 weeks on the New York Times bestseller list in 2005 and became the catalyst for his budding effort to revive progressive Christian politics. Throughout the book, Wallis argues that liberals have lost touch with the faith that defines much of American life. In the values debate, nearly all of which stems from differing perspectives of religion and moral absolutes, Democrats have traditionally been on the trailing end since the devout Jimmy Carter lost churchgoing voters to Ronald Reagan in 1980. Bill Clinton significantly narrowed the gap in 1992 by winning the Catholic vote, but even with his ability to speak comfortably about faith, by 1996, the gap widened again. Four years later, George W. Bush brought Catholic and Protestant regular churchgoers firmly into the Republican camp. Though the gap narrowed three weeks ago, cutting the GOP's advantage among regular churchgoers to 12 percentage points as concerns about the Iraq war rose to the fore, it's still uncertain whether those gains made up a trend or a onetime event.

DOJ_NMG_0098227

It is not that America has become more religious. The Gallup Organization's polling demonstrates that as far back as Franklin D. Roosevelt, the number of Americans who said they attend church weekly -- religious Christians -- has remained roughly four in 10. But how religious Christians vote has changed. In 1960, seven in 10 Catholics identified themselves as Democratic or leaning Democratic. By 2004, that number declined to 44 percent. Between 1960 and 2004, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press reported that white evangelicals went from favoring Democrats by a 2-to-1 ratio to favoring Republicans by about the same ratio -- 78 percent supported President Bush in 2004. Overall, voters who attended church at least once a week supported Bush by a margin of 20 percentage points in 2004. Furthering the divide, religious Christians turn out in presidential elections at a rate of about 10 percentage points higher than those who attend church less than once a week. By August 2006, about one in four Americans told Pew pollsters that Democrats are "friendly toward religion," down 16 percentage points from July 2003, according to Pew's annual report on religion and politics.

Over the past three decades, exit polls demonstrate that religious Christians have tended to become increasingly conservative, while the base of the Democratic Party has become more secular. The outcome is a religion gap unparalleled in modern American presidential elections, one based on church attendance instead of church denomination.

"Here's the facts," Wallis tells the crowd at Seattle Pacific University, "every major social movement in our nation's history -- abolition of slavery, women's suffrage, child labor law reform and, of course, civil rights -- was fueled and driven in large part by religion. And I want to say to the left, the progressive side: Conceding the entire territory of religion and even values to a religious and political right is the biggest mistake the left has made in years, and they must never make that mistake again."

Do the recent gains mean the Democrats are on the way to solving the problem? Not by a long shot, says American Enterprise Institute congressional scholar Norm Orenstein.

The core part of that Republican base, the Christian conservatives, was not as "ginned up this time," Ornstein says. "But does that mean they will not be ginned up in two years? Of course not."

For Wallis, the narrowing of the gap in the midterm elections was encouraging, but he emphasizes that a religion gap decades in the making can easily expand again. Presidential elections are far more contests of two characters, rather than the national mood, he stresses. In 2008, "it will depend on the Democratic candidate," he says, and "whether the discussion of faith is authentic."

THE LAST DEMOCRAT TO WIN THE PRESIDENCY with more than half of the electorate was also the last Democrat to nearly split the religious Christian vote: Jimmy Carter. Carter has been a devout Baptist for the whole of his 82 years. He lives today in the same town in which he was born and has spent the bulk of his life in the Bible Belt. He remains the pride of Plains, a diminutive town in the deep south of Georgia. To this day, political analysts chalk his 1976 victory up to his Southern heritage.

But CBS News exit polling demonstrated that for six in 10 voters, "restoring trust in government" was the number one issue that led them to support their candidate, dwarfing by three times all other issues. Carter's ability to authentically speak to his faith may have allowed voters to find a pathway to trusting his character.

"I think the American people then wanted to believe that their president was guided by moral values that were permanent and unshakable and fairly clear, and, of course, these derive from religious faith, and I don't think it has to be Christianity," Carter says, pausing and looking outward to the damp blanket of leaves covering his lawn. "But I think that's a legitimate expectation on the part of the American."

Increasingly, it became an expectation Democrats failed to meet. As the Democratic constituency became more culturally diverse in the 1960s and 1970s, a reluctance emerged to speak about religion in the public sphere. The party began a new emphasis on tolerance. A strict belief in the separation of church and state progressively became part of liberal culture. But the result, says John Green, the Pew Research Center's expert on religion and politics, was that an almost illiberal intolerance for religion emerged among some active Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0098228

"They offended some of these religious people that ought to be on their side," Green says. "Part of that is just a matter of respect." But after the 2004 presidential election illustrated once again that "moral values" were a primary motivator for a significant portion of the electorate, who went overwhelmingly Republican, prominent Democrats began to reconsider their reticence on matters of religion. They also began actively campaigning to dispel the notion that Democrats were antagonistic to people of faith.

"I have confidence that intelligent people: Joe Biden, Senator Bayh . . . and Ms. Clinton -- I think they are very carefully considering what happened in 2004 and how they can avoid the pitfalls of being branded as nonreligious and appealing to the moderate voters who were alienated before," Carter says. "I know if they are going to run for president, they are obsessed with this subject."

It is not the sincerity of prominent Democrats' faith that critics such as Carter question, but their ability to translate their religious moral center to the public. Today, about nine in 10 Americans "never doubt" the existence of God. Eight in 10 say prayer is an "important part" of their daily lives. Seven in 10 Americans believe presidents should have "strong religious beliefs," according to numerous Pew studies. But all polling suggests that most religious voters, especially white religious Christians, don't believe Democrats understand their intense faith, and therefore, the core of who they are. "It's a means of making a personal connection between you and all these millions of people you are trying to reach," says Laura Olson, a professor at Clemson University who specializes in religion and politics.

The Democratic Party has three choices in the next presidential campaign, Olson says. "One, you ignore [the religion gap]. I think they've tried that and it failed. Two, you stick to your guns. You say, okay, we're on the other side of the culture war here. We are pro-gay rights. We are pro-choice. That's a problem, too, and the left of the Democratic Party has clearly tried to do that, and that's what they believe, so they should do that. But that isn't going to fly on election night, when you are talking about the electoral college. So the third option, and the only one they are left with, is to try and redefine the debate in their own terms. You've got to take that term 'values,' that term 'morality,' and rethink what it means."

WALLIS ATTEMPTS TO STAY ABOVE THE PARTISAN FRAY, but has voted only for Democratic presidential candidates and asks congregation after congregation, "So how did Jesus become pro-rich, pro-war and only pro-American?"

"I am political. Sure, I am political," Wallis says. "But I try to be political without being partisan. I don't consult with or collaborate with Democrats on their strategy.

"There are policies right now that the Republicans are standing for -- and the administration is -- that I'm against," Wallis says, "and I want to see those policies reversed and turned around. But just Democrats' winning won't necessarily do that."

He is particularly incensed by Bush's tax cuts, for favoring the rich and ignoring the poor, as Wallis sees it. And although Wallis may strike a more conservative tone on family values and the need for personal responsibility -- he opposes legalized abortion, except when the life of the woman is in danger and in cases of rape and incest, but believes the issue should be left to state legislatures -- he is no Clintonian New Democrat. He is less sanguine about the use of U.S. military force, believing his Christianity compels exhaustive efforts for peace before using force. He broke with Democratic leadership over its support for the invasion of Afghanistan.

"They always tell me to offer the alternative to the religious right," Wallis says in Seattle, during his tour of conservative Christian colleges. "My job in life is not to be an alternative to Jerry Falwell."

More than a quarter-century ago, Falwell brought religion to the forefront of the contemporary American political debate. During the 1980 presidential election, under the banner of his newly formed Moral Majority, the conservative preacher rallied unprecedented numbers of religious Christians to the Republican cause. "When I hear a Howard Dean and Hillary [Clinton] and others talking about appealing to religious conservatives, they just have no understanding of what it is that motivates us," Falwell says. "They mistakenly think that we are Republicans. We're not. I could vote for any Democrat for president or Senate or congressman, as long as he or she was committed to the social issues properly, took a strong stand in the war on terrorism, and national defense. We'd be right there."

DOJ_NMG_0098229

The self-described "godfather of what is called the religious right," Falwell is among Wallis's harshest critics. "I've never believed that Jim Wallis was an evangelical. I've asked him on talk shows if he believes the Bible is the infallible word of God -- well, that's the cornerstone of evangelical Christianity -- and he's never been willing to say publicly that he does. I've asked him the question: Do you believe Christ is the only way to heaven? And he's never been willing to say yes? All evangelicals will say 'yes' quickly to that question."

Wallis, who doesn't accept that litmus test for evangelism, may not want to be a counter-Falwell, but increasingly, he is the most influential alternative.

In January 2005, Wallis wrote a memo on why the federal budget is a "moral document." Democratic Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) referenced the memo the following March when he spoke on the Senate floor. Reid recited the biblical story of the rich man who went to Hell for ignoring the starving beggar Lazarus at his door. Reid pledged that if Republicans cut health, education and job training programs, he would "turn this budget into a moral document."

"Jim Wallis, who is a friend of mine," Reid says, "has been a real good teacher for us . . . I think he's made us more socially conscious of the importance of religion." Reid says that when the religion gap was brought to his attention after the 2004 election, it was an awakening for him. "I think, my personal feeling is, we let the right wing take away the basis for religiosity," Reid continues. "It's to make life better for people, not have them vote one way or the other." But Reid says Democrats after 2004 could no longer ignore that their faith led many voters to the Republican camp. He contends that

Democrats have changed accordingly. It is not that Democrats have become more religious, Reid insists, but more open about their faith.

"What Jim Wallis has written, what he says every day, what I have written, is going to be at least partially effective," says Carter, whose recent book, Our Endangered Values: America's Moral Crisis, was also a bestseller. "I'm not trying to exalt myself. But I'm sure the two books that were written, had they been written five years ago, the [presidential] election may have turned out differently . . . There are values other than gay marriage, blocking gay marriage and blocking abortion, but we've, by almost default, we turned those issues that were looked upon as encapsulating all religious belief because we didn't emphasize the overwhelming portion of what, in my opinion, actually comprises the essence of religious belief."

THE SON OF CHURCHGOING EISENHOWER REPUBLICANS, Wallis was a youth group leader at his parents' church. "And then I began to have these questions, 14-year-old questions. I was living in Detroit, [in] a completely white world. I was listening to my city for the first time. I was reading newspapers now. I was paying attention to the news. I was hearing things. And, how come I didn't know anybody whose dad didn't have a job, or who didn't have a safe place to live, or who had any relatives in jail? Yet all that was happening in black Detroit, just a few blocks or miles away. How come we've never had a black preacher in church? How come we never had a black person in our church? I heard there were black churches, and who was this minister in the South named King? And I couldn't get answers to the questions."

After Wallis spent months trying to get his church to discuss segregation in Christian terms, the elders agreed to hold a discussion on racism. Wallis was selected to represent the black perspective.

"The first question was, 'Well, Jamie [his boyhood nickname], would you want Barbie to marry one?' That was my younger sister. That was the level of response."

Finally, he recalls, a church elder told him, "Christianity has nothing to do with racism. That's political, and our faith is personal."

"And," Wallis says, "I think that's the night I left [Christianity] in my head and my heart."

Race riots were occurring in cities across America by 1967. Wallis was 19. "All the white world I had grown up in was terribly afraid," he says. "And I was feeling connected to the people inside the barricade." As a student at Michigan State University, Wallis was becoming increasingly involved in the antiwar and civil rights movements. He became fascinated with Martin Luther King Jr. and was listening to Bob Dylan, reading Ho Chi Minh, Karl Marx, Che Guevara, "all the luminaries of the time. And I was not finally satisfied with them," because, as Wallis recalls, he came to believe that the leftist activist creeds did not speak to the spiritual. As Wallis was finishing college, he found that he could "never quite get rid of Jesus. He was always hanging around in my head and in my heart. So I decided to take one last look . . . I began to read the New Testament one last time. I got to the Sermon on the Mount . . . and I realized I had never heard a sermon on the Sermon on the Mount. Then I got to the 25th chapter of Matthew, and that became my conversion text, when Jesus said, 'I was hungry. I was thirsty. I was naked. I was sick. I was in prison. And you never came to me.' And the people say, 'Oh, Lord, when did we see you hungry, thirsty, or naked, or sick or imprisoned?' And he says, 'As you've done to the least of these, you've done to me.' The people who I'd met and were fighting with before were the very ones he was talking about in that passage. So I had to leave the church to find Jesus."

DOJ_NMG_0098230

Wallis decided to go to the conservative Trinity Evangelical Divinity School in Deerfield, Ill. Within months, he found a group of students who believed as he did, and an early version of his movement, Sojourners, was born. It grew to become a national Christian organization based in Washington, and remains fundamentally charged, about three decades later, with lifting people out of poverty.

Yet for all the attention directed at Wallis, 58 now and married and the father of two sons, fundraising for his organization has not dramatically increased. When I tell Wallis that some of his conservative critics say he is a general without an army, he responds: "I think we do have an army. You don't sell 200,000 copies of a book if you don't have a constituency. We are not organized, institutionalized or mobilized the way the right is. They have been doing this for 30 years."

BY THE 1970S, DEMOCRATS' DIVERSITY was a central component of their dilemma. They became "much more of a patchwork," as Clemson University's Olson puts it. Compared with the relative cultural homogeneity of the FDR coalition of labor, Catholics, ethnic whites and Southern whites, the modern Democratic Party began to focus on "a lot more little narrow constituencies under its big tent," such as the civil rights and feminist movements, which were like "little fiefdoms they had to make happy," Olson adds.

"When the Democrats became just the party of rights, they lost something, a moral appeal," Wallis contends. The Democratic patchwork frayed as some of its largest constituencies, particularly working-class whites, began to feel culturally estranged from the party. The breaking point was in 1972, when Republican Richard M. Nixon argued that a vote for Democrat George McGovern was a vote for "acid, amnesty and abortion." To many voters, McGovern embodied an emerging perception that liberals were outside the American mainstream.

Pivotal Supreme Court rulings only furthered the emerging divide. Between the presidency of John F. Kennedy and the failed bid of John F. Kerry, the court prohibited school prayer and ruled that pornography was legal and that obscenity was subject to contemporary community standards. To conservatives, this reeked of liberal relativism. By 1973, when the court ruled there was a constitutional right to abortion, religious Christians were ready to be mobilized by conservatives. But Carter was able to stem the tide of churchgoing voters from the Democratic Party.

"Carter -- because he was really one of them -- they thought, 'Well, he'll come in, and he'll be able to turn back the clock on some of these scary policy decisions that have been made,'" Olson says. "Like legalized abortion, the removal of prayer from public schools, stuff like that. But Carter couldn't hold on to them. The perception that Carter had weakened the country internationally was especially damaging," Olson adds. "Part of what fueled the emergence of the Christian right was anti-communism . . . [communism] being rightly perceived as godless was very threatening to people of faith."

By 1980, "Reagan is able to identify a constituency that is extremely ripe for mobilization, a constituency that is easy to track down," Olson continues. "The other piece of that is that even though he himself is an incredibly unlikely representative for this constituency because he's from Hollywood, he's divorced, he has not been religious his whole life like Carter, but instead, he's able to craft himself as a viable representative of this constituency just through symbolic appeals."

Reagan's call to get "government off our backs" resonated with religious Christians, many of whom by 1980 saw the federal government as furthering an overall secularization of society.

In 1980, the party platform included the "pro-life plank" for the first time. Reagan also advocated for the biblical story of creation to be taught in public schools as an alternative to evolution. And when it was still uncommon for presidential hopefuls to visit evangelicals, Reagan came and spoke at a convention of leading evangelical Christians in Dallas during the campaign, where he famously said, "Well, I know that you can't endorse me, but I only brought that up because I want you to know that I endorse you."

Reagan's appeal worked. In 1976, Carter won the white Baptist vote, 56 to 43 percent. In 1980, Reagan won it 56 to 34 percent, according to an ABC News-Harris survey at the time. In presidential elections, Democrats have not won religious

DOJ_NMG_0098231

Christians since. Richard Land, a longtime leader of the Southern Baptist Convention, says the sea change was deeper than any one issue. To Land, the debate was fundamentally over the worldview that social issues symbolize.

The core divide, Land says, is "whether you believe there are transcendent moral values or whether you don't, and believe most things are relative and situational." It was Land who sat with George W. Bush in Texas on the day of the governor's second inauguration in 1999, along with several other confidants, and recalls Bush saying, "I believe that God wants me to be president." That moment was consistent with a president who speaks in morally unambiguous terms. Bush's use of words such as "evildoers," Land adds, epitomized a belief that there are moral absolutes.

By 2004, Republicans so dominated the religious Christian vote that Bush, a practicing Methodist, won more Catholics than Kerry, who if elected, would have been the second Catholic president.

"What I criticize in John Kerry is I think he felt quite ill at ease within a deeply religious congregation or environment, and there is very little doubt that Howard Dean did, also," Carter says. It was Dean who famously stated that Job was his favorite book in the New Testament; in fact, it's in the Old Testament. Kerry did speak about morality and faith during the 2004 campaign but rarely talked about his own faith in personal terms that allowed voters to get a sense of his moral core, in stark comparison with his opponent.

JOHN KERRY IS A MAN WHO STILL BELIEVES he is fundamentally misunderstood by America. He squints his eyes in agitation when recalling how he lost the religious Christian vote to Bush. "I reread the Catholic bishops' guide after the election," Kerry says, referring to the 2004 Catholic voters' guide, in his Washington Senate office, "and you know, I suspect I get about a 95 percent on it. George Bush gets about a 5 percent. Yes, pro-life issues are central, and I understand its centrality to faith, but a lot of other things are, too. Like just and unjust war and poverty and children and our responsibility to the Earth and to each other and to future generations, and I think it's important to put those on the table." But Kerry rarely did during the 2004 election. He'll say, "During the campaign, I spoke about these choices in moral terms." But soon after, he admits, "To the degree there is a gap, it is because we have not been overt and aggressive enough about making clear what real faith is about."

When I remind Kerry that, during the 2004 election, he told PBS News, "I don't wear my religion on my sleeve," he responds, "I think some people on the other side do. I'm not asserting who or what. But it became clear as the campaign went on from there that these issues required discussion." And, Kerry realizes, at that point it was too late.

For Democrats to continue bringing in more religious Christians, experts agree, a key component will be to find a way to "neutralize the abortion issue" by "advocating for the drastic reduction of abortion," as Wallis puts it. To lessen the weight of the abortion issue, one option currently discussed in Democratic circles is the "90-10" push to reduce the abortion rate 90 percent in 10 years. "We went too far on the abortion issue," Carter says of Democrats. "We became branded with abortion."

"It's more than just saying, 'Okay, we are going to reduce it,'" Kerry says. "I think some of our rhetoric -- I plead guilty for the Democratic Party -- I think some of our rhetoric -- mine included -- has been insensitive at times to that moral dilemma."

For Democrats to successfully close the religion gap, they will have to contend with opposition within their party, stresses John Green of the Pew Center. "The activist core of the Democratic Party is drawn increasingly from groups of people that are not religious," he says. Self-described secular Americans amount to about 15 percent of the electorate, and most are Democrats. "Some of them are hostile to religion, and some of them are indifferent to it. And that has made it very difficult for them to understand this very religious country in which they are trying to do politics."

Democrats have taken notice. Last year, then-House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi began a Democratic Faith Working Group to encourage Democrats to speak about issues in moral and religious terms.

"There are a lot of Democrats who are people of faith and haven't had permission to act like it, talk like it, behave like people of faith," Wallis says. "And when they start doing that, like Tim Kaine did in Virginia, my goodness, it works."

IN 2005, VIRGINIA'S TIM KAINE BECAME THE EXCEPTION that proved the rule. About half of all voters in Virginia are religious Christians. While Protestants make up seven in 10 voters in Virginia, Kaine, a devout Catholic, was able to rebuff attempts to paint him as too liberal by speaking about his stances in Catholic terms.

Since Kaine's election, Democrats have been looking to him for answers to cross over the religion gap. "They must talk as much or more about your motivations," Kaine suggests to Democrats. "If your motivation is a spiritual motivation, share that . . . Put that first, because that matters to people more than whether offshore drilling is a good idea or bad idea. . . . You don't share your faith to make somebody else feel like you; you share your faith to tell them who you are."

DOJ_NMG_0098232

But Wallis insists that an openly religious Democratic candidate will win the presidency only when the party's liberal base becomes more centrist on issues such as abortion, more at ease with religion in the public sphere, and able to reconcile itself with the "failures of moral relativism."

"Can you win the majority of evangelicals to change sides? No, probably not," Wallis says. "But you know, the Republicans, they are not trying to win the black vote; they are trying to peel off a percentage of it in Ohio. So you try to peel off percentages of the evangelical vote." But to peel off percentages of the religious Christian vote, Wallis insists, "Democrats have got to run somebody who has a clue about religion, religious people, about poverty, about the environment, and will speak to those people in a moral language, able to talk sense about abortion. That candidate wins. That candidate wins tomorrow in America! Tomorrow!"

The Decade Of Buying Happily (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

"There was, too, a wonderful simplicity of desire. It was the last time that people would be thrilled to own a toaster or waffle iron." -- Bill Bryson

What Thanksgiving is to gluttony, the three days after it are to consumerism -- the main event. So, with Americans launching the Christmas season by storming the stores, let us recall when consumption had an exuberance remembered now only by those who experienced the 1950s.

Bill Bryson remembers. The author of 13 books (e.g., "A Walk in the Woods" and "A Short History of Nearly Everything"), Bryson's latest is "The Life and Times of the Thunderbolt Kid," a memoir of growing up in Des Moines in the '50s, when downtown department stores -- with white-gloved operators in the elevators and pneumatic tubes carrying money and receipts to and from cashiers -- served the pent-up demands of a nation making up for consumption missed during the Depression and World War II.

In 1951, when the average American ate 50 percent more than the average European, Americans, Bryson says, controlled two-thirds of the world's productive capacity, owned 80 percent of the world's electrical goods, and produced more than 40 percent of its electricity, 60 percent of its oil and 66 percent of its steel. America's 5 percent of the world's population had more wealth than the other 95 percent, and Americans made almost all of what they consumed: 99.93 percent of new cars sold in this country in 1954 were U.S. brands.

By the end of the '50s, GM was a bigger economic entity than Belgium, and Los Angeles had more cars than did Asia -- cars for a gadget-smitten people, cars with Strato-Streak engines, Strato-Flight Hydra-Matic transmissions and Torsion-Aire suspensions. The 1958 Lincoln Continental was 19 feet long.

And before television arrived (in 1950, 40 percent of Americans had never seen a television program; by May 1953 Boston had more televisions than bathtubs) America made almost a million comic books a month.

Consider what was new or not invented then: ballpoint pens, contact lenses, credit cards, power steering, long-playing records, dishwashers, garbage disposals. And remember words now no longer heard: icebox, dime store, bobby socks, panty raid, canasta (a card game).

In 1951 a Tennessee youth was arrested on suspicion of narcotics possession. The brown powder was a new product -- instant coffee.

Fifties food was, Bryson reminds us, not exotic: In Iowa, at least, folks did not eat foreign food "except French toast," or bread that was not "white and at least 65 percent air," or "spices other than salt, pepper and maple syrup," or "any cheese that was not a vivid bright yellow and shiny enough to see your reflection in."

But unlike today, when everything edible, from milk to spinach, has its moment as a menace to health, in the '50s everything was good for you. Cigarettes? Healthful. Advertisements, often featuring doctors, said smoking soothed jangled nerves and sharpened minds.

DOJ_NMG_0098233

"X-rays," Bryson remembers, "were so benign that shoe stores installed special machines that used them to measure foot sizes."

In Las Vegas, downwind from some atomic weapons tests, government technicians used Geiger counters to measure fallout: "People lined up to see how radioactive they were. It was all part of the fun. What a joy it was to be indestructible." But, Bryson dryly notes, people knew without a warning label "that bleach was not a refreshing drink."

White House security precautions were so lax that on April 3, 1956, a somewhat disoriented Michigan woman detached herself from a White House tour and wandered through the building for four hours, setting small fires. When found, she was taken to the kitchen and given a cup of tea. No charges were filed.

The '50s did have worries. When a contestant on a TV game show said his wife's astrological sign was Cancer, the cigarette company sponsoring the show had the segment refilmed and her sign changed to Aries. You could get 14 years in an Indiana prison for instigating anyone under age 21 to "commit masturbation." And to get a New York fishing license, you had to swear a loyalty oath.

Nothing has changed more for the worse since the '50s than childhood. The lives of children were, Bryson remembers, "unsupervised, unregulated and robustly" physical.

"Kids were always outdoors -- I knew kids who were pushed out the door at 8 in the morning and not allowed back in until 5 unless they were on fire or actively bleeding."

But as the twig is bent, so grows the tree: These children, formed by the '50s, grew up to be Olympic-class shoppers. They are indoors this Sunday, at malls.

The Education Of Robert Kennedy (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

Emilio Estevez's movie, "Bobby," introduces the martyrdom of Robert Kennedy to another generation of Americans, but it was Robert's reaction to his brother's death that is really most instructive to the young.

Robert Kennedy was dining at home on Nov. 22, 1963, when J. Edgar Hoover called. "I have news for you," Hoover began coldly. "The president's been shot." Kennedy turned away from his lunch companions, his hand to his mouth and his face twisted in pain.

In the ensuing months, he was devoured by grief. One of his biographers, Evan Thomas, writes: "He literally shrank, until he appeared wasted and gaunt. His clothes no longer fit, especially his brother's old clothes — an old blue topcoat, a tuxedo, a leather bomber jacket with the presidential seal — which he insisted on wearing and which hung on his narrowing frame."

But during March 1964, he visited Bunny Mellon's estate in Antigua, and spent the vacation in his room, reading a book Jackie Kennedy had given him, "The Greek Way," by Edith Hamilton.

"The Greek Way" contains essays on the great figures of Athenian history and literature, and Kennedy found a worldview that helped him explain and recover from the tragedy that had befallen him. "When the world is storm-driven and the bad that happens and the worse that threatens are so urgent as to shut out everything else from view," Hamilton writes, "then we need to know all the strong fortresses of the spirit which men have built through the ages."

Classical scholars often scorn Hamilton because she wrote in a breathless "all the glory that was Greece" mode, but her book changed Robert Kennedy's life. He carried his beaten, underlined and annotated copy around with him for years, pulling it from his pocket, reading sections aloud to audiences in what Thomas calls "a flat, unrhythmic voice with a mournful edge."

Kennedy found in the Greeks a sensibility similar to his own — heroic and battle-scarred but also mystical. He shared the awful sense of foreboding that pervades the work of Aeschylus and Sophocles, and that distinctly Greek awareness of the invisible patterns that connect events to one another, how the arrogance men and women show at one moment will twist back and bring agony later on.

Hamilton is at her best describing the tragic sensibility, the strange mixture of doom and exaltation that marks Greek drama. It was based on the conviction that good grows out of bad, virtue out of hardship, and that wisdom is born in suffering. Kennedy memorized a passage from Aeschylus, which Hamilton quotes twice in her book:

DOJ_NMG_0098234

"God, whose law it is that he who learns must suffer. And even in our sleep pain that cannot forget, falls drop by drop upon the heart, and in our own despite, against our will, comes wisdom to us by the awful grace of God."

Kennedy, recovering from his brother's murder, found in the ancient Greeks a civilization that was eager to look death in the face, but which seemed to draw strength from what it found there. The Greeks seemed more convinced of the dignity and significance of life the more they brooded on the pain and precariousness of it.

Kennedy underlined a passage of Hamilton's book in which she summarizes the rippled nature of Greek optimism: "Life for him was an adventure, perilous indeed, but men are not made for safe havens. The fullness of life is in the hazards of life. And, at the worst, there is that in us which can turn defeat into victory." If they were doctors of the spirit, the Greeks' specialty was to take grief and turn it into resolution.

The story of Kennedy's grief is the story of a man stepping out of his time and fetching from the past a sturdier ethic. He developed a bit of that quality, which greater leaders like Churchill possessed in abundance, of seeming to step from another age. Kennedy became a figure in the 1960s, but was never really of the '60s. He promoted many liberal policies but was never a member of a team since he drew strength from somewhere else.

And the lesson, of course, is about the need to step outside your own immediate experience into the past, to learn about the problems that never change, and bring back some of that inheritance. The leaders who founded the country were steeped in the classics, Kennedy found them in crisis, and today's students are lucky if they stumble on them by happenstance.

Cheney Meets Saudi King For Talks (NYT)

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 25 — Vice President Dick Cheney traveled to Riyadh, the Saudi capital, on Saturday to discuss regional security issues with King Abdullah.

Mr. Cheney was met in Riyadh by the king's brother, Crown Prince Sultan, and government ministers and leaders of the Saudi armed forces, the official Saudi Press Agency reported.

The meeting at the king's palace, which lasted for a few hours, ended at about 8:30 p.m. Saturday, a spokeswoman with the United States Embassy in Riyadh said.

The meeting touched on "the whole range of events and developments on the regional and international scenes," according to the Saudi Press Agency, particularly "the Palestinian issue and the situation in Iraq."

Mr. Cheney left the country shortly after the meeting to return to the United States.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, Megan McGinn, said the meeting lasted for two hours and covered a "wide range of issues."

Mr. Cheney's trip precedes a planned meeting between President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq in the Jordanian capital Amman in the coming week.

The high-level visits to the region come at a time when the administration is considering how to adjust its policies in Iraq, where deadly sectarian violence has been escalating.

Cheney, Saudi King Discuss Trouble Spots (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (AP) — Vice President Dick Cheney sought Saudi help on Saturday in dealing with Iraq's spiraling violence and other regional trouble spots where U.S. policy is on the line: Iran, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Cheney's visit with King Abdullah was brief, lasting only a few hours before he flew back to Washington, but it underlined the two allies' concerns over upheavals across the Middle East, which many Arabs blame on U.S. policies.

In a sign of the urgency of the U.S. concern, President Bush is scheduled to meet with Iraq's prime minister in the Jordanian capital Wednesday and Thursday to discuss security matters.

The unusual succession of visits by the two U.S. leaders was planned before outbursts of violence this week dramatically worsened the situation in two countries of key American interest — Iraq and Lebanon.

On Tuesday, an anti-Syrian Lebanese politician was gunned down in Beirut, highlighting the fragility of the U.S.-backed government and heightening tensions between that country's pro- and anti-Syrian forces.

DOJ_NMG_0098235

Two days later in Iraq, suspected Sunni insurgents set off a series of car bombs that killed more than 200 people in a Shiite district of Baghdad, fueling an upsurge in the retaliatory sectarian slayings that threaten to tear the nation apart.

The meeting at Yamama Palace likely focused on both conflicts, as well as the Israeli-Palestinian front, which stands at a key crossroads amid attempts to form a new Palestinian government and get peace negotiations going.

The U.S. Embassy declined to comment on the discussions and Saudi officials were not available.

Before the meeting, a Saudi official said Cheney was expected to ask oil-rich Saudi Arabia to use its considerable influence with Iraq's Sunni Arab minority to promote reconciliation with Iraqi Shiites and Kurds. Sunni insurgents have staged some of the bloodiest attacks on U.S. troops and Shiites.

In return, Saudi Arabia wants the U.S. to help rein in Iraq's Shiite militias, which have been blamed for sectarian attacks that have killed thousands, said the official, who agreed to discuss the meeting only if not quoted by name because of the sensitivity of the talks.

On Lebanon, the Saudi official said the kingdom wants to ensure there are no cracks in support for the U.S.-backed government, which is opposed by groups allied with Syria and Iran. Saudi Arabia has strong links to the anti-Syrian bloc dominating Lebanon's Cabinet and parliament.

The official said Saudi Arabia hopes Washington will not snub any Palestinian government that emerges from talks between the militants of Hamas and the more moderate Fatah faction. The U.S. and other nations have shunned the current government led by Hamas, which has refused to recognize Israel and renounce violence against the Jewish state.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, is trying to work out a new unity government with Hamas, but Arabs hope the U.S. will be flexible with how much Hamas must moderate to allow a resumption of the peace process with U.S. ally Israel.

Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries on the Persian Gulf are also deeply concerned over the West's confrontation with Iran over that nation's suspect nuclear program.

Gulf countries worry about the possibility of a nuclear-armed Iran and its attempts to expand its influence in the Middle East. But they also fear the West's attempt to force Iran to rein in its program could bring Iranian reprisals.

Dick Cheney Holds Mideast Talks In Saudi Arabia (AFP)

By Suleiman Nimr

AFP, November 26, 2006

RIYADH - US Vice President Dick Cheney held talks with King Abdullah during a brief visit to Saudi Arabia in a new diplomatic thrust by Washington that will also see President George W. Bush meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The Saudi official SPA news agency said the discussions covered "the whole range of events and developments on the regional and international scenes."

The talks focused chiefly on "the Palestinian issue and the situation in Iraq," in addition to ways of boosting cooperation between the United States and the oil-rich Gulf kingdom, it said.

The meeting was attended by Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz and other top Saudi leaders, but no further details of the talks were immediately available. SPA said Cheney later left Saudi Arabia.

A Saudi official earlier said that Cheney's talks would focus on the situation in the Middle East, particularly violence-wracked Iraq.

US sources said Cheney was expected to ask Abdullah to use his influence to help foster reconciliation in Iraq, which is reeling from an explosion of tit-for-tat sectarian violence between the ruling majority Shiites and the Sunni Arab former elite.

The Riyadh talks were also expected to cover the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the situation in Lebanon, a diplomatic source in the Saudi capital said.

Cheney's visit to US ally Saudi Arabia came ahead of a November 29-30 meeting in Jordan between Bush and Maliki on Iraq.

More than 250 people were killed on Thursday in a series of car bombings in Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City in the bloodiest single attack since the US-led invasion of 2003.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is also due in the Middle East soon.

DOJ_NMG_0098236

Cheney was expected to ask Abdullah to use his influence to help bridge the divides between Iraq's warring Sunni and Shiite factions, and also press for Riyadh to come through with its promised reconstruction aid.

Iraq's sectarian conflict, a surge in US casualties and the victory of opposition Democrats in Congressional elections on November 7 have piled pressure on Bush to change US policy, if not to begin withdrawing troops -- something he refuses to commit to.

On Monday Saudi Arabia warned against upsetting the "social balance" in Iraq and urged US-led forces to stop outside influences, in an apparent reference to the growing influence of Shiite Iran.

In a statement after its weekly meeting, the Saudi cabinet stressed the need to restore security in Iraq.

The Sunni-dominated kingdom also said that permanent members of the UN Security Council and Iraq's neighbors should "shoulder their responsibilities in backing Iraq's independence and territorial integrity."

Cheney, one of the architects of the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, is a vigorous defender of US policies in Iraq. He also served the current president's father George Bush as defense secretary in the 1991 Gulf War that ousted Iraq from Kuwait.

The current surge in violence in Iraq has added urgency to the trips by Cheney and Bush.

But on Friday the political group of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose base is in Sadr City, threatened to quit the national unity government if Maliki meets Bush.

Washington said the meeting will go ahead as planned.

An Iraqi diplomat in Riyadh meanwhile told AFP that Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari has put off a visit to Saudi Arabia slated for Sunday "due to developments of the situation in Iraq."

The diplomat, who requested anonymity, did not give a new date for the visit.

Iraq PM Struggling Ahead Of Bush Talks (AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Iraq's Shiite prime minister, struggling to prevent sectarian violence from sending Iraq into full-fledged civil war, is facing strong criticism from top Shiite and Sunni Arab leaders alike as he prepares for a summit with President Bush next week.

On Saturday, a prominent Sunni religious leader warned that Iraq's escalating sectarian violence will spread throughout the Middle East unless the international community withdraws support for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government.

"I call on the Arab states, the Arab League and the United Nations to stop this government and withdraw its support from it. Otherwise, the disaster will occur and the turmoil will happen in Iraq and other countries," said Sheik Harith al-Dhari, who heads the Association of Muslim Scholars.

Last week, Iraq's Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant against al-Dhari, saying he was wanted for inciting violence and terrorism.

On the other side of Iraq's sectarian divide, Shiite politicians loyal to the radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr have threatened to boycott parliament and the Cabinet if al-Maliki goes ahead with the planned summit in Jordan on Wednesday and Thursday. The political bloc, known as Sadrists, is a mainstay of support for al-Maliki.

The White House has said the meeting is still on.

Iran, the top U.S. rival in the region, had planned its own summit Saturday, inviting the presidents of Iraq and Syria in what was seen as a bid to assert its role as a powerbroker in Iraq. Syria did not respond, perhaps to avoid annoying the U.S., and Iraq's president said he could not get to Iran before Sunday at the earliest because Baghdad's airport was closed to commercial flights following a deadly attack Thursday in Sadr City.

Suspected Sunni insurgents killed 215 people in the Shiite slum with mortars and five car bombs in the deadliest single attack of the war. On Saturday, Sadrist lawmaker Qusai Abdul-Wahab blamed U.S. forces for the attack, saying they failed to provide security.

As Vice President Dick Cheney traveled to the neighboring Sunni country of Saudi Arabia on Saturday to seek help in calming Iraq, Iraq's sectarian violence shifted to Diyala province north of Baghdad, where gunmen broke into two Shiite homes and killed 21 men in front of their relatives, police said. U.S. and Iraqi forces also killed 58 insurgents during fighting in the same region.

DOJ_NMG_0098237

In central Iraq, a suicide car bomber attacked a checkpoint near Fallujah, killing three Iraqi civilians and a U.S. service member, and wounding nine civilians and an American service member, the coalition said. The dead included two Iraqi children and an adult.

A U.S. Marine also died from wounds sustained while fighting in Anbar province on Friday, the military said, raising to at least 2,873 the number of U.S. servicemen who have died since the war began in 2003. So far, 54 American service members have died this month in Iraq.

Six people were killed in other violence in Iraq on Saturday, and 19 bodies were found, police said.

Iraq's government has been unable to prevent revenge attacks by Shiite militias and Sunni Arab insurgents, despite the 24-hour curfew it imposed Thursday night on Baghdad's 6 million residents. After only scattered violence occurred in Baghdad on Saturday, the government announced it would allow residents to leave their homes Sunday but keep the ban on all vehicles for another day.

Meanwhile, The New York Times reported Sunday that Iraqi militant groups have raised between $70 million and $200 million a year from various illegal activities to fund the insurgency. The newspaper, which cites a classified U.S. government report obtained by the Times, said the money has come from oil smuggling, kidnapping, counterfeiting and other activities.

The report said terrorist and insurgent groups in Iraq may also have extra money with which to finance terrorist organizations outside Iraq.

In the latest violence in Diyala province, a hotbed of Iraq's Sunni-Arab insurgency, gunmen targeted homes of the al-Sawed Shiite tribe in the village of Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, according to a police officer who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect his own security, as officials often do in the volatile province.

The gunmen broke into the two houses as their large extended families slept, marched everyone outside, lined up the 21 men and shot them to death as the women and children watched, police said.

Police could not reach the remote village to collect the bodies and take them to a morgue until Saturday, police said, adding that they do not known whether the attack was motivated by sectarian hatred or a tribal dispute.

In other parts of Diyala, a largely rural area of farms and orchards, police killed 36 insurgents and wounded dozens of others in clashes Saturday, police said. U.S. and Iraqi forces also conducted several raids north of Baghdad, killing 22 insurgents and a civilian, and destroying a factory used to make roadside bombs, the military said.

Baghdad was quieter than it had been on Friday, when rampaging militiamen burned and blew up four mosques and torched several homes in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Hurriyah, witnesses and police said. Iraqi soldiers at a nearby army post failed to intervene in the assault by suspected members of the Shiite Mahdi Army militia or subsequent attacks that killed as many as 25 Sunnis, said police Capt. Jamil Hussein.

The U.S. military said Saturday that Iraqi soldiers securing Hurriyah found only one burned mosque and were unable to confirm residents' and police accounts that six Sunni Arabs were dragged from Friday prayers and burned to death.

On Friday, al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric, urged al-Dhari, the Sunni leader, to issue a religious edict condemning Sunni attacks on Shiites.

In an apparent response, Al-Dhari said during his news conference in Cairo, Egypt, that his Association of Muslim Scholars has repeatedly condemned the killing of Iraqi Muslims and attacks on their homes and mosques.

Al-Dhari, an outspoken critic of the government and the U.S. occupation, alleged that the Shiite-led government was using the 24-hour curfew as a way to carry out attacks against Sunnis, but he urged Iraqis not to be lured into more violence.

"Be patient and practice steadfastness and don't be lured into this sedition that aims to destroy" Iraq, he said.

In Baghdad, Ali al-Adib, a Shiite lawmaker close to al-Maliki, dismissed al-Dhari as a radical with few supporters. "If he doesn't want this elected national unity government what does he want, a return to dictatorship?" al-Adib said in an interview.

Associated Press writers Bassem Mroue and Qais Al-Bashir in Baghdad and Omar Sinan in Cairo, Egypt, contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0098238

A Matter Of Definition: What Makes A Civil War, And Who Declares It So? (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 — Is Iraq in a civil war?

Though the Bush administration continues to insist that it is not, a growing number of American and Iraqi scholars, leaders and policy analysts say the fighting in Iraq meets the standard definition of civil war.

The common scholarly definition has two main criteria. The first says that the warring groups must be from the same country and fighting for control of the political center, control over a separatist state or to force a major change in policy. The second says that at least 1,000 people must have been killed in total, with at least 100 from each side.

American professors who specialize in the study of civil wars say that most of their number are in agreement that Iraq's conflict is a civil war.

"I think that at this time, and for some time now, the level of violence in Iraq meets the definition of civil war that any reasonable person would have," said James Fearon, a political scientist at Stanford.

While the term is broad enough to include many kinds of conflicts, one of the sides in a civil war is almost always a sovereign government. So some scholars now say civil war began when the Americans transferred sovereignty to an appointed Iraqi government in June 2004. That officially transformed the anti-American war into one of insurgent groups seeking to regain power for disenfranchised Sunni Arabs against an Iraqi government led by Prime Minister Ayad Allawi and increasingly dominated by Shiites.

Others say the civil war began this year, after the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra set off a chain of revenge killings that left hundreds dead over five days and has yet to end. Mr. Allawi proclaimed a month after that bombing that Iraq was mired in a civil war. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is," he said.

Many insurgencies and ethnic or sectarian wars are also civil wars. Vietnam and Lebanon are examples. Scholars say the Iraq civil war has elements of both an insurgency — one side is struggling to topple what it sees as an illegitimate national government — and a sectarian war — the besieged government is ruled by Shiites and opposed by Sunni Arabs.

In Iraq, sectarian purges and Sunni-Shiite revenge killings have become a hallmark of the fighting, but the cycles of violence are ignited by militia leaders who have political goals. The former Yugoslav president, Slobodan Milosovic, did this during the wars in the Balkans.

The civil strife in Iraq largely takes place in mixed Sunni-Shiite areas that include the cities of Baghdad, Mosul and Baquba. In Anbar Province, which is overwhelming Sunni Arab, much of the violence is aimed at American troops. Large swaths of Iraq have little violence, but those areas are relatively homogenous and have few people.

Governments and people embroiled in a civil war often do not want to label it as such. In Colombia, officials insisted for years that the rebels there were merely bandits.

Some Bush administration officials have argued that there is no obvious political vision on the part of the Sunni-led insurgent groups, so "civil war" does not apply.

In the United States, the debate over the term rages because many politicians, especially those who support the war, believe there would be domestic political implications to declaring it a civil war. They fear that an acknowledgment by the White House and its allies would be seen as an admission of a failure of President Bush's Iraq policy.

They also worry that the American people might not see a role for American troops in an Iraqi civil war and would more loudly demand a withdrawal.

But in fact, many scholars say the bloodshed here already puts Iraq in the top ranks of the civil wars of the last half-century. The carnage of recent days — beginning with bombings on Thursday in a Shiite district of Baghdad that killed more than 200 people — reinforces their assertion.

Mr. Fearon and a colleague at Stanford, David D. Laitin, say the deaths per year in Iraq, with at least 50,000 reportedly killed since March 2003, place this conflict on par with wars in Burundi and Bosnia.

Iraq's president and prime minister avoid using the term, but many Iraqis say extremists have thrust the country into civil war, even as moderates have struggled to pull back from the brink.

DOJ_NMG_0098239

"You need to let the world know there's a civil war here in Iraq," said Adel Ibrahim, 44, a sheik in the Subiah tribe, which is mostly Shiite. "It's a crushing civil war. Mortars kill children in our neighborhoods. We're afraid to travel anywhere because we'll be killed in buses. We don't know who is our enemy and who is our friend."

The spiraling bloodshed here bolsters arguments that this is a civil war. A United Nations report released Wednesday said at least 3,709 Iraqis were killed in October, the highest of any month since the American-led invasion. More than 100,000 Iraqis a month are fleeing to Syria and Jordan.

"It's stunning; it should have been called a civil war a long time ago, but now I don't see how people can avoid calling it a civil war," said Nicholas Sambanis, a political scientist at Yale who co-edited "Understanding Civil War: Evidence and Analysis," published by the World Bank in 2005. "The level of violence is so extreme that it far surpasses most civil wars since 1945."

Among scholars, "there's a consensus," Mr. Sambanis said. Scholars in the United States generally agree that there have been at least 100 civil wars since 1945. At the smaller end of the scale is the war in Northern Ireland. Measured by total killed, the largest modern civil wars were in Angola, Afghanistan, Nigeria, China and Rwanda.

However, there are some dissenting historians on the definition of civil war, and whether it applies to Iraq. John Keegan, the British writer of war histories, finds only five clear-cut cases, starting with the English civil war of the 17th century through to the Lebanese war of the 20th century. His criteria are that the feuding groups must be vying for national authority, have leaders who publicly announce what they are fighting for and clash in set-piece battles while wearing uniforms, among other things. He argues in the December issue of Prospect magazine that Iraq is therefore not in civil war.

On Friday, Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, insisted that the Iraq conflict was not civil war, noting that Iraq's top leaders had agreed with that assessment. Last month, Tony Snow, the chief spokesman for President Bush, acknowledged that there were many groups trying to undermine the government, but said that there was no civil war because "it's not clear that they are operating as a unified force. You don't have a clearly identifiable leader."

By contrast, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on Fox News in September that "a political solution is necessary to end the civil war in Iraq."

In 2003, at the start of the Sunni-led insurgency, Bush administration officials called the guerrillas "dead-enders" and insisted their only goal was to sow chaos. Now, American commanders acknowledge that political dominance is at the heart of this conflict.

In Congressional testimony this month, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples of the Defense Intelligence Agency characterized the situation as an "ongoing, violent struggle for power" and said the country was moving closer to a "significant breakdown of central authority."

Many Iraqis and Americans who have tracked the insurgency say it has been strongly shaped by former Baath Party members who want to keep Shiites from taking power. Even the newer jihadist groups have articulated political goals on Web sites — most notably to establish a Sunni-ruled Islamic caliphate.

"There was a whole regime that ruled this country for 35 years," said Mahmoud Othman, a senior Kurdish legislator. "Now they've gone underground. This is the main body of the resistance."

Scholars say it is crucial that policy makers and news media organizations recognize the Iraq conflict as a civil war.

"Why should we care how it is defined, if we all agree that the violence is unacceptable?" asked Mr. Laitin, the Stanford professor. "Here is my answer: There is a scientific community that studies civil wars, and understands their dynamics and how they, in general, end. This research is valuable to our nation's security."

Israel And Palestinians Agree To A Cease-Fire In The Gaza Strip (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 25 — Israeli and Palestinian leaders agreed late Saturday night to a cease-fire in the Gaza Strip that is to include the withdrawal of Israeli troops who have been battling Palestinian militants for the past five months.

DOJ_NMG_0098240

The surprise announcement came as Israeli troops and Palestinian militants fought Saturday, much as they have almost every day in recent months. Two Palestinians were killed, including a Hamas militant who died in an Israeli airstrike in the evening, Palestinian security officials said.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, called Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and said that all Palestinian factions had agreed to stop violence in the Gaza Strip as of 6 a.m. Sunday, both sides said.

Mr. Olmert responded by saying that Israel would halt all its military operations in Gaza and withdraw all its forces from the territory, according to Mr. Olmert's office. Israeli officials said they did not expect the withdrawal to be completed by 6 a.m. "It's a full cease-fire, and the prime minister was happy to accept it," said an official in the prime minister's office, who was not authorized to be quoted by name.

The agreement is the most serious effort to end the fighting in Gaza. However, it is not clear whether it will take effect and hold.

The Palestinian Authority prime minister, Ismail Haniya, met in Gaza with several Palestinian factions involved in firing rockets into Israel, and they said they would abide by the cease-fire.

But some other factions, including Hamas militants, said they were not ready to accept a cease-fire until Israel halted attacks.

"We will not stop rocket firings as long as raids and assassinations continue" by Israel, Abu Ubaida, a spokesman for Hamas's armed wing, told [a news agency].

In the past, the Palestinian Authority has been unable or unwilling to control the numerous factions involved in the fighting with Israel.

In addition, only hours before the cease-fire was announced, Khaled Meshal, the Hamas political leader, who is in exile, said in Cairo that the Palestinians would launch a new uprising unless there was clear progress toward a Palestinian state along the 1967 borders.

"We give them six months," Mr. Meshal said of Israel. If there is no progress during this time, "the Palestinian people will close all the political ledgers and come out in a third uprising." The previous Palestinian uprisings, or intifadas, began in 1987 and in 2000.

The conflicting statements by the Palestinians reflected the deep divisions that have often led to street battles between Palestinian factions.

Israel and the Palestinians had not announced any formal cease-fire talks before the Saturday night statement released by Mr. Olmert's office, though there have been occasional contacts.

Israel withdrew its soldiers and settlers from the Gaza Strip last year. However, the Israeli forces returned at the end of June following the seizure of an Israeli soldier, who was taken into the territory.

Despite the cease-fire, there still is no agreement on releasing the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the official in Mr. Olmert's office said. The Palestinians have sought the release of a large number of Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Corporal Shalit.

More than 300 Palestinians, including militants and civilians, have been killed in Gaza since late June. Three Israelis soldiers have been killed in Gaza, and two Israeli civilians died from rockets that crashed into the southern town of Sderot, just outside Gaza's borders.

The cease-fire announcement does not cover the West Bank.

Tentative Deal Is Reached To Halt Fighting In Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 26 -- The Israeli government agreed late Saturday to cease military operations in the Gaza Strip in exchange for a pledge by Palestinian armed groups to stop firing rockets into southern Israel, a tentative deal that leaders on both sides said could end months of violence in and around the Palestinian enclave.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, outlined the terms of a possible cease-fire in a telephone call to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, according to Olmert's aides. The proposal called for an end to the frequent Palestinian rocket fire that has killed two Israelis this month, suicide bombings inside Gaza against Israeli soldiers and the digging of tunnels used for smuggling money and weapons into the strip from neighboring Egypt.

DOJ_NMG_0098241

Olmert's aides said the prime minister pledged in return to cease military operations in Gaza -- more than 250 Palestinians, most of them gunmen, have been killed since late June -- effective 6 a.m. Sunday. Israeli forces would begin withdrawing soon after from northern Gaza, where they have been operating for several weeks, if terms of the truce hold. [The Israeli military said early Sunday that it had withdrawn all of its forces from Gaza.]

Israeli and Palestinian officials warned that the next few days would determine the durability of the cease-fire, which does not extend to the West Bank. Similar agreements have been announced since Israel withdrew its settlers and soldiers from Gaza 14 months ago, only to collapse within hours. [There were reports of at least one rocket falling inside Israel after the cease-fire took effect, without reports of injuries.]

"It holds the potential for stability and quiet for both sides," said Miri Eisin, an Olmert spokeswoman. "Israel in that sense is hopeful."

Abbas, who has been working to assemble a national unity government with the rival Hamas movement, told Olmert he received pledges to abide by the agreement from the armed groups at war with the Jewish state. His spokesman, Nabil Aburdeineh, outlined the deal to reporters in Gaza late Saturday.

Officials from the military wing of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement in control of the Palestinian Authority's ministries, suggested they would adhere to the terms only if Israel pulls back from Gaza. The radical Islamic Jihad said it would study the agreement before endorsing it.

"Hamas will remain with the Palestinians' interests," said Khalil Abu Leila, a Hamas political leader. "But if the Israelis violate this initial agreement, there will be no truce at all."

Two Israeli airstrikes earlier Saturday on cars in northern Gaza killed at least three Hamas gunmen and wounded several others, while at least one Palestinian rocket landed in the Israeli town of Sderot. No injuries were reported.

Eisin said Abbas and Olmert agreed to talk in the days ahead about how to extend the truce to the West Bank if it holds in Gaza.

"We'll wait and see what happens tomorrow," Eisin said.

Israel, Palestinians OK Gaza Cease-fire (AP)

By Amy Teibel And Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writers

AP, November 26, 2006

A truce meant to end five months of deadly Israeli-Palestinian clashes went into effect throughout the Gaza Strip early Sunday, significantly bolstering hopes of coaxing moribund peace talks back to life.

The Israeli military said all troops were withdrawn from Gaza in the hours before the 6 a.m. cease-fire, announced late Saturday, took force. Dozens of tanks and armored vehicles were parked just over the border in a military staging ground in southern Israel early Sunday, and the streets of northern Gaza were empty.

The agreement was a coup for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas as he tries to form a more moderate government than the one currently led by Islamic Hamas radicals. Abbas, a moderate from the Fatah Party elected separately last year, hopes a new government lineup will persuade the West to end crushing economic sanctions imposed after Hamas took power in March.

The truce was meant to halt rocket fire and other militant attacks on Israel from Gaza, and a military offensive Israel launched in the coastal strip in June, less than a year after ending its 38-year occupation. About half an hour before it took effect, Hamas militants said they fired two rockets at southern Israel. One hit a house, but caused no injuries, the military said.

The two sides announced the accord after Abbas telephoned Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert late Saturday to tell him he had arrived at an agreement with Palestinian factions to stop rocket fire and all other violence from Gaza. Olmert reciprocated by pledging to stop all Israeli military operations in Gaza and withdraw all troops there, aides to both leaders said.

Abbas spokesman Nabil Abu Rdeneh said a truce reached in Egypt in February 2005 would be revived.

DOJ_NMG_0098242

"There is a signed agreement between the president and Prime Minister (Ismail) Haniyeh and all the Palestinian factions to resort to the agreement of the factions in Cairo in 2005, including ceasing all the military activity from Gaza, starting from Sunday morning," Abu Rdeneh said from Gaza City. "The Israeli prime minister has agreed, and it is going to start tomorrow morning."

Abbas told Olmert that the factions had agreed to stop all violence from Gaza, including rocket fire and suicide bombings, starting at 6 a.m. Sunday, Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin said.

He "asked that, in response, Israel stop all military operations in the Gaza Strip and withdraw all her forces," and Olmert responded favorably, Eisin said.

Earlier in the day, militant factions denied reaching a cease-fire agreement. But after it was officially announced, they acknowledged the accord and said the denials were a product of power struggles among them.

Israeli forces originally entered Gaza in an effort to win the release of a soldier captured in a June 25 cross-border raid by Hamas-linked militants and still in captivity. But they soon widened their objectives to target militants who had intensified their rocket attacks on southern Israel after the September 2005 Gaza pullout.

The violence claimed the lives of more than 300 Palestinians and five Israelis. Most of the dead Palestinians were militants, but dozens of civilians died, too, including 19 members of an extended family killed earlier this month in an attack on their apartment compound.

Despite international criticism over Palestinian civilian deaths, Olmert pledged earlier this month to continue the offensive until Palestinian rocket attacks from Gaza significantly decreased. Instead, as the fighting swelled, rocket fire in November more than doubled from October, killing two civilians in a single week.

On Saturday, a rocket hit an unoccupied house in southern Israel, and blasts ripped apart two cars carrying militants in northern Gaza, killing at least one and wounding several passersby. One vehicle was struck by missiles fired from an Israeli aircraft, and the source of the other blast wasn't known.

Three other militants were killed in clashes with Israeli troops elsewhere, including two hit by Israeli fire near the main Gaza-Israel cargo crossing, Palestinian officials and Hamas said. The army said it had no information about fighting in the vicinity of the Karni passage.

The militants' capture of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the subsequent Israeli offensive cut short efforts by Olmert and Abbas to restart peace talks that broke down six years ago. A truce could help to create the momentum to get talks moving.

"We welcome the announcement and see this as a positive step forward," White House spokesman Alex Conant said Saturday evening in Washington. "We hope it leads to less violence for the Israeli and Palestinian people."

Although Israel has no ties with the Hamas government, which rejects the Jewish state's right to exist, it considers the separately elected Abbas an acceptable negotiating partner. He and Olmert agreed months ago to meet, but Abbas has been reluctant to set a date for talks without receiving assurances the meeting would yield real dividends for the Palestinians, like a release of Palestinian prisoners Israel holds.

Olmert has said no prisoners would be released to Hamas before Shalit is freed.

A cease-fire in Gaza is part of a broad package Abbas is trying to put together in the hope of persuading the West and Israel to resume the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars in funding cut off to pressure Hamas to recognize the Jewish state and renounce violence.

The centerpiece of that package would be the formation of a new government less inimical to Israel. Another major element is a prisoner swap.

Hamas' supreme leader, Khaled Mashaal, arrived in Cairo this week to discuss both issues with Egytian mediators, but there was no word of a breakthrough.

On Saturday, Mashaal said his group was willing to give peace negotiations with Israel six months to reach an agreement for a Palestinian state in Gaza and the West Bank, but threatened a new armed uprising if the talks failed.

The double-edged comments were his strongest confirmation that the Islamic militant group would allow Abbas to try to negotiate with Israel. But it was also the first time he has set a deadline with an explicit threat of a new uprising.

Israel had no immediate comment on Mashaal's proposal.

AP correspondent Ibrahim Barzak reported from Gaza City, Gaza Strip.

DOJ_NMG_0098243

Israelis, Palestinians Reinstate Cease-fire (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

The Jewish state pulls troops from Gaza. Peace talks between leaders could follow.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinians halted their hostilities in the Gaza Strip today, reinstating an often-broken cease-fire that could lead to the first talks between their leaders since June.

The accord, struck late Saturday during a telephone call from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, took effect at 6 a.m. Shortly afterward, Israel announced that it had pulled its troops out of the coastal territory during the night.

If the indefinite cease-fire holds, it will end five months of punishing Israeli military incursions into Gaza as well as the daily firing of rockets by Palestinian militants at cities and towns in Israel. It also could create momentum toward a resumption of peace talks that collapsed six years ago.

Hamas, one of several Palestinian parties to the pact, said it had fired its last three rockets into Israel half an hour before the cease-fire. One damaged a home in Sderot but caused no injuries, Israeli officials said.

An Israeli government spokeswoman, Miri Eisen, said the cease-fire accord included a halt to Palestinian suicide attacks in or from Gaza and a cessation of weapons smuggling into Gaza from Egypt.

Nabil abu Rudaineh, a spokesman for Abbas, said that all Palestinian armed factions had signed an agreement to "cease military activities from Gaza," restoring a truce reached in Egypt in February 2005.

Among the groups committed to the accord, he said, was Islamic Jihad, which had previously rejected any cease-fire with Israel, and Hamas, which governs the Palestinian Authority and has refused to recognize Israel.

The Bush administration, eager to revive talks between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, welcomed the announcement as "a positive step forward," White House spokesman Alex Conant said. "We hope it leads to less violence for the Israeli and Palestinian people."

The cease-fire was a major achievement for Abbas, who had been pressing Palestinian militant groups for months. He retained the presidency after his more moderate Fatah Party lost control of the government to Hamas in March, and has criticized Hamas' role in escalating the conflict with Israel.

Since summer, Abbas said last week, Palestinians in Gaza have been "victims of a barbaric Israeli offensive that has left more than 400 dead and 1,500 wounded, while thousands of homes have been destroyed."

But he added, "All that on the pretext of homemade rocket fire, and unfortunately we are giving them such a pretext."

Since Israel unilaterally withdrew its military outposts and settlers from the coastal territory in September 2005, at least 1,100 crude Kassam rockets have been fired from Gaza, killing two Israeli civilians, both in the last 12 days.

Israeli forces returned to Gaza in late June after militants with several Palestinian groups, including Hamas, captured Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit in a cross-border raid. The Israelis have made frequent and increasingly large incursions into Gaza since then, trying to halt the rocket attacks. Three Israeli soldiers have died in the fighting.

Rejecting international criticism of the offensive, which has left scores of Palestinian civilians dead, Olmert said this month that the Israeli offensive would continue until the rocket fire was significantly diminished.

In fighting Saturday, Israeli forces killed four Palestinian fighters and wounded at least six other people, including an unarmed 12-year-old boy.

The cease-fire accord came a day after Israel rejected an offer by Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to stop the rockets in return for a halt in Israeli military operations in the West Bank and Gaza.

"Abbas then came back with an offer of a full cease-fire, in exchange for our stopping in Gaza only, and Olmert agreed," said Eisen, the Israeli spokeswoman.

Israeli-Palestinian cease-fires break down frequently, and it appeared today that there was some uncertainty over the terms of this one.

DOJ_NMG_0098244

One party to the accord, the Popular Resistance Committees, said it still expected Israel to stop military operations in the West Bank as well. Asked whether such operations could provoke more rockets from Gaza, a spokesman for the group, Abu Abir, told the Israeli newspaper Haaretz that Israel must first pull out of Gaza.

"After that, we can talk about what we would view as a violation of the cease-fire," he said.

Israeli officials said they were worried that Hamas would use the cease-fire to smuggle more weapons through tunnels from Egypt. Eisen acknowledged that it would be difficult for Israel to monitor the border.

Khaled Meshaal, the Hamas political leader, underscored those concerns Saturday by threatening a major uprising against Israel. At the same time, he appeared to endorse an effort by Abbas to try to negotiate agreements with Israel to head off violence.

"We give them six months to open real political horizons," Meshaal said at a news conference in Cairo. Otherwise, he said, "Hamas will become stronger and the resistance will resume."

Olmert said this month that he was eager to meet with Abbas and willing to make unspecified concessions. The two men have met once as leaders — a stiff protocol session that took place in Jordan in June, two days before the capture of the Israeli soldier.

Any talks between them would inevitably focus on prisoners and the Palestinians' international isolation.

Israel wants the captive soldier returned before it releases hundreds of Palestinian prisoners from its jails, as Hamas has demanded.

Abbas wants Israel to stop withholding tax revenue and duties collected on behalf of the Palestinians.

Israel insists that the Palestinian government first must meet Western nations' conditions for ending the crippling economic sanctions imposed after Hamas came to power: that it recognize the Jewish state, renounce violence and honor previous Israeli-Arab agreements.

Hamas has rejected those demands and resisted Abbas' efforts to negotiate a replacement of the Hamas-led Cabinet with technocrats not affiliated with any political party.

Palestinians, Israel Agree To Gaza Cease-fire (CNN)

CNN.com, November 25, 2006

JERUSALEM (CNN) -- A total cease-fire in Gaza began at 6 a.m. local time Sunday (11 p.m. Saturday ET) after Israelis and Palestinian factions agreed on a proposal, authorities said Sunday.

All Palestinian factions have agreed to stop firing rockets into Israel under a cease-fire agreement, according to Nabil Abu Rdaina, a spokesman for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Meanwhile, the Israeli government has agreed to withdraw troops from Gaza and cease military operations, said Miri Eisin, government spokeswoman.

"We think that there's the possibility of hope here," she said. "What we hope is that the violence itself will stop, and we'll be able to see a little bit of peace and quiet in and around the Gaza Strip."

The agreement covers only Gaza, she said, and not the West Bank.

Just before the cease-fire took effect, militants fired three rockets into Israel, according to Israel Defense Forces. No one was injured, but a building was damaged.

Abbas called Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to offer the cease-fire.

In the United States, a White House spokesman called the cease-fire a "a positive step forward."

"We welcome the announcement," said spokesman Alex Conant. "We hope it leads to less violence for the Israeli and Palestinian people."

Rdaina said, "We hope that this will be a good start to stop all the activities and to withdraw from Gaza as well from the Israeli troops."

The firing of rockets into Israel has recently prompted Israeli airstrikes in Gaza. Three such airstrikes occurred Saturday and early Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0098245

In one of the recent strikes, two people were killed -- one a member of the Palestinian National Guard and the second a militant from the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigade, the military wing of Hamas, according to Palestinian security sources.

In another strike, a Palestinian militant was killed and three others wounded, one critically, when a minibus was targeted east of Gaza City, Palestinian sources said.

Hamas confirmed those in the bus were part of the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigade.

A third airstrike targeted a car near al-Azhar University in Gaza City, security sources said.

The Israel Defense Forces said it conducted an aerial attack on a Hamas terror cell in the Sajaiya neighborhood. It didn't provide casualty figures. The IDF said the cell was part of the group's weapons production division.

Gaza Ceasefire Comes Into Force (BBC)

BBC.com, November 26, 2006

A ceasefire in the Gaza Strip has come into force, with the Palestinians halting rocket attacks into Israel.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas won a commitment from all militant groups to stop the attacks, while Israeli PM Ehud Olmert agreed to halt hostilities.

Israel said all its troops withdrew from Gaza before the ceasefire took effect, five months after its military re-entered the Strip.

BBC correspondents say the agreement is unexpected and a major development.

The United States has welcomed what a White House spokesman called "a positive step forward".

Earlier on Saturday, at least one Hamas activist was killed in an Israel air strike on Gaza.

Two cars were targeted, and four men were reported injured.

Hamas said that three other activists were killed in clashes with Israeli troops elsewhere in Gaza.

'Chance for stability'

The ceasefire came into effect at 0600 (0400GMT) on Sunday.

The BBC's Alan Johnston in Gaza says it seems Mr Abbas phoned his opposite number on Saturday evening to say he had agreement from all Palestinian factions that they would stop their rocket fire.

There is a signed agreement between Mr Abbas, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya and all the Palestinian factions, a spokesman said.

Mr Olmert is said to believe the ceasefire is a chance for stability

A spokeswoman for the Israeli prime minister, Miri Eisin, told the BBC that Mr Olmert had agreed that Israeli forces would not initiate any offensive action after that time.

But she said Mr Olmert had made it clear that it might take some time to pull all Israeli troops out of the Gaza Strip if the ceasefire held.

However, shortly after the ceasefire took effect, the Israeli army confirmed that all its troops had left.

Ms Eisin said Mr Olmert believed this was a chance to achieve stability and one that Israel could not miss.

The BBC's Simon Wilson in Jerusalem says that although there has been talk of a possible ceasefire in recent weeks, such a direct acknowledgement from the Israeli prime minister's office comes as a surprise.

Officials have indicated in the past that they do not believe Mr Abbas has the power to enforce a ceasefire among Palestinian groups, he says.

Ground offensives

Israel evacuated its settlements and military bases in Gaza last year after 38 years in the territory, but the military renewed ground operations after militants captured an Israeli soldier, Corporal Gilad Shalit, in a border raid in June.

One Hamas activist died in Saturday's air strike

Palestinian militant groups have been firing Qassam rockets into Israel on a daily basis. They have killed two Israeli civilians in the past 10 days.

Israel has launched frequent ground offensives into Gaza Strip to try to stop the militants who launch the rockets.

It has also shelled targets in Gaza heavily.

DOJ_NMG_0098246

Since June, Israeli troops have killed more than 400 Palestinians in Gaza, roughly half of them civilians.

Three Israeli soldiers have died in operations. Cpl Shalit has not been found, and his fate is unknown.

Crisis In Lebanon Reaches New Threshold (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

BEIRUT, Nov. 25 -- Lebanon's fragile government, defying warnings from Hezbollah, on Saturday approved an international tribunal to try suspects in the 2005 assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, an enormously symbolic step for a country paralyzed by division and anticipation.

The decision by Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's cabinet, taken at night with a large military presence in downtown Beirut, set the stage for the country's month-long political crisis, which has so far escalated almost in slow motion, to enter a much less predictable period. In effect, the approval of the tribunal pits a coalition underpinning the Lebanese government, backed by the United States and France, against the radical Shiite movement Hezbollah and its allies, supported by Iran and Syria.

"This is not a provocation against anyone, nor will it be a provocation against anyone," Siniora said in a statement read after the cabinet meeting by the information minister. "On the contrary, it aims at protecting everyone."

Hezbollah read the vote as a blunt challenge, denouncing the cabinet as illegitimate and renewing its threat to take to the streets to bring it down. The movement and its allies negotiated their response Saturday night, but several officials said protests would commence after the seven-day mourning period for Pierre Gemayel, the industry minister who was assassinated Tuesday on a busy suburban Beirut street.

"This is an unconstitutional and illegitimate meeting of an unconstitutional and illegitimate cabinet. Our reaction will become clear in the coming days," Hussein Hajj Hassan, a Hezbollah member of parliament, said in an interview. "It is going to include all kinds of activities, because they have taken things to an unacceptable place."

But, he added, "we're not in a hurry."

Lebanon's crisis, its most recent phase ignited last month when Hezbollah demanded a greater share of representation in the cabinet, is playing out at levels that extend far beyond the borders of the small Mediterranean country.

The coalition backing the government has said Hezbollah's decision to withdraw its ministers and allies from the cabinet on Nov. 11 was meant to block the convening of the international court to try the suspected killers of Hariri and opponents of Syria assassinated since last year. A U.N. investigation has suggested that Lebanese and Syrian intelligence services were behind Hariri's death, but has yet to conclude. Four Lebanese security chiefs have been in custody for 14 months. In a letter Friday to U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, Syria complained that it was not consulted about the court's creation and suggested that it would not cooperate.

Hezbollah has said the issue is not the court, but the government. Hezbollah insists the government is no longer legitimate without the participation of Shiite ministers, who represent Lebanon's single largest community in a political system founded on the notion of sectarian consensus.

Information Minister Ghazi Aridi said the two sides negotiated until minutes before the cabinet convened Saturday evening, to no avail. Hassan, the legislator, however, called the discussions "silly attempts and a stupid repetition of positions and unacceptable solutions."

Technically, the government decision still requires the approval of President Emile Lahoud, an ally of Syria who has said the decision was unconstitutional given the ministers' resignations. Without his approval, it would go to parliament, which can be convened only by the speaker, Nabih Berri, an ally of Hezbollah. Berri's aides say he has no plans as of now to do so.

In a country whose crises are almost always interlocked with regional and international relations, the fights over the court and the cabinet are overshadowed by the bigger struggles underway: Which of Lebanon's factions -- and, by default, its foreign patrons -- will exercise the greatest influence over the future?

Hezbollah's opponents -- a coalition of Sunni Muslims, Druze and Christians that takes its name from the mass protest on March 14, 2005, that helped force the end of a 29-year Syrian military presence here -- see Syria and, to a lesser extent, Iran as representing the greatest threats to Lebanese stability. Hezbollah, allied with an influential Christian politician, Michel Aoun, views the government as beholden to the United States and its interests.

DOJ_NMG_0098247

"I am not very hopeful," said Amin Sherri, another Hezbollah parliament member, speaking after the vote. "Why? We have to see who's putting pressure on them. That side is the United States."

Punctuated by drama and interspersed with stretches of anticipation, the crisis has, until now, played out in almost expected ways. The vote Saturday was, in some ways, a formality. Even the killing of Gemayel, an anti-Syrian politician from a prominent Christian family, followed predictions by other politicians that assassinations were ahead. But the March 14 coalition turned Gemayel's funeral into a protest and show of force Thursday, mobilizing tens of thousands of its followers.

A counter show of force by Hezbollah appears inevitable -- Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah reiterated such a warning Friday -- although Sherri and Hassan said nothing was expected within the next 48 hours.

The prospect of sending the crisis into the streets has unsettled Beirut, a city whose diversity is often segregated and whose communal tension is as pronounced as at any time since Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war. With Christians divided between the government and Hezbollah, the confrontation has taken on a Sunni-Shiite dimension that is somewhat new to Lebanese politics. Its resolution will help determine which community, at the very least, wields an effective veto over political decisions.

"Internally speaking, Hezbollah cannot lose and doesn't want to lose. March 14 and the government cannot lose, and they don't want to lose," said Sarkis Naoum, a columnist for al-Nahar newspaper. "The loss for either side means this country will head in some direction that can be different. That's why I think both of them will take the confrontation to the end."

The crisis has paralyzed Lebanon, still reeling from last summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel. Following Gemayel's assassination, several Lebanese ministers took up residence in the government headquarters, known as the Serail, for protection.

Competing television stations -- the Sunni-owned Future channel and Hezbollah's al-Manar -- have waged a propaganda war of escalating invective. In one news bulletin, al-Manar called Walid Jumblatt, a Siniora ally and mercurial leader of the Druze community, a snake "spreading his venom." At Gemayel's funeral Thursday, protesters burned pictures of Aoun and shouted obscenities at Nasrallah. Hours later, scores of Shiite residents took to the streets in protest, temporarily blocking the airport road.

Asked whether he saw a solution, Naoum said, "I don't think so.

"I don't know, I'm scared. I'm scared," he said. "They are so mobilized, the Sunnis and the Shiites, that once they go into the street, it's possible that no one can control them."

Lebanon Approves U.N. Tribunal To Investigate Hariri Assassination (MCT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy Newspapers, November 26, 2006

BEIRUT - On a busy West Beirut street corner, a black billboard featuring a photograph of Rafik Hariri counts off the number of days since the former prime minister's still-unsolved assassination sparked a popular uprising that forced Syrian troops out of Lebanon after decades of political domination.

"The truth," reads the billboard, which on Saturday was up to 650 days.

"For Lebanon's sake."

Nearly two years after the Cedar Revolution propelled pro-Western leaders into power and created a brief period of fragile national unity, attempts to find out the truth are threatening to create dangerous new political fissures.

On Saturday, Lebanon's cabinet set the stage for a political showdown by unanimously approving the establishment of a special United Nations tribunal with the power to try those involved in the assassination.

The vote throws the issue in the hands of the country's pro-Syria opposition leaders who consider the action an unconstitutional and provocative act.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, head of the nation's most powerful militia, is threatening to stage street protests until the government falls.

And Hezbollah allies in the government have vowed to quash the international investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0098248

"This is not a provocation to any party," Information Minister Ghazi Aridi said after the cabinet vote, which was held as Lebanese soldiers fanned out across Beirut in an effort to contain any possible problems.

The dispute is about much more than finding out who killed Hariri. It is about the role of outside forces in Lebanese politics and whether the country's growing Shiite community should be given a greater role in the government.

Creation of the United Nations body still faces significant hurdles. It must be endorsed by President Emile Lahoud, a Hezbollah ally who considers the cabinet approval unconstitutional. And the tribunal must win approval from the Lebanese parliament, which is dominated by pro-Western lawmakers but headed by Hezbollah ally Nabih Berri, a prominent Shiite leader who could delay the vote.

Attempts by either Lahoud or Berri to derail the investigation could deepen the rifts and heighten tensions.

Hariri's political heirs see the tribunal as their best chance to prove widely held suspicions that Syria is behind the killing and an ongoing string of assassinations in Lebanon that have targeted a series of anti-Syrian figures. Syria has consistently denied playing any role in the political killings but views the tribunal as something of a kangaroo court.

As the Lebanese cabinet moved two weeks ago to give its initial approval to the tribunal, six Hezbollah allies in the Lebanese cabinet resigned in a bid to topple the government. Prime Minister Fuad Saniora refused to accept the resignations, and the cabinet endorsed the tribunal. Lahoud and Berri have deemed the cabinet actions unconstitutional.

Resolving the standoff peacefully was already a difficult challenge last week when gunmen killed Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel, a member of a prominent and controversial Christian political family.

The assassination deprived Saniora of an important ally and cast a pall over a nation still peppered with bullet-scarred buildings that serve as stark reminders of the country's 15-year civil war. Saniora's allies and Hariri's political heirs transformed Gemayel's funeral on Tuesday into a massive political rally that heightened the divisions. Demonstrators cursed Nasrallah, mocked Shiite religious traditions and denounced Syria, which many suspect is behind the string of assassinations.

Hours later, small groups of angry Shiite mobs briefly stormed through the streets looking for a confrontation until Nasrallah made an appeal for calm on Hezbollah's television station.

Leaders across the political spectrum have been trying to head off any clashes that could spark a new sectarian war. But many worry that such appeals will only go so far.

"You can't curb the street for a long time," said Moshen Saleh, a sociologist and Hezbollah ally at Lebanese University. "So the majority has to do something to show its good intentions."

In the Shiite neighborhoods around Beirut, residents on Saturday said they are prepared to push their demands.

"We are ready. We are ready. We are ready," said Aziz Najdi, a 36-year-old storeowner. "If it is winter, if we are under attack, if it is hot, we are ready to go at a moment's notice."

Lebanon's Government Backs U.N. Tribunal (AP)

By Hussein Dakroub, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

The U.S.-backed government on Saturday approved an international tribunal for suspects in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, overriding the objections of Hezbollah amid a political crisis that threatens to spin Lebanon into violence.

Attempts to reach a last-minute compromise between the government and the pro-Syrian camp, led by Hezbollah, failed Saturday as the Cabinet moved forward with its meeting on the U.N-created court.

Lebanon's Syria-allied president denounced the vote as did Hezbollah officials, who warned that the Shiite Muslim militant group would go ahead with threatened mass street protests seeking to force the government from power.

The tribunal is key in the struggle between allies and opponents of Syria, which dominated its neighbor for nearly three decades until international pressure forced it to withdraw its troops last year. Anti-Syrian forces — mainly Christians and Sunni Muslims — dominate parliament and the Cabinet, but are facing growing resistance from the mainly Shiite pro-Syrian camp.

The political crisis became potentially explosive this week with the assassination of an anti-Syrian politician, raising worries of more violence that could tear apart the country apart long its fragile sectarian seams.

DOJ_NMG_0098249

The anti-Syrian bloc brought out some 800,000 people for a rally at the funeral of the politician, Pierre Gemayel, on Thursday. Hezbollah has shown it can bring out similar numbers, and many people fear its threatened new demonstrations could start a spiral of street action.

Earlier Saturday, two key anti-Syrian Lebanese politicians met with Parliament Speaker Nabil Berri, an ally of Hezbollah and a Syria supporter, in an apparent attempt at a compromise.

U.S.-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora offered to put off the Cabinet vote for several days if six pro-Hezbollah ministers who quit the Cabinet earlier this month return.

But with Hezbollah demanding that the government be changed to give it and its allies more power, the reconciliation bid failed, and the Cabinet meeting approved a U.N. draft for the tribunal.

"Unfortunately, no agreement was reached because each side stuck to its position," Information Minister Ghazi Aridi said after the Cabinet meeting.

The Cabinet approval "puts the opposition before its options to confront the government. The time and the place will be decided," Sheik Hassan Ezzeddine, a senior Hezbollah official, said after the vote when asked if Hezbollah would carry out its threat to try to topple Saniora with mass demonstrations.

In the eyes of Hezbollah, the approval of the tribunal amounted to a rejection of its demands for more seats on the Cabinet, and Saniora's foes contend his administration is unconstitutional because it does not represent all of Lebanon's main communities.

"The government represents part of the Lebanese people, not all of them. Its decisions are void," Ezzeddine told Al-Arabiya television.

President Emile Lahoud also called the Cabinet's approval of the tribunal "null and void" for the same reason, according to a statement from his office.

Hezbollah legislator Hassan Fadlallah charged the tribunal vote would "deepen divisions in the country," and said the militant group would not take to the streets although he did not say when.

Saniora insisted the approval of the tribunal was not meant as a "provocation" against Hezbollah and its allies, according to a statement read by Aridi after the vote.

"It is in fact based on Lebanese unanimity on the creation of this tribunal and the Lebanese who are yearning to protect Lebanon, bolster its democratic freedoms and national security and bring it out of the cycle of killings and assassinations," the statement said.

Aridi underlined the government's "respect" for Hezbollah's opinion and would allow nonviolent protests led by the group, but added: "We will not give up our goals."

For opponents of Syria, the court is a major priority, and they hope it will uncover the truth behind the February 2005 assassination of Hariri in a bomb blast that killed 22 others, which they accuse Damascus of orchestrating. Syria has denied any role in the killing.

The court, which will sit outside Lebanon and have a majority of non-Lebanese judges, is to try four Lebanese generals — top pro-Syrian security chiefs under Lahoud, including his Presidential Guard commander, who have been under arrest for 14 months accused of involvement in Hariri's murder.

The U.N. investigation into Hariri's death has also implicated Brig. Gen. Assaf Shawkat, Syria's military intelligence chief and the brother-in-law of Syrian President Bashar Assad. Shawkat is not in custody.

Hariri's death was the first in a string of attacks that killed five other prominent anti-Syrian figures — with Gemayel the most recent, in a bold daytime shooting Tuesday. Many Lebanese blame Syria for all the killings, which Damascus denies.

Since Gemayel's assassination, some ministers in Saniora's Cabinet have moved into the heavily guarded prime minister's building in downtown Beirut, fearing more slayings.

Needed: A Big Stick (WP)

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098250

ONE WAY TO understand the deteriorating situation in the Middle East is to contrast last week's assassination of Lebanese Christian leader Pierre Gemayel with the response to it. The assassination was a shockingly audacious attack on Lebanon's democratic forces and their U.S. and European allies. But those Western governments remain in a profound muddle about how to address Iran and Syria, which have been fomenting the destabilization of Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinian territories.

The killers of Mr. Gemayel have not been identified and may never be. But the attack fits snugly into a pattern of provocations across the region by Iran and Syria, which appear to believe that American reversals in Iraq have given them the opportunity to create what Syrian dictator Bashar al-Assad calls "a new Middle East" -- one in which their influence and radical ideology will predominate. They would make their client Hezbollah the power broker in Lebanon, restoring Syrian suzerainty. They would use Hamas to block any progress toward an Israeli-Palestinian settlement and perpetuate a continuing, if low-grade, war on Israel. And they would continue to bleed the United States by supplying insurgents in Iraq with arms and sanctuary. Iran meanwhile presses ahead with its barely disguised nuclear weapons program: President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad recently promised to increase the number of centrifuges enriching uranium from the current 328 to 60,000.

In response to this bold bid for regional hegemony, the United States has apparently resolved . . . to intensively negotiate with itself and its chief European allies about how it might "engage" Mr. Ahmadinejad and Mr. Assad. Should a U.S. ambassador return to Damascus, once the uproar over Mr. Gemayel dies down? Should the administration drop its demand that Iran obey a U.N. resolution ordering it to suspend enrichment before talks can begin? While the debate goes on, the Western effort to sanction Iran for its nuclear program is stalled and all but forgotten. No punitive action against Syria is even being discussed.

Those most focused on rescuing the Iraq mission -- such as the Baker-Hamilton study group -- are most interested in the engagement option. We, too, have supported including Iran and Syria in a regional diplomatic initiative to promote an Iraqi political accord. But it's vital to keep in mind that such an effort has a low probability of ending the bloodshed in the near future, even if all parties cooperate.

What's more, no attempt to reason with Mr. Assad and the Iranian mullahs will succeed unless they perceive that the United States and its allies wield sticks as well as carrots. As long as the Bush administration is unable to win U.N. Security Council approval for sanctions against Iran -- or impose them through an ad hoc coalition -- Tehran will have no incentive to make concessions. Mr. Assad will demand that the West concede him Lebanon and call off the murder investigations that would likely implicate him -- unless he worries that his failure to cooperate will result in fresh international sanctions against Syria.

Iran and Syria are ruthlessly waging war against Western interests in the Middle East. Offering to talk is only a small part of what it will take to stop them.

Realism, And Values, In Lebanon (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

The Baathists of Baghdad killed their opponents for all the usual reasons and a few original ones. They often slaughtered just to keep in practice, or for recreation, as shown on the videotapes they systematically made of their crimes. The Baathists of Damascus are more traditional. They murder adversaries only when necessary, after bribery, coercion or intimidation fail.

The sickening series of murders of Lebanese politicians and journalists opposed to Syrian control of their country is a new sign of desperation in Damascus that the United States and other nations must not misread or mishandle. This may well be President Bashar al-Assad's blood-soaked way of saying, "Let's make a deal." It is an offer that must be refused.

Those who complain that there is a lack of communication between the Bush administration and the Assad regime are not paying attention. By local rules, a well-timed murder such as the gunning down of Pierre Gemayel in Beirut last week is more effective in sending a message than a diplomatic demarche.

That does not absolve the Bush administration for foolishly allowing a secondary issue -- its refusal to have unconditional diplomatic contacts with Syria and Iran, to avoid "rewarding bad behavior" -- to obscure the growing international concern with those two nations. It is to say that the opening of communications channels with Damascus and Tehran must be handled with great care and clarity.

DOJ_NMG_0098251

Murder is still an important tool in Middle Eastern politics, as is often noted. Unfortunately, the use of mayhem and slaughter to advance dynastic or personal fortunes in the region has not been checked in the 21st century by either U.S. unilateralism in Iraq or the multilateral legalism of the United Nations in Lebanon and Syria. The two approaches need to be reviewed and perhaps merged.

The Bush administration struggles in Iraq to prevent failure from becoming defeat. Ambitions of promoting democracy abroad through regime change are rapidly being scaled back to the bedrock question of intervention, from Kosovo to Darfur: Can "we" stop "them" from killing each other? If the answer is no, that is defeat.

An immediate benefit of intervention in Iraq was the overthrow of the sadistic Baathist regime that murdered in cold blood dissidents of all stripes in the hundreds of thousands. But the breakdown of order under a mismanaged occupation triggered a mass privatization by ordinary citizens of the government's former monopoly on assassination and torture.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan has diligently and courageously pursued another course in dealing with Syria's systematic use of violence to regain control over Lebanon and the fortunes in smuggling drugs and arms that Syrian politicians and generals generate from their neighbor.

Citing the conditions created by the assassination of Rafiq al-Hariri, Lebanon's former prime minister, in February 2005 as a threat to international peace, Annan creatively pushed for an international criminal investigation and an international tribunal to try the case. Syrian officials are prime suspects in that crime and are widely believed to be behind the assassinations of at least four other advocates of Lebanese independence that followed Hariri's murder.

The killing of Gemayel, a member of the anti-Syrian coalition headed by Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, bears the hallmarks of a Syrian "initiative" to block the U.N. effort. And the murder came as Syria was reestablishing diplomatic relations with Iraq after 24 years of estrangement. This translation of Syrian actions quickly made its way through the Middle East: "You want help in Iraq? It will cost you Lebanon. For starters." That is realpolitik and real communication, Assad-style.

That is in any event the context in which any new U.S. move to talk to Syria and to Syria's ally, Iran, will be seen. Washington must avoid giving the impression that it is willing to allow Syria to regain hegemony over Lebanon in return for smoothing the U.S. path in Iraq.

The Bush administration should adopt a policy of making all substantive communications with Syria and Iran public as they are delivered, much as former secretary of state Jim Baker did when he dealt with Iraq's Tariq Aziz in Geneva in January 1991, on the threshold of Operation Desert Storm.

For one thing, such transparency would ensure that U.S. terms are delivered directly to those in charge without being distorted by filter or fear. And it would allow other nations to monitor for themselves Washington's intentions.

It is fashionable at the moment to decry black-and-white, evil-vs.-good visions of foreign policy and to maintain that only the expedient grays of "realism" can preserve world order. The debacle in Iraq has given the international promotion of democracy a bad name in some quarters.

But any "realistic" deal that undermines Lebanon's hard-won freedom from Syrian control and protects murderers in Damascus would quickly become a fool's bargain. This is a clear case, as the U.N. involvement to strengthen Lebanon's sovereignty over all its frontiers demonstrates, where doing the moral thing is also the realistic thing.

Lebanon On The Brink (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

THE ASSASSINATION OF Pierre Gemayel, an anti-Syrian member of Lebanon's Cabinet and the scion of one of that country's leading Christian clans, could lead to other casualties: the collapse of a pro-Western government in Beirut, a resurgence of noxious Syrian influence and the deflation of a trial balloon — only recently floated in Washington — for holding discussions with Syria and Iran about the future of Iraq. The worst-case scenario is another civil war.

It's easier to lament that potential chain reaction than avert it. But the White House should try to rally other nations — including Syria, which denies any complicity in Gemayel's death — around the fragile government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

DOJ_NMG_0098252

The Bush administration has stopped just short of explicitly accusing Syria of ordering Gemayel's assassination. A State Department official called the killing "an act of intimidation," and President Bush said it demonstrated "the viciousness of those who are trying to destabilize that country." United Nations investigators were already looking into allegations that Syria was behind the 2005 murder of another anti-Syrian leader, former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. On Wednesday, Siniora asked that the U.N. probe be expanded to cover the latest crime.

Supporters of democracy worldwide took heart when public outrage over Hariri's assassination produced the so-called Cedar Revolution, a peaceful rejection of outside meddling that led Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon. Allowing an assassin to reverse what remains from that revolution is unacceptable. The U.N. has insisted that Lebanon's neighbors respect its territorial integrity, and the cease-fire resolution that ended this summer's Israeli-Hezbollah conflict assumed that the government in Beirut would exercise a national monopoly on military force.

Compared to other nations in the region, Lebanon has democratic credentials that predate the Bush administration's campaign to transform the politics of the Middle East. The country operates under a constitutional tradition that balances political power precariously among the Christian, Muslim and Druze communities. But it has been obvious for at least 30 years that the political status quo gave disproportionate influence to the Christian minority, especially Maronite Catholics like the Gemayel family.

Not all the support for Hezbollah among Lebanon's Shiite Muslims is the result of Syrian subversion. Hezbollah has capitalized on longfestering discontent about the distribution of economic and political power. Hezbollah also provides Shiite communities with a network of social services and spearheaded rebuilding in southern Lebanon after Israel's attacks (though Hezbollah lost some points by provoking the invasion with its incursions into Israel).

The Lebanese political system is imperfect, to say the least. But it should not be overthrown by an assassin's bullet, whoever gave the orders. If Syria wants to bolster its claim of innocence in Gemayel's murder, it should discourage its allies in Lebanon — notably Hezbollah — from exploiting the murder. And any talk of the U.S. giving Syria a role in a regional peace process should be put on hold if Damascus had anything to do with the assassination, or uses it as an opportunity to ratchet up its influence in Lebanon.

Probe Traces Global Reach Of Counterfeiting Ring (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

TBILISI, Georgia -- The U.S. Secret Service and Georgian police are investigating an international counterfeiting operation that stretches from a separatist enclave in this former Soviet republic to Maryland, where fake $100 bills have been seized, according to senior officials and investigators here. The allegations are supported by American diplomats, U.S. court documents and a recent report to Congress.

From a printing press in South Ossetia, a sliver of land with no formally recognized government, more than $20 million in the fake bills has been transported to Israel and the United States, according to investigators. The counterfeit $100 notes have also surfaced in Georgia and Russia, officials said.

The fake notes have been passed at numerous businesses throughout the Baltimore area and have also surfaced in New York, Newark and Buffalo, according to court papers and the joint report to Congress by the Secret Service, the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve. The report, issued in September, also said the number of counterfeit notes produced in this region and passed in the United States has "increased dramatically" in recent years.

The presence in South Ossetia of an international counterfeiting ring capable of producing thousands of bills, according to investigators, is a stark example of how organized crime has flourished, sometimes through the neglect or alleged involvement of officials, in areas of the former Soviet Union whose territorial status remains unresolved 15 years after the fall of communism.

"Counterfeiting is not the only headache for us if you're talking about criminality in South Ossetia," Ekaterine Zguladze, Georgia's deputy interior minister, said in an interview. "You also have drug trafficking, weapons trafficking, robbery, kidnapping. And our opportunity to fight criminals in there is very limited."

DOJ_NMG_0098253

A spokesman for the U.S. Secret Service, in an e-mail message, declined to discuss the case "due to the sensitivities of the ongoing investigations and political considerations." But the joint report to Congress said the Secret Service "is currently investigating a scheme with ties to suspects in Israel, Russia, and the Republic of Georgia to produce counterfeit U.S. currency. The U.S. Secret Service has reason to believe this family of counterfeit notes is being produced in the Caucasus region," as the mountainous area encompassing parts of southern Russia and Georgia is called.

U.S. diplomats confirmed that the location was South Ossetia.

The cash from the Caucasus, as with other lines of counterfeit dollars believed to be from the same source, was given its own code by the Secret Service: c-21558, according to the joint report to Congress.

"Since the c-21558 family's first detection in March 1999 the total counterfeit activity (passed and seized notes) has exceeded $23 million," according to the report. In 2005, the Secret Service detected $5.3 million from the Caucasus ring, up from $1.5 million in 2003, the report said.

That compares to the approximately $2.8 million in "supernotes" linked to North Korea that the agency says it confiscates, on average, each year. The production of supernotes, so called for their quality, has become a major diplomatic issue between the United States and the government of Kim Jong Il.

Georgian investigators said the fake bills from South Ossetia are made with special ink and paper and have watermarks, different serial numbers and other features that allow them to be easily passed off as real. "They are of very high quality," Konstantin Kemularia, secretary of Georgia's National Security Council, said in an interview.

The counterfeiting operation in the region has become another irritant in U.S. relations with Russia, which acts, in effect, as a protector for South Ossetia; Russian peacekeeping troops patrol the breakaway enclave, and most of its residents have been issued Russian passports.

"We have expressed our concerns on this subject to both the Russians and the South Ossetians," said a U.S. State Department official who did not have approval to speak on the record. "This problem is one of many that underscore the urgent need for resolution of the conflict in South Ossetia and the threat it poses to security and border control, among other consequences."

Russia's Interior Ministry, which is responsible for fighting counterfeiting, did not respond to requests for comment. Officials in South Ossetia, where Russian rubles are used for currency, bitterly contested any allegation that a counterfeiting ring existed on their territory.

"Counterfeit dollars? Well, if you are going to listen to Georgians, soon you will say that we have a nuclear bomb here," Mikhail Mindzayev, interior minister in the separatist government, said in a telephone interview. Mindzayev asserted that "we do not have any counterfeit dollars here, and we do not have any criminals."

After a short, bloody war in the early 1990s, South Ossetia broke away from Georgia and achieved de facto independence. Despite the presence of Russian troops, crime has flourished in the province, and in a report, the German Marshall Fund of the United States described South Ossetia and other breakaway enclaves in the Black Sea region as "breeding grounds for transnational organized crime."

On Oct. 27, 2004, its fingers reached Linthicum, Md. At the Hampton Inn near Baltimore-Washington International Airport, Hazki Hen, who had just flown to the United States from Israel, met with two men, one of whom was an undercover Secret Service agent. Hen expected to consummate a deal that had been negotiated over 19 tapped phone calls.

Hen agreed to exchange $230,000 in counterfeit $100 bills for $80,000 in genuine currency, according to a Secret Service affidavit filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore. Hen also planned to accept $220,000 as a down payment on the delivery of another $1.5 million in fake bills. The affidavit filed in Baltimore said that "Hen also displayed samples of paper used to produce counterfeit Euros and U.S. currency. The paper contained red and blue fibers similar to the fibers contained in genuine U.S. currency."

Just before the Secret Service moved in and arrested Hen, the three men discussed future deals involving between $25 million and $100 million in counterfeit U.S. currency, according to the affidavit.

Nine months later and more than 5,700 miles to the east, Nana Jabelashvili, a resident of Tbilisi, Georgia's capital, was stopped by police as she crossed a Georgian police checkpoint on the road between Gori and Tskhinvali, the capital of South

DOJ_NMG_0098254

Ossetia. Police found $350,300 in counterfeit bills in Jabelashvili's vehicle and later learned that she was a courier for a Georgian emigre who now lives in Israel, according to Levan Gurgenidze, head of the Georgian Interior Ministry's organized crime unit. The emigre fled Georgia the day after Jabelashvili's arrest, Gurgenidze said in an interview.

When Secret Service agents examined some of the bills seized from Jabelashvili, they found that they were linked to the same family of bills seized in the Hen case in Baltimore, according to a U.S. law enforcement source. Gurgenidze said the source of the bills was a counterfeiting operation run out of a building on Lenin Street in Tskhinvali.

In November 2005, federal prosecutors dropped charges against Hen, then 65, after he became seriously ill and the court agreed to allow him to return to Israel to die.

Jabelashvili was sentenced to 12 years in prison in Georgia in January of this year, officials here said.

Suspicions are growing, meanwhile, that some South Ossetian officials are not just ignoring counterfeiting but are involving themselves in it directly.

In January of this year, Eter Kachmazova, a senior bureaucrat in the South Ossetian Trade Ministry, held a series of meetings with a Georgian undercover officer posing as a Ukrainian businessman. The meetings, at a restaurant in Gori, which is about 30 minutes by car from Tskhinvali, and at the Sheraton Hotel in Tbilisi, were videotaped and recorded by the Georgians, who later broadcast excerpts on state television.

Kachmazova "said she could produce as many fake dollars as the buyers could handle, up to millions," Gurgenidze said. "The Ukrainian, our guy, said he wanted $1.5 million, and she agreed for $25 on every $100."

On Jan. 31, Kachmazova agreed to supply the first $100,000, taking it across checkpoints in lots of $10,000 in case she was stopped and searched. After she arrived with the second bundle of $10,000, police arrested her. Kachmazova is being held at a pretrial detention center in Gori.

"They immediately relocated the press on Lenin Street after she was arrested," Gurgenidze said. "But they are still printing money in there."

Poisoned Russian Ex-Spy Said He Was Ordered To Hire Assassins (WP/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 25 -- An ex-KGB agent poisoned in London described in interviews before his death how he was ordered to hire assassins to neutralize potential rivals and whistle-blowers who threatened the Kremlin, according to excerpts published and broadcast Saturday.

Alexander Litvinenko, a fierce critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, died Thursday of heart failure after falling gravely ill from what doctors said was poisoning by polonium 210, a rare radioactive substance.

His highly contaminated body was released to a coroner by police late Saturday and Home Office pathologists were expected to begin an autopsy, but experts said investigators might never pinpoint the exact source of the polonium.

In a deathbed statement, 43-year-old Litvinenko accused Putin, whom he called "barbaric and ruthless," of ordering his poisoning. Putin has called the death a tragedy and denied involvement. His government has pledged to cooperate with the investigation.

Litvinenko also spoke to academics James Heartfield and Julia Svetlichnaja from the University of Westminster in three interviews that lasted a total of about six hours in April and May. The Daily Telegraph published a version of the interviews Saturday.

Litvinenko was recruited into the Soviet-era KGB and also worked for its successor, the Federal Security Service. After the fall of communism, he said, his directive was to recruit businessmen who could stimulate an economic boom and to hire assassins.

"So if somebody was the victim of a crime, like his daughter was raped, you would offer to let them take revenge on the perpetrator," Litvinenko said. "This was how we recruited killers."

In another deathbed conversation, Litvinenko alleged that a Russian Foreign Intelligence Service chief previously stationed in London had been assigned by Moscow to watch him, Britain's Sunday Times newspaper reported.

DOJ_NMG_0098255

British detectives investigating his death launched an international hunt for witnesses Saturday and spooled through hours of security video from closed-circuit television footage for clues, police said.

Litvinenko had told police he believed he had been poisoned Nov. 1 while investigating the October slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another Putin critic.

Polonium 210 can be found in Russia, which has several nuclear research facilities and a major space program, but Kremlin intelligence agents would be unlikely to use it since the origin could be traced, said Vladimir Slivyak, a nuclear expert. He said the material was most likely acquired on the European black market.

In Moscow, the government newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta pointed suspicion at London's Russian exile community. It portrayed Litvinenko as a pawn who "drank his poison . . . when he betrayed those he worked for."

The newspaper speculated that Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky was involved, aiming to use the death to discredit Putin's government or settle a business dispute. A presenter on Russia's state-run Channel One television said there was "a theory Litvinenko poisoned himself."

After Poisoning, Britain Sees No Big Public Threat (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 25 — The British authorities said Saturday that they did not expect a major threat to public health after the disclosure that a former Russian K.G.B. officer and enemy of the Kremlin had been killed by radiation poisoning in London.

The Health Protection Agency, however, urged people who had been in the same places as the victim, Alexander V. Litvinenko, 43, to contact the authorities for urine tests.

Mr. Litvinenko died Thursday as a result of poisoning by a radioactive isotope called polonium 210, but the police have not established how it entered his body. His friends have accused President Vladimir V. Putin of responsibility, but Mr. Putin has strongly denied the assertion.

The nature of the death evoked cold war spy thrillers as much as it kindled animosity between some Russian exiles and the Kremlin. And it left Britons pondering whether their capital had become a theater for a long-range conflict between them. British diplomats have generally sought to play down the incident, calling it a police matter.

On Saturday, the British government's crisis management committee, called Cobra for Cabinet Office Briefing Room A, met to debate the matter and the Health Protection Agency issued a new statement urging people who had gone to the sushi restaurant and hotel bar Mr. Litvinenko visited on Nov. 1 to contact Britain's National Health Service. The authorities said the number to call in Britain was 0845-4647.

"We expect that we are going to do tests, and we expect that they are going to be negative and we have no reason to think customers are at risk," the Health Protection Agency said in the statement.

The police said Mr. Litvinenko had visited the Itsu sushi bar in central London and the Pine Bar of the Mayfair Millennium Hotel on Nov. 1. They said on Friday that they had found radioactive traces at each location and at Mr. Litvinenko's home in north London.

"We want to reassure the public that the risk of having been exposed to this substance remains low," the Health Protection Agency statement said. "It can only represent a radiation hazard if it is taken into the body — by breathing it in, by taking it into the mouth, or if it gets into a wound."

The agency said it was also checking areas of two hospitals where Mr. Litvinenko had been treated.

In Russia, Mr. Litvinenko's death caused a different kind of sensation. "Abomination," the newspaper Komsomolskaya Pravda wrote Saturday. "That's what you think looking at the pandemonium created by the West" in reaction to Mr. Litvinenko's death.

The state newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta sought to shift the accusations to another target: one of Mr. Putin's fiercest critics, Boris A. Berezovsky, the self-exiled tycoon who was close to Mr. Litvinenko. The paper's assertions, without evidence, echoed others made by officials and news organizations all week.

Polonium That Killed Ex-spy Could Be From Russia, But Hard To Pin Blame (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

MOSCOW (AP) — The polonium-210 that doctors believe killed Kremlin critic and former spy Alexander Litvinenko could have come from Russia, but it will be difficult for investigators to pinpoint blame for the death even if the origin of the radioactive substance is determined, nuclear experts said Saturday.

Litvinenko blamed President Vladimir Putin in a statement signed days before his death in a London hospital Thursday, and bitter Kremlin foe Boris Berezovsky, an associate who spent time by Litvinenko's bedside, has said he suspected Russia's intelligence services were behind the alleged killing.

Polonium-210 is usually made artificially in a nuclear reactor or particle accelerator, and would likely come from a country with a significant nuclear program. With several nuclear research facilities, Russia fits the bill — and it also has a major space program, another sector in which the element has been used.

"There are many laboratories in Russia where it could be produced," said Vladimir Slivyak, a nuclear expert and co-chairman of the Russian environmental group Ekozashchita, or Ecodefense.

Alexander Pikayev, a senior analyst with the Moscow-based Institute for Global Economy and International Relations, said polonium isotope would be "much easier" to acquire than weapons-grade plutonium or highly enriched uranium because it is not considered weapons-grade.

Pikayev expressed deep doubt that any Russian organization was behind Litvinenko's death — which he said could only hurt Putin's reputation — and suggested that if a Russian intelligence agency had wanted to kill him, it would have been foolish to use polonium because its source could probably be traced.

"If any Russian special services were behind it, it was not a good idea to use this polonium, because they could find its origin," he told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

Slivyak also said British authorities might have a good chance of determining where the polonium was produced. However, he argued that the information would be far short of proof of a plot in the country of origin because the substance could have been acquired on the black market.

"To say precisely after this that a concrete intelligence agency or government is involved would be difficult," he said.

If Russia's Federal Security Service, or FSB, wanted to use polonium to kill somebody, "from the point of the view of the FSB it would be better not to bring it from Russia but to buy it on the black market in Europe" in order to avoid leaving a trail, Slivyak said.

"Even if it was produced in a Russian laboratory, and even if this is documented, anyway it will be possible to say that this is not true, it's a falsification, or to say, 'We don't know, one gram was lost 10 years ago and we're not to blame,'" he said. "And in any case nobody from abroad will be allowed into the laboratory to check, because they'll say it's a closed enterprise, it's related to defense or to the space program."

Conversely, he said, a country of origin other than Russia would not rule out Russian involvement.

A senior Putin aide suggested Friday that Litvinenko's killing was part of a campaign to discredit Russia and its president, and Russian lawmakers and state-run television networks pointed the finger at Berezovsky, a more prominent associate of Litvinenko who provided financing for a book detailing allegations that the FSB was behind deadly 1999 apartment-building bombings that stoked popular support for a new war in Chechnya.

The government newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta added to the speculation that Berezovsky was involved, running an article whose sub-headline read: "Theories about the former FSB colonel's death are in one way or another linked with Berezovsky."

Among other scenarios, the article included speculation that Berezovsky could have had Litvinenko killed and "masked the crime to bring suspicion on the FSB" or that associates of Berezovsky could have had Litvinenko killed as a warning to the tycoon over a business dispute.

It portrayed Litvinenko — a former FSB agent who publicly accused his superiors of ordering him to kill Berezovsky and later fled to Britain — as a violent and unintelligent pawn who "made his choice and drank his poison ... when he betrayed those he worked for."

Television networks had few reports Saturday on Litvinenko's death, but a news announcer on state-run Channel One singled out what she said was "a theory (that) Litvinenko poisoned himself."

DOJ_NMG_0098257

Protestant Militant Charged In Belfast Attack (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Nov. 25 — A Protestant militant was charged with attempted murder on Saturday, a day after being arrested in an attempt to attack Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, leaders of the main Roman Catholic party Sinn Fein, as they and other legislators worked toward a power-sharing agreement to restore local rule to Northern Ireland.

The militant, Michael Stone, who was released from prison six years ago after serving time for some of the most high-profile sectarian killings at the height of Northern Ireland's conflict, was stopped at the main entrance to the provincial assembly, carrying an imitation gun and a bag of homemade pipe bombs.

As Mr. Stone shouted Protestant militant slogans, he was disarmed in a struggle with security guards at the revolving doors leading to the lobby and was later led away by two police officers.

On Saturday, Mr. Stone, 51, was charged with five counts of attempted murder and possession of articles for terrorist purposes, including nail bombs, an ax and a garrote. He was also charged with possessing explosives with intent to endanger life and possessing an imitation firearm.

The attack disrupted an assembly of Northern Ireland politicians, including the Sinn Fein leaders Mr. Adams and Mr. McGuinness, who had met with Protestant politicians to discuss proposals to restore a power-sharing local government for the province. The debating chamber is close to the main lobby of the assembly buildings.

The meeting itself was a failure before the attack, as Rev. Ian Paisley, a Protestant leader, declined to nominate himself to be first minister, a post in which he would have served with Mr. McGuinness. That failure technically broke a deadline set by the British and Irish governments to organize a new power-sharing government. Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain has said that the overall goal of putting a government in place by next March still stands.

Mr. Stone became an iconic figure for Protestant militants when he killed three mourners in an attack on an Irish Republican Army funeral in Belfast in 1988, as Sinn Fein leaders, including Mr. Adams and Mr. Guinness, stood by the grave.

Ecuador's Path And Alliances At Stake In Runoff Election (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Nov. 25 — No one can accuse Ecuador, which will elect its eighth president in 10 years on Sunday, of dull politics.

Rafael Correa, a candidate in Sunday's runoff, strums a guitar before audiences between promises to whip Ecuador's political elite with his belt and shut the last American military base in South America. He chastises the Bush administration in the polished English he learned while earning a doctorate in economics at the University of Illinois.

Álvaro Noboa, his rival, is a billionaire who hands out free computers and fistfuls of dollars at his rallies. Mr. Noboa, a banana tycoon who is Ecuador's richest man, dropped to his knees this month at a campaign stop to ask for votes as a self-described "messiah of the poor."

But the contest is far more than entertaining; the outcome could actually redraw power relations in Latin America.

Mr. Noboa, 56, surprised analysts by winning the first round of voting in October and maintaining a double-digit lead for much of the past month. A victory by Mr. Noboa, who has failed in two other campaigns for the presidency, would align Ecuador, an oil-exporting country of 13 million people, with Andean countries like Colombia and Peru that have strengthened ties with the United States.

By law here, the results of opinion polls may not be published in the 20 days before an election, and in recent days, each candidate has claimed a wide lead. However, the results of polls conducted in part for foreign banks were exchanged by e-mail throughout the country, creating a rift of information between those with Internet access and those without.

One such poll, by Cedatos-Gallup and released Friday for clients of the investment bank Credit Suisse, showed that among those who plan to cast a vote for one of the candidates, Mr. Correa had the support of 52 percent against 48 percent for Mr. Noboa. The poll has a margin of error of three percentage points, essentially putting the candidates in a statistical tie. Though polls are often unreliable in Ecuador, the results put financial markets on edge with investors selling off Ecuadorean bonds in New York on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0098258

Ramiro Crespo, president of Analytica Securities, a Quito investment bank, said he was so fed up with Ecuador's recent history of political instability that he would declare his vote null. (Voting is obligatory in Ecuador.)

"I'm tired of choosing the lesser evil," he said, adding, "Correa is a sophisticated academic who sees economics in the abstract, but he has never had to make a payroll each Friday, let alone run a country."

Mr. Correa, 43, has moderated his radical talk somewhat in recent weeks, meeting with the American ambassador in Quito and saying his harsh comments about President Bush were "imprudent." But he still says he would renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt and opposes renewing an agreement that allows the United States military to operate from Manta, a port city on the Pacific coast.

Most controversially, Mr. Correa also boasts of his friendship with President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, who would be glad to fold Ecuador into an anti-American alliance that now includes Bolivia and Cuba.

Mr. Chávez had been unusually quiet about Ecuador's presidential race, perhaps stung by the recent defeats of candidates with perceived ties to Venezuela in Peru and Mexico, but he broke that silence this month in a news conference with foreign journalists in Caracas, describing Mr. Noboa as "the banana king who exploits his workers and exploits children and puts them to work."

Mr. Noboa denies that children have worked in banana plantations connected to his company, though Human Rights Watch in 2002 documented cases of children in such circumstances working in plantations that supplied his company.

Sometimes appearing in public with a large crucifix around his neck, Mr. Noboa has repeatedly called Mr. Correa a "communist devil" and "colonel," an allusion to his admiration of the militaristic Mr. Chávez.

"Noboa has been a pure demagogue with promises that are impossible to fulfill, like building 300,000 houses, curing the sick, cutting electricity costs in half," said Fernando Santos, a political analyst and former energy minister.

Still, Mr. Noboa also grew more moderate in recent days, saying he would not cut diplomatic ties with Venezuela and Cuba as he had earlier pledged.

The winner, who will serve a four-year term, will face a fractious and powerful congress, one of the biggest impediments to presidents finishing their terms in Ecuador, though Mr. Correa would be in a weaker position than Mr. Noboa, who has a stronger congressional base.

Some analysts fear that Mr. Noboa, already a towering business figure who controls more than 100 companies, would use the presidency to advance his economic interests, concerns echoed by Mr. Correa's frequent contention that his opponent would rule the country like a "banana plantation."

In Ecuadoran Vote, Rhetoric Gives Way To Popular Pledges (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Nov. 25 -- No matter who wins Ecuador's presidential election on Sunday, many outside the country will view it as a decision between dueling political stereotypes: Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez's dream of a unified region liberated from U.S. influence, or that of free-market backers embracing a globalized economy.

For most who will actually make the choice, it's nothing of the sort.

Public opinion polls show leftist economist Rafael Correa and banana tycoon Alvaro Noboa locked in a near dead heat, and in recent weeks broad ideological rhetoric has given way to specific promises of concrete and cash. Each candidate has tried to one-up the other with vows of massive government housing projects, new jobs and low-interest loans.

In a country where no president has served a full term in more than a decade, voters want to see some tangible results from their next leader, and it matters little what overarching political philosophy stands behind his pledges.

The campaign since last month's first-round election has been bitterly divisive, with repeated allegations of electoral fraud, increasing the possibility that either candidate would face a rough honeymoon. Throw in serious doubts about the pre-election promises -- some are simply unfeasible, according to analysts -- and many fear that the election will do little to ease Ecuador's chronic political instability.

DOJ_NMG_0098259

"It doesn't matter which of the two candidates wins, Ecuador will have a weak president, at the mercy of the Congress and facing difficulties of governability," said AdriÃ¡n Bonilla, director of the Latin American Faculty of Social Sciences in Quito.

In last month's election, Noboa got 26.8 percent of the vote to edge out Correa by four percentage points. The latest polls give Correa a slight edge, though few political observers put much faith in them; the same polls had predicted that Correa would finish ahead of Noboa in the first round.

Correa, 43, a charismatic economist who received his doctorate at the University of Illinois, spent the early stages of his campaign promising to kill a proposed free-trade agreement with the United States, close a U.S. military base used for anti-drug operations and default on the nation's foreign debt so that social spending could be increased. He has also vowed to revamp Ecuador's political system by disbanding Congress and convening a constituent assembly in its place.

But after the first round, Correa retooled his campaign to focus on specific domestic spending programs, such as housing grants and microcredits for the poor. Though he has never backed away from his belief that globalization works against small countries like Ecuador, he spoke little of his broad economic theories or of his more controversial plans, such as the constituent assembly.

"I think he got some people a little nervous in Ecuador, which is why he didn't do as well in the first round as many expected," said Michael Shifter, an analyst with Inter-American Dialogue, a policy forum in Washington. "Now he's trying to moderate and tone down his rhetoric. I suspect this also reflects a realization that some of these proposals just aren't going to be politically palatable, both in Ecuador and internationally."

Unlike ChÃ¡vez, whom he considers a friend, Correa would not have the benefit of plentiful oil revenue to help underwrite his policy initiatives. And while some of his proposals are similar to those of Bolivian President Evo Morales, Correa has neither the popular support that gave Morales a comfortable first-round election victory last year nor a political party to back him in Congress. Correa's proposed constituent assembly thus could be difficult to achieve.

"If he takes it to the people and gets popular backing for an assembly, then Congress won't be a problem," said Orazio J. Bellettini, executive director of Faro Group, a political policy group in Quito that promotes governmental transparency. "But the second scenario is that the people don't support it overwhelmingly, and then he would face a very strong crisis, standing on his own with no Congress members."

Difficulties with Congress have contributed to the early downfalls of several Ecuadoran presidents, including Lucio GutiÃ©rrez, who was ousted last year after the legislature accused him of abandoning his post.

Correa paints Noboa -- Ecuador's richest man -- as the face of an oligarchy that he says has corrupted the highest reaches of government. Noboa owns more than 110 businesses, including one of the world's largest banana exporting companies, which he inherited from his father. Correa has repeatedly told his followers to suspect fraud if Noboa wins on Sunday.

"There is no place for indecision," Correa said at a rally Friday. "The decision is between being patriotic or becoming the plantation of the richest and most conceited heir in this country."

Noboa, 56, is an old-fashioned populist who dropped to his knees during stump speeches, holding a Bible in his hands and saying he was sent by God to help rid the world of communism. He tells voters that God gave him riches to share with them, often passing out T-shirts, wheelchairs and other gifts at public appearances. He favors free trade and says he will work to encourage foreign investment, but the cornerstones of his campaign are promises of more jobs and government housing. He has vowed to build 300,000 homes each year, or 1.2 million over a four-year term -- a huge number, considering there were 6.6 million voters in the first-round election.

"In my 15 years of working with him, I know that no one cares more about this country and no one has more to lose if the country collapses than does Alvaro," said Bernardo Manzano, director general of the Noboa company that exports millions of Bonita brand bananas to markets all over the world.

But those strong business ties to the country's economy are a source of worry for his detractors, who argue that they could easily produce conflicts of interest.

DOJ_NMG_0098260

Already, the lines between his businesses and his political party and campaign are barely distinguishable. As Manzano toured one of Noboa's plantations this week, he consulted his BlackBerry to check results of the latest poll, which he had commissioned himself.

Noboa's business history has also forced him to defend himself against allegations of exploitation. In 2002, a Human Rights Watch report stated that Noboa employed child laborers on some of his banana plantations. Later that year, a conflict with workers led to a violent standoff and contributed to Noboa's lingering reputation for being hard on organized labor. Manzano said the company no longer employs children, offering as evidence reports from local and international inspectors, copies of which he keeps at hand in his office.

"See? No child labor," he said, flipping through pages of recent reports. "They keep coming back, and coming back, and not finding anything. All of the accusations are just part of a very dirty political campaign."

Divided, Unhappy Ecuadoreans Head To Polls (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

QUITO, ECUADOR — Divided and disenchanted, Ecuadoreans vote today for a new president, choosing between two populists who seemed to spend more time during the campaign trading insults than offering ideas.

Right-wing billionaire Alvaro Noboa accused his opponent, economist Rafael Correa, of being a puppet of Cuba's Fidel Castro and Venezuela's Hugo Chavez who doesn't have the guts to admit he is a communist.

Correa accused Noboa of exploiting child labor and cheating his family out of control Ecuador's largest banana plantation.

The ugly rhetoric has turned off voters and deepened the divide between right and left, analysts say. Recent newspaper editorials reflected the disaffection that voters feel toward the pair, who were the top two finishers among 13 candidates in an Oct. 15 primary.

Public opinion polls indicated that the outcome of today's vote would be too close to predict.

To avoid miscues that could set off civil disturbances, Ecuador's electoral tribunal said it could take two days to review and certify the result.

Officials at the Organization of American States, which is monitoring the vote, said they feared an aftermath similar to that in Mexico, where a disputed presidential election in July spawned continuing unrest.

"Neither one is going to last six months in office before the people drive them out," predicted a municipal official in the southern city of Loja, who asked that his name not be used.

Ecuador's last two elected presidents, Jamil Mahuad and Lucio Gutierrez, were driven from office by street protests.

Both candidates have promised to provide more housing, education and health coverage if elected.

But the newspaper El Mercurio of the southern city of Cuenca voiced the fear in an editorial Saturday that the winner would be forced from office "within a few months" if he failed to deliver on promises.

Noboa, 56, who inherited Ecuador's largest banana plantation, near Guayaquil, and who has been listed by Forbes magazine as among the world's richest men, has run twice for president. He lost to Mahuad in 1998 and to Gutierrez in 2002. He has promised to build 300,000 housing units his first year in office.

Noboa frequently handed out cash, computers and wheelchairs at his campaign rallies. He also frequently knelt, Bible in hand, in front of crowds to pray to God to protect Ecuador from a Correa victory.

"I am on my knees to pray for housing, stability and jobs for Ecuador," Noboa said Thursday at his closing campaign stop in Guayaquil.

Correa, 43, has tapped into many Ecuadoreans' disgust with the nation's corrupt and fractured political system.

But he saw a big lead over the field of candidates evaporate in the final days before the presidential primary, partly because of his harsh anti-U.S. stance.

He has toned down the rhetoric, but remains opposed to a free-trade agreement with the United States, the "dollarization" of the Ecuadorean economy and extending the lease on the Manta air base, which the U.S. uses for spying on the drug trade.

A self-professed admirer and friend of Chavez, Correa has made the U.S. government and Wall Street nervous.

DOJ_NMG_0098261

If elected, he would join a group of Latin American leaders who are sharply critical of Washington, including the leaders of Venezuela, Argentina and Bolivia.

Correa has said he would seek to renegotiate payment on Ecuador's foreign debt.

Ecuador Votes To Decide President (BBC)

BBC.com, November 26, 2006

Ecuador goes to the polls to elect a new president on Sunday, in a tight run-off vote with the two candidates running neck-and-neck.

Opinion polls suggest left-wing Rafael Correa and conservative Alvaro Noboa are both attracting equal support.

International observers have urged both candidates to be restrained when early results start to come in.

The Organisation of American States wants all results to be officially counted before a victor is proclaimed.

Both candidates have promised to create jobs and fight poverty and corruption.

Mr Correa has gained a slight edge over Mr Noboa in opinion polls but the large number of undecided voters make the victor uncertain.

Insults traded

Ecuador is in a delicate state, says the BBC's correspondent Daniel Schweimler in Ecuador's capital Quito.

The country is becoming increasingly polarised, says our correspondent, people are disillusioned with its politicians and are impatient for change.

Three presidents in the past ten years have been forced from office by angry crowds.

Only three presidents since 1979 have served full terms.

The election has been marred by allegations of fraud In October's first-round vote, Mr Correa said the count was fraudulent and that he had won a clear victory.

Mr Noboa, Ecuador's richest man, said Mr Correa's campaign had been financed by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

"Correa wants an insurrection, a civil war in which the poor will die," said Mr Noboa.

He has already made two unsuccessful runs for the presidency, in 1998 and 2002.

He has accused his opponent of wanting to install a communist dictatorship and drive Ecuador into the camp of Venezuela's anti-American President Chavez.

Mr Noboa made his fortune in bananas and has promised to bring foreign investment to Ecuador. He frequently campaigned carrying a bible.

Mr Correa has said he would maintain good relations with the United States despite having called President George W Bush a "dimwit".

He has said he wants to renegotiate contracts with foreign oil companies and has threatened to reduce payments on Ecuador's foreign debt.

At his final rally, Mr Correa urged his supporters to follow the vehicles transporting ballot boxes to make sure votes were not tampered with.

"Watch out for alterations of results, ballot box switching; ensure there is no vote-buying."

An election win for Mr Noboa, he warned, would turn Ecuador into the banana magnate's "estate".

Police, Protesters Clash In Mexican City (AP)

By Rebeca Romero, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Police fired tear gas at dozens of protesters hurling gasoline bombs, rocks and powerful fireworks near the main square of this southern Mexican city troubled by months of unrest.

The clashes erupted as some 4,000 leftist protesters marched to within two blocks of the main square. They had announced plans to "encircle" police forces who dislodged demonstrators from the main square in a raid a month ago.

Federal detained at least three dozen mainly youthful protesters.

DOJ_NMG_0098262

The government news agency Notimex reported that nine people suffered minor injuries in the confrontation, and that the fireworks — large bottle rockets fired from shoulder-mounted tubes — started fires in several houses near the plaza.

The demonstrators, some with their faces covered with bandanas, T-shirts or ski masks, hurled insults at the lines of federal police blocking the way into the square. The police used their riot shields to fend off the objects, then fired tear gas canisters, forcing the protesters to retreat.

The protesters are demanding the resignation of Oaxaca state Gov. Ulises Ruiz, accusing him of brutality, corruption and electoral fraud.

Chanting "Ulises Ruiz, get out of Oaxaca," the demonstrators were angered by reports that a spokesman for their movement — the People's Assembly of Oaxaca — had been detained by police earlier in the day. Those reports could not be immediately confirmed.

Alongside striking teachers — most of whom have returned to work and did not take part in Saturday's demonstration — the protesters seized much of the city starting late May. Police regained control of much of the downtown area in an October raid.

The protesters set up camp at a square a few blocks away and still retain control of barricades in some sectors; they are now demanding that federal police leave the city.

Nine people have been killed in the clashes, including freelance video journalist Bradley Roland Will, 36, of New York, who was filming leftist protesters who clashed with a group of armed men. Both sides fired. It is not clear who shot first.

Several governments, including the United States, have warned tourists to stay away from Oaxaca City, formerly popular with tourists for its nearby ruins, cuisine, colonial architecture and handicrafts.

Pinochet Takes Responsibility For Regime (AP)

By Eduardo Gallardo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Gen. Augusto Pinochet took full responsibility for the first time Saturday for the actions of his 1973-90 dictatorship, which carried out thousands of political killings and is blamed for widespread torture and illegal imprisonment.

At a celebration of his 91st birthday, Pinochet also defended the bloody military coup that toppled freely elected Marxist President Salvador Allende, in a statement read aloud by his wife as he sat by her side.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all and that I take political responsibility for everything that was done which had no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration," he said.

"I assume full political responsibility for what happened."

Pinochet, surrounded by family, bodyguards and retired generals outside his home, raised his hand to acknowledge about 200 supporters gathered outside who sang him "Happy Birthday" and chanted "Long live Chile! Long live Pinochet!" A mariachi band played one of his favorite songs. After about a half-hour, he slowly stood and walked inside supported by a cane and the arm of a bodyguard.

According to an official report, 3,197 people were killed for political reasons under Pinochet, including more than 1,000 who were made to disappear. Thousands more were illegally imprisoned, tortured or forced into exile.

Pinochet rarely speaks in public and has not made such extensive comments for several years.

Ricardo Israel, a political scientist at the University of Chile, said Pinochet has never taken full responsibility for his regime's actions, instead blaming abuses on subordinates.

"But I think it's too late," Israel told The Associated Press. "He should have done it while he was in power, or when he remained as army commander after stepping down. Things would have been different."

In his statement, Pinochet claimed the military had to act against Allende's government because the social and political convulsions at the time were threatening the country's integrity.

He also sent "a message of support to my comrades in arms, many of whom are imprisoned, suffering persecution and revenge," in a clear reference to the scores of trials of military officers for rights abuses.

DOJ_NMG_0098263

"It is not fair to demand punishment for those who prevented the continuation and worsening of the worse political and economic crisis than one can remember," he added.

Pinochet is currently under indictment in two human rights abuse cases and for tax evasion, and has scores of others criminal suits pending, filed by victims of abuses or their relatives. Until now, the courts have dropped the charges against him citing his poor health.

He spoke of his own legal problems in the statement, and indicated that he accepted the prosecutions as a necessary part of the process of national healing.

"All the vexations, persecutions and injustices affecting me and my family, I gladly offer for the sake of harmony and peace that must prevail among Chileans," Pinochet said.

He defended his 1973 coup and the military regime, saying it left "a vigorous, modern, admired country."

"I am absolutely certain that tomorrow, once the political passions and resentments are ended, history will judge our work objectively and will recognize that we put Chile on top of the nations in our continent."

Rebels Take Control Of City In Eastern Chad (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BANGUI, Central African Republic, Nov. 25 — Rebels seeking to topple the government of Chad seized a crucial eastern city early on Saturday, according to aid workers based in the region.

Gunfire erupted about 6:30 a.m. in Abéché, the largest city in eastern Chad and the operating base for dozens of aid organizations looking after 200,000 Sudanese refugees and 50,000 displaced Chadians, said Claire Bourgeois, chief of the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Abéché.

“The rebels are in the city,” Ms. Bourgeois said by satellite phone. After several hours of artillery and gunfire, the rebels had control of the city, she said, and several government buildings had been looted. At least 13 people were wounded, but that figure will probably rise, she said, once more people trickled from their homes to the city hospital.

The rebels are believed to be militants from a group known by the initials U.F.D.D., one of several groups based in Sudan seeking to overthrow Idriss Déby, the president of Chad. The rebels instructed city residents and aid workers to remain in their homes and offices and said that they did not intend to harm any civilians.

“The situation now is completely calm,” Ms. Bourgeois said. “They have sent a message saying we should not be worried, they have nothing against humanitarian actors, nothing against the local population.”

France, the former colonial power in Chad, has a military base in Abéché, but it was not fired upon, according to the French Embassy in Ndjamena, the capital. French soldiers took control of Abéché’s airport, according to aid officials.

Speaking on Chadian national radio, a top military official said that the army had withdrawn for tactical reasons and to avoid loss of civilian life, but had the city surrounded. Mahamat Nouri, leader of the U.F.D.D., told the BBC that his men would march to Ndjamena.

Several Chadian rebel groups have been trying to remove Mr. Déby for more than a year, saying his government is despotic and corrupt. Chad, one of the poorest and most volatile nations in Africa, has become even more unstable as the conflict in Sudan’s western region of Darfur between non-Arab insurgents and the Arab-dominated government has spilled over the border into Chad.

The Sudanese government accuses Chad of supporting the Darfur rebels, and Chad’s government accuses Sudan of supporting the rebel groups menacing the capital. Chadian rebel groups have operated openly inside Sudanese territory, using Darfur as a base, and Darfur rebels are similarly brazen in their use of Chadian territory to regroup, rearm and organize.

In April, a month before a presidential election was scheduled, a rebel group attacked the capital but was repulsed by Chadian troops. Last month a rebel group briefly overran several provincial towns in the southeast, but then fell back. Since then, the government has been bracing for a new attack.

Rebels "Seize" Two Chadian Towns (BBC)

BBC.com, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098264

Rebel forces in Chad say they have captured the eastern town of Biltine, hours after another group said it had taken control of nearby Abeche.

The government has denied that either town is under rebel control, although the army said it had withdrawn troops from Abeche for tactical reasons.

Several rebel groups in eastern Chad want to depose President Idriss Deby.

Observers say this appears to be the first time two rebel groups have launched co-ordinated attacks.

The BBC's Stephanie Hancock in the Chadian capital, N'Djamena, says this could prove a turning point in Chad's rebellion.

A spokesman for UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said he was concerned by the reports of violence in Chad.

"The secretary general reiterates his condemnation of any attempt to seize power by force. He urges the Chadian protagonists to engage in dialogue," the spokesman said.

Heavy gunfire

The first attack came at around dawn in Abeche, about 700km (440 miles) east of N'Djamena.

Aid workers and residents reported heavy gunfire as rebels approached the city, and small arms fire was heard in Abeche itself.

The rebel group involved, the Union of Forces for Democracy and Development (UFDD), later issued a statement saying its men had taken over Abeche with little resistance from the Chadian army.

However, the government continues to claim that the rebels are not in control of what is a key town in the east.

Speaking on national radio, the Chadian army's second-in-command said troops had withdrawn to the outskirts of the town for tactical reasons and to avoid civilian losses.

He urged people to stay calm and accused neighbouring Sudan of backing rebel forces in Chad.

The UFDD's leader, Mahamat Nouri, told the BBC he would continue to fight until his men had captured Chad's capital, N'Djamena.

Ethnic clashes

Hours later, a second rebel alliance claimed that it had taken control of the town of Biltine, some 80km (50 miles) to the north of Abeche.

Chad's defence minister told the BBC a column of rebel vehicles had been detected in the Biltine area but denied rebel claims the town had been taken.

Rebel groups want to oust President Idriss Deby's government

On Friday there were reports of as many as 200 rebel vehicles circulating in eastern Chad and the Chadian army was on full alert.

The last major rebel attack was in April, when rebels drove from eastern Chad to N'Djamena before being overpowered.

Much of Chad is under a state of emergency, after ethnic clashes which are reported to have killed hundreds of people in recent weeks.

The French embassy in Chad issued warnings to its citizens, following reports that rebels in the east were planning a new offensive and moving west.

Conflict in Sudan's Darfur region has spilled across the border into Chad, which accuses the country of exporting its violence. Khartoum denies this.

The UN estimates that more than 200,000 refugees from Sudan are in Chad and that more than 50,000 Chadians have been displaced by fighting between Arab and non-Arab groups.

Sudan denies claims that it backs Chad's rebels, while Chad denies supporting the black African rebels in Darfur.

A Sister's Sacrifice (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

GOZ AMIR, Chad

DOJ_NMG_0098265

When the janjaweed militia attacked Fareeda, a village here in southeastern Chad near Darfur, an elderly man named Simih Yahya didn't run because that would have meant leaving his frail wife behind. So the janjaweed grabbed Mr. Simih and, shouting insults against blacks, threw him to the ground and piled grass on his back.

Then they started a bonfire on top of him.

But his wife, Halima, normally fragile and submissive, furiously tried to tug the laughing militia members from her husband. She pleaded with them to spare his life. Finally, she threw herself on top of the fire, burning herself but eventually extinguishing it with her own body.

The janjaweed may have been shamed by her courage, for Mr. Simih recalls them then walking away and saying, "Oh, he will die anyway." He told me the story as he was treated at a hospital where doctors peeled burned flesh from his back.

Atrocities like this make up the news and constitute the Sudanese-sponsored genocide here in the region surrounding Darfur, but it is also stories like this — of superhuman courage — that keep me going through my reporting here. Invariably, the most memorable stories to emerge from genocide aren't those of the Adolf Eichmanns, but those of the Anne Franks and Raoul Wallenbergs. Side by side with the most nauseating evil, you stumble across the most exhilarating humanity.

So this is a column about the uplifting side of genocide.

I see examples all the time, from the aid workers who persevere against impossible odds (13 have been murdered in Darfur since May) to the children who carry bows and arrows to try to protect their parents from men with machine guns.

One of the most inspiring people here is Suad Ahmed, a 25-year-old mother of two from Darfur. She lives here in the Goz Amir refugee camp, and last month she was collecting firewood with her beloved little sister, Halima, when a band of janjaweed ambushed them.

The janjaweed regularly attack women and girls — part of a Sudanese policy of rape to terrorize and drive away black African tribes — and Ms. Suad knew how brutal the attacks are. A 12-year-old neighbor girl had been kidnapped by the janjaweed and gang-raped for a week; the girl's legs were pulled so far apart that she is now crippled.

But Ms. Suad's thoughts were only for her sister, who is just 10. "You are a virgin, and you must escape," she told her. "Run! I'll let myself be captured, but you must run and escape."

The local culture is such that if the little girl were raped, she might never be able to marry. So Ms. Suad made herself a decoy and allowed herself to be caught, while her sister escaped back to the camp.

Ms. Suad plays down her heroism, saying that even if she had tried to escape, she might have been caught anyway, for she was five months pregnant. Or, she says, maybe she and her sister both would have been captured.

In any case, however, the janjaweed beat Ms. Suad, and seven of them gang-raped her despite her pregnancy. "You black people have no land," she recalls them telling her. "This land is not for you."

People from the camp found Ms. Suad in the hills that evening, too injured to walk, and carried her back. Ms. Suad said she didn't seek medical treatment, because she wanted to keep the rape as much of a secret as possible and didn't even tell her husband, although he eventually found out along with a few others. He accepted that it was not her fault.

(She found the courage to give an on-the-record interview, a video of which is with the online version of this column, after a tribal leader told her that it might help other Darfuris if the world knew what was happening to women here.)

The gang rape and beating were excruciating, she says, but her sacrifice was worth it. "When my sister saw me brought back and saw what had happened to me, she understood," Ms. Suad says. "She is very grateful to me."

So, yes, this is a land of numbing brutality, scarred by what may be the ugliest crime of all, genocide — abetted by indifference abroad. But it has elicited the best of humanity along with the worst. In Ms. Suad and those like her, I find a courage, nobility and compassion that offer a perfect contrast to the fecklessness of the rest of the world.

Sri Lanka Rebels' Critic Silenced By Bullet (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098266

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — The killer asked for "Keteshwaran," the man's battle name from his years in the Tamil militant movement. For whatever reason, it made Kethesh Loganathan come quickly down the stairs and to the front gate of his house. He did not have a chance to open the gate. Through the grille, his killer put a bullet through his head. He died quickly.

In his death lay a vital lesson for outspoken Tamils, the country's largest ethnic minority and a group whose political rights are at the center of Sri Lanka's intensifying, nearly 25-year conflict.

Mr. Loganathan, 54, was among the fiercest critics of the ethnic separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, and they are widely blamed for his death. The group has neither accepted nor rejected the accusation.

No one has been arrested in connection with the killing.

The Tamil Tigers have likewise been blamed for the killings of some of Sri Lanka's most prominent Tamil intellectuals, especially those who ally themselves with the government, as Mr. Loganathan did this year when he became deputy secretary general of the government agency coordinating the peace process.

His killing, on Aug. 12, occurred exactly a year after the assassination of Lakshman Kadirgamar, the former Sri Lankan foreign minister and the highest-ranking ethnic Tamil in the government. Shortly after his death, a rebel-affiliated Web site described Mr. Loganathan as "Tamil betrayer Kadirgamar Junior."

In 1999, Neelan Thiruchelvan, the architect of a seminal power-sharing arrangement that would have offered broad political autonomy to the Tamils, though not necessarily to the Tamil Tigers, was killed in a suicide bombing. Anti-rebel politicians like Douglas Devananda, leader of the Eelam People's Democratic Party, have eluded so many assassination attempts that most people here have lost count; he lives today in a virtual bunker under state protection.

Dissent, as critics of the Tamil Tigers are fond of reminding, is decidedly unwelcome in the rebel playbook. Or, as the stridently anti-rebel group University Teachers for Human Rights declared in a statement three days after Mr. Loganathan was killed, "this organization can and would pick off its unarmed opponents at will, should they persist in giving hope to the people."

Mr. Loganathan, his friends and colleagues recalled, was unusual among the many detractors of the Tamil Tigers. He was a Tamil nationalist, deeply versed in the language and ideology of the Tamil Tiger cause, but virulently opposed to its methods. He belonged to another Tamil militant group, the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front, until the mid-1990s. The Tamil Tigers systematically killed many of his comrades.

Mr. Loganathan was unforgiving of the Tamil Tigers' human rights record. He was a strident critic of their fundamental claim that only the Tigers represented Tamil interests in Sri Lanka.

"He knew their thinking," said Jehan Perera, media director of the National Peace Council, a nonpartisan research and advocacy group. "He critiqued them in their language."

Mr. Perera described Mr. Loganathan's approach as "adversarial." The day of his assassination, Mr. Loganathan, who was as critical of the way the Norwegian-mediated peace talks were moving as he was of the rebels, was writing a response to an essay that Mr. Perera had written for an upcoming seminar on the peace process. He had spent the day working at home. He had told his wife, Bhawani, that he would have to opt out of their Saturday habit of visiting a Hindu temple somewhere in the city, then eating out.

They were a reclusive pair, Mrs. Loganathan recalled, childless and averse to social outings. They lived on a narrow street in an unremarkable, ethnically mixed middle-class neighborhood here in the capital. She said her husband was resolutely opposed to having a security guard at home. She opposed his joining the state peace secretariat. But she knew there was no blocking her husband's aspirations.

"He was a very stubborn person," Mrs. Loganathan recalled recently at home. "He would do what he wanted to do. No one could stop him."

By the time he was killed, he was in frail health and had been gradually losing his hearing. A few days before his death, for reasons that still puzzle her, he told her he wished to die before she did. She remembered looking at him and asking him flatly, "Have you received a threat?" He said he had not.

Later that night, she said she quietly prayed that she would survive him; she knew she was his sole caretaker.

Shortly before his death, Mrs. Loganathan recalled, they were upstairs watching the 9 p.m. television news together, when a man called out from the front gate. She went to the balcony to have a look. She could make out a dark-colored, old-model car parked outside and a man saying he had come from the police department for "Keteshwaran." It wasn't entirely unusual for a police officer to visit.

DOJ_NMG_0098267

At the mention of the name, her husband rushed downstairs. From upstairs, she heard him asking for the visitor's identity card. Then she heard the gunfire.

Awaiting Lengthy Lab Confirmation Of Bird Flu Risks Treatment Delays, Studies Find (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

Because detecting Avian flu with standard tests is so difficult and time-consuming, waiting for laboratory confirmation of an outbreak would cause dangerous treatment delays, according to new studies of two flu outbreaks.

The studies, published Thursday in The New England Journal of Medicine, were of family clusters of flu cases in Turkey and Indonesia.

Rapid tests on nose and throat swabs failed every time, and in Turkey, so did all follow-up tests known as Elisas. The only tests that consistently worked were polymerase chain reaction tests, or PCRs, which can be done only in advanced laboratories and take several hours.

"It'll be a disaster if we have to use PCRs for everybody," said Dr. Anne Moscona, a professor of pediatrics and immunology at Weill Cornell Medical College. "It just isn't available at a whole lot of places."

If the A(H5N1) flu mutates into a pandemic strain, rapid tests "will be really key," she said.

The studies followed clusters in three families in Indonesia in 2005 and in what appears to have been one extended family near Dogubayazit, in eastern Turkey, in January. Case clusters particularly worry public health authorities because they raise the possibility that the flu is mutating to spread faster between people.

In the Indonesian cases, the authors, from Indonesia, the World Health Organization and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, concluded that human-to-human transmission had probably taken place in two of the three family clusters. In one case, a 38-year-old government auditor appeared to have caught the flu from his 8-year-old daughter or her 1-year-old sister. All three died; his wife and two sons did not get sick. No one in the family had any known contact with poultry, wild birds, animals or sick people, so the source was a mystery.

"But you can't always tell what a young child has done," said Dr. Tim Uyeki, a Centers for Disease Control flu specialist and an author of the study. "There's no magical test, and you don't always get a perfect explanation."

The Dogubayazit cluster was a cause célèbre for some Internet flu-watchers following Turkish news reports in January. They contended that widespread human-to-human transmission seemed to be taking place, and that it may have begun at a banquet attended in late December by members of two related families named Ozcan and Kocyigit. The Turkish government and the World Health Organization did not link the cases or families and tentatively blamed birds for all transmission.

The studies showed how wide a net was cast: 290 people were tested at one hospital because they either had flu symptoms or contact with dying birds, or both. All were given the antiviral drug oseltamivir, which is also sold as Tamiflu, and about half were hospitalized. That accorded with health organization recommendations: widespread testing and use of antivirals, both to save lives and to snuff out any suspected outbreak of a mutant strain.

Only 10 came up positive on PCR tests, and 8 of those were confirmed by a World Health Organization laboratory. All were children; four died. The studies confirmed suspicions that the families were linked; 7 of the 8 children were related or lived near each other. The December banquet was not mentioned.

It was impossible to tell whether the other argument made by the Internet flu-watchers was correct: that poor testing and the oseltamivir had disguised the extent of the outbreak. But the lead author, Dr. Ahmet Faik Oner, a professor of medicine at Yuzuncu Yil University in Turkey, said in a telephone interview that he believed that there had been no human-to-human transmission because all the children had been in close contact with poultry within seven or fewer days before they fell ill and none of their parents or the hospital staff members that treated them had become sick.

Dr. Uyeki declined to comment on the Turkey outbreak, but said both studies lent support to the theory that some people were genetically more susceptible to the flu.

DOJ_NMG_0098268

DOJ_NMG_0098269

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Government Urges Supreme Court To Stay Out Of Times Case (NYT) ... 3
Court Asked To Stay Out Of Leak Case (AP) ... 3
British Terror Trial Traces A Path To Militant Islam (NYT) ... 4
Scalia The Civil Libertarian? (NYT) ... 7

Homeland Response:
Bush Vows Continued Aid To Gulf Hurricane Victims (WP/AP) ... 9
CIA Recruiting Comes Out Of The Shadows (WT/AP) ... 9

War News:
Baghdad Braces For More Reprisals (WP) ... 10
47 Sunni Militants Die In Iraq Gunfights (NYT) ... 13
21 Shiites Gunned Down In Front Of Families (CNN) ... 14
Iraq Extends Curfew Amid Violence (BBC) ... 15
Iraqi Clerics Call For End To Hostilities (LAT) ... 16
Learning From Iraq (NYT) ... 17
In Search Of The Fixers (NYT) ... 18
Long After We Withdraw (NYT) ... 20
The Way To Win A Guerrilla War (WP) ... 21
U.S. Finds Iraq Insurgency Has Funds To Sustain Itself (NYT) ... 22
Sunni Urges Arabs Against Iraq Gov't (AP) ... 24
Now It's Iraq On The Agenda For Mr. Fix-It Of The G.O.P. (NYT) 25
Turning To Baker For New Iraq Plan (BOS/CHT) ... 27
Iraq Group A Study In Secrecy, Centrism (WP) ... 27
Long Stints In Iraq Fracture Families (WP) ... 29
In Alaska, Troops Return Home To Chills And Cheers (LAT/AP) 30
Iraq's Palestinians In Bull's-eye (LAT) ... 31
Local Surgeons Helping Iraqi Who Helped U.S. (NSDY) ... 32
Leaving Iraq, Honorably (WP) ... 33
Bring Back Saddam Hussein (LAT) ... 34
A Tale Of Two Bushes (WP) ... 35
NATO Soldier Among Dead In Afghanistan (AP) ... 36
Taliban, Convicts May Be Afghan Recruits (AP) ... 37

Corporate Scandals:
First Time As Tragedy, Second As A Musical (NYT) ... 37
Peer Pressure: Inflating Executive Pay (NYT) ... 39
The High Cost Of Too Good To Be True (NYT) ... 41

Criminal Law:
DeFazio Macing A Relic Of Old Style Of Pa. Corruption (PTR) ... 44
Getting About The Business Of Fighting Crime (MCA) ... 46
Federal Crime Survey To Include SB County (SBCS) ... 47
Hampton Roads One Of 18 Metro Areas In U.S. Crime Study (VP) ... 47

Civil Rights:
NAACP Wants FBI Probe Of Shooting (MOULTO) ... 48
Experts Concerned As Ballot Problems Persist (NYT) ... 48
Déjà Vu In Florida (NYT) ... 50

Antitrust:
Justice Dept. Probe Eyes CME Clearing Operation (CRAINCB) 51
Column: Biggest Year Ever For Deals (SFC) ... 51
As Cable, Broadcast Snit Boils, FCC Calls A Meeting (DMR) ... 53
Industry Denies Manipulation To Boost Profits (AP) ... 55
Mergers Mean Quick Gains For Funds (WP/AP) ... 57
Airline Mating Dances Pick Up (HC) ... 58

Environment/Indian Affairs:
On The Move To Outrun Climate Change (WP) ... 59
Climate In The Court (WP) ... 60
Clean Up The Navajos' Poisoned Land (LAT) ... 61

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
U.S. Crackdown Sends Meth Labs South Of Border (LAT) ... 61
Heroin Use Rising In Indy (INDYSTAR) ... 63

Immigration:
Border Group's Finances Scrutinized (HC) ... 65

Congress-Administration:
Hail To The Chief (BOS) ... 66
As Power Shifts In New Congress, Pork May Linger (NYT) ... 69
Democratic "Old Bulls" To Take Charge (LAT) ... 71
Success Of Drug Plan Challenges Democrats (WP) ... 73
On Drug Prices, Are Democrats In A Fix? (LAT) ... 75
Here Come The Economic Populists (NYT) ... 76

Other News:
State Chiefs Credit Dean For Victory (WT) ... 78
The Hill May Look Steep For Republicans In 2008 (WP) ... 79
Denver Poised To Land '08 Democratic Convention (WT) ... 80
Romney Leaving Mass. With Mixed Record (WP) ... 81
Romney Reaches For Reagan Touch (BOS) ... 82
Do We Need Another T.R.? (LAT) ... 83
A Democratic Tidal Wave In New Hampshire (WP) ... 84

Dems Look To Big Sky (DENP) 85
The Gospel According To Jim Wallis (WP) 87
The Decade Of Buying Happily (WP) 92
The Education Of Robert Kennedy (NYT) 93
Cheney Meets Saudi King For Talks (NYT) 94
Cheney, Saudi King Discuss Trouble Spots (AP) 94
Dick Cheney Holds Mideast Talks In Saudi Arabia (AFP) 95
Iraq PM Struggling Ahead Of Bush Talks (AP) 96
A Matter Of Definition: What Makes A Civil War, And Who Declares It So? (NYT) 97
Israel And Palestinians Agree To A Cease-Fire In The Gaza Strip (NYT) 99
Tentative Deal Is Reached To Halt Fighting In Gaza (WP) 100
Israel, Palestinians OK Gaza Cease-fire (AP) 100
Israelis, Palestinians Reinstate Cease-fire (LAT) 102
Palestinians, Israel Agree To Gaza Cease-fire (CNN) 103
Gaza Ceasefire Comes Into Force (BBC) 104
Crisis In Lebanon Reaches New Threshold (WP) 104
Lebanon Approves U.N. Tribunal To Investigate Hariri Assassination (MCT) 106
Lebanon's Government Backs U.N. Tribunal (AP) 107
Needed: A Big Stick (WP) 108
Realism, And Values, In Lebanon (WP) 108
Lebanon On The Brink (LAT) 109
Probe Traces Global Reach Of Counterfeiting Ring (WP) 110
Poisoned Russian Ex-Spy Said He Was Ordered To Hire Assassins (WP/AP) 112
After Poisoning, Britain Sees No Big Public Threat (NYT) 112
Polonium That Killed Ex-spy Could Be From Russia, But Hard To Pin Blame (AP) 113
Protestant Militant Charged In Belfast Attack (NYT) 114
Ecuador's Path And Alliances At Stake In Runoff Election (NYT) 114
In Ecuadoran Vote, Rhetoric Gives Way To Popular Pledges (WP) 115
Divided, Unhappy Ecuadoreans Head To Polls (LAT) 117
Ecuador Votes To Decide President (BBC) 117
Police, Protesters Clash In Mexican City (AP) 118
Pinochet Takes Responsibility For Regime (AP) 119
Rebels Take Control Of City In Eastern Chad (NYT) 119
Rebels "Seize" Two Chadian Towns (BBC) 120
A Sister's Sacrifice (NYT) 121
Sri Lanka Rebels' Critic Silenced By Bullet (NYT) 122
Awaiting Lengthy Lab Confirmation Of Bird Flu Risks Treatment Delays, Studies Find (NYT) 123

DOJ_NMG_0098271

TERRORISM NEWS:

Government Urges Supreme Court To Stay Out Of Times Case (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25 — The Justice Department asked the Supreme Court on Saturday not to prevent a federal prosecutor from examining the telephone records of two reporters at The New York Times, warning that time is running out in an investigation of leaks about two Islamic charities.

At issue is a Chicago grand jury investigation into information learned by two reporters in 2001 about the government's plan to freeze the assets of two charities that were suspected of having ties to terrorist groups.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the United States attorney in Chicago, is seeking to review the telephone records of the two reporters — Judith Miller, who retired from The Times last year, and Philip Shenon. Prosecutors say the reporters asked for comment from both charities in a way that tipped them off to the coming raids.

The case originated in December 2001, when government officials were preparing to raid the offices of the two charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

According to the Justice Department, the reporters contacted both charities and asked questions one day before the raids had been planned. The questions reduced the effectiveness of the searches and endangered the federal agents who carried them out, the government said.

In August, a panel on the federal appeals court in Manhattan ruled 2 to 1 that the reporters were not entitled to shield their sources under the First Amendment or under precedents established in common law.

On Friday, The Times asked Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg of the Supreme Court to delay Mr. Fitzgerald from reviewing the telephone records until the court has an opportunity to decide whether to hear the case. The court gave the government until Saturday to submit a formal response.

On Saturday, the Justice Department urged the Supreme Court not to get involved in the case, saying that even a temporary stay of the earlier court decision would harm a significant criminal investigation.

The department said prosecutors had less than three weeks left to file charges on some of the possible crimes, because important statutes of limitations will expire on Dec. 13 and Dec. 14 — five years after the two separate raids took place.

The department also contended that the facts of the case were unusual and would not create a far-reaching precedent allowing the disclosure of a reporter's confidential sources.

This case is separate from an earlier battle between Mr. Fitzgerald and The Times over leaks about the identity of a covert C.I.A. operative.

Court Asked To Stay Out Of Leak Case (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 26, 2006

Justice Department wants justices to refrain from entering probe

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department on Saturday asked the Supreme Court to refrain from stepping into another First Amendment battle featuring federal prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and The New York Times.

The case involves a leak probe by Fitzgerald to track down the confidential sources of Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon for stories in 2001. Miller, who spent 85 days in jail in 2005 in connection with Fitzgerald's separate CIA leak probe in the Valerie Plame case, retired from the newspaper a year ago.

In the current case, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has said prosecutors can see the journalists' phone records. Earlier, a federal judge had ruled in the newspaper's favor, saying the First Amendment supplied a qualified privilege to reporters to protect confidential sources.

On Friday, the newspaper asked Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg to temporarily block the government from going through the records and said it was prepared to file a petition by Dec. 24 asking the court to take up the case.

In a filing requested by Ginsburg, the government cites a declaration by Fitzgerald on Nov. 13 that says the time for filing criminal charges will expire in the next three weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0098272

Temporarily blocking the government from reviewing the phone records would cause "irreparable harm to a significant criminal investigation," the Justice Department told the Supreme Court in a 40-page filing.

The reporters' stories disclosed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation. The freezing of assets was in connection with a terrorism-funding probe.

Shenon and Miller called the two organizations for comment about the information on freezing assets, a move the government says tipped off the charities of planned government raids. The federal judge who ruled in the Times' favor said there is no evidence in the case even suggesting the reporters tipped off the charities about the raids or that the reporters even knew of the government's plans to raid either charity.

The Justice Department replied that "the fact that the reporters here relayed disclosures from a government source to targets of an imminent law enforcement action substantially weakens any claim of freedom of the press."

At issue are 11 days of phone records the government wants to review for the two reporters in 2001 -- Sept. 27-30, Dec. 1-3 and Dec. 10-13. In his declaration this month, Fitzgerald says the statute of limitations "on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating" will expire on Dec. 3 and Dec. 13 of this year. Those dates are five years to the day after the second and third set of phone records the prosecutor wants to review, pointing to the deadline for filing criminal charges.

In June 2005, the Supreme Court refused to take up a separate case involving the First Amendment in which Fitzgerald sought to compel Miller to reveal her sources in the leak of Plame's CIA identity.

That leak probe led to Miller's jailing before eventually agreeing to testify in Fitzgerald's investigation. Her testimony was critical in the indictment of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby.

The current leak probe is in Fitzgerald's capacity as U.S. attorney in Chicago. The Libby prosecution is in Fitzgerald's role as a special counsel who was selected by a Justice Department superior to conduct that particular investigation.

British Terror Trial Traces A Path To Militant Islam (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino, Stephen Grey

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 25 — More than half a ton of ammonium nitrate fertilizer suitable for making bombs was locked in a rented storage warehouse. A cookie tin of aluminum powder was hidden behind a garden shed. Young British Muslims underwent military training at guerrilla camps in remote parts of Pakistan. Suspects, surreptitiously taped by the police, talked about bombing targets in Britain.

Enter a computer technician in Canada experimenting with remote-controlled detonation devices and a collaborator-turned-informer from Queens testifying about secret meetings with operatives of Al Qaeda.

For eight months, the tale of the Operation Crevice Seven has been unfolding in a cramped, windowless courtroom in the Old Bailey in London.

On trial are seven men, ages 19 to 34, six of them with family roots in Pakistan. Arrested in 2004, they are charged with involvement in a criminal conspiracy to make explosives to commit murder, allegations that they all deny. Their target, the authorities say, was unclear — a nightclub, perhaps, or a shopping mall, public utilities, a British airliner or even the House of Commons.

But investigators say the evidence reveals the workings of the kind of cell most feared by officials in Europe. Young Muslims, radicalized by local imams and trained at military camps in Pakistan with vague connections to Al Qaeda, plan an attack at home with help from outside terrorists.

The July 7, 2005, London transit bombings and the alleged London-based plot uncovered last August to blow up airliners also involved disaffected British youths of Pakistani descent, some of whom had traveled to Pakistan for family visits, study and perhaps training.

In a speech this month, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, the director general of the British security service known as MI5, disclosed that intelligence officers were watching 1,600 people “who are actively engaged in plotting, or facilitating, terrorist acts here and overseas.”

She said they had identified nearly 30 plots that “often have links back to Al Qaeda in Pakistan and through those links Al Qaeda gives guidance and training to its largely British foot soldiers here.” She said other countries — Spain, France, Canada and Germany — faced similar threats.

Dame Eliza’s comments echo concerns among intelligence officials throughout Europe that remnants of Al Qaeda’s network, disrupted after Sept. 11, were reconstituting in the tribal areas on the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

The Crevice defendants deny they were a conspiratorial cell. Some admit to training in Pakistan but insist they had a goal other than attacking Britain, notwithstanding the fertilizer stored near London. They said they supported jihad in Afghanistan and the liberation of Kashmir, a disputed area between Pakistan and India.

DOJ_NMG_0098273

One defendant, Salahuddin Amin, a 31-year-old part-time taxi driver from Luton, testified Tuesday that he started donating money to help Kashmir in 1999. Then he moved to Pakistan in 2001 and became a conduit directing assistance from Britain to Afghan refugees in Pakistan, he said.

But prosecutors charge that Mr. Amin, who knew some of the other Crevice defendants from Britain, became a link between them and militants in Pakistan. They said he and others attended a two-day course in Pakistan to learn to make fertilizer-based explosives. In videotaped confessions to the British police after his arrest in 2005, he admitted being "mixed up with terrorists" and said he provided a formula for explosives to one of his co-defendants through an Internet chat room.

On the witness stand, Mr. Amin proclaimed his innocence, saying he confessed only after being jailed for 10 months in Pakistan, where he said he was beaten and threatened with a whirring electric drill. "I would never take part in plots like that," he testified.

Heeding the Call to Jihad

Omar Khyam, 24, considered by prosecutors to be the ringleader of the group, began his journey to extremism as a teenager in Crawley, just south of London.

Mr. Khyam, a standout cricket player, planned to study electrical engineering in college, but when he was 16 he began spending time with members of Al Muhajiroun, a radical group active in Crawley and dedicated to a global Islamic community under Shariah, the legal code based on the Koran. The group, led by Omar Bakri Mohammed, is now banned in Britain.

Two years later, instead of preparing for his high school exams, Mr. Khyam ran away, leaving a note saying he was off to join Islamic freedom fighters in Kashmir.

His uncle told a British newspaper that ran an article in 2000 about Mr. Khyam's sudden departure that his nephew had been indoctrinated by Al Muhajiroun. Mr. Khyam's family persuaded him to return home, but not before he had attended a training camp.

"They taught me everything I needed for guerrilla warfare in Kashmir, AK47s, pistols, RPGs, sniper rifles, climbing and crawling techniques, reconnaissance and light machine guns," Mr. Khyam testified in the Crevice trial in September.

After enrolling in college in Britain, Mr. Khyam returned to Pakistan in 2001 for a friend's wedding and crossed into Afghanistan to meet members of the Taliban movement before it was overthrown after 9/11. "They were soft, kind and humble, but harsh with their enemies," he recalled in court.

Meanwhile, in Luton, a town on the other side of London and another center of Al Muhajiroun recruitment, Mr. Amin also heeded the call to jihad.

His videotaped confessions to the police tell the story of his rejection of his Western way of life, his turn to prayer and the rules of Islam and his political radicalization.

It was in a Luton prayer center that he first met some of the men accused of being Crevice conspirators, including Mr. Khyam and a man accused of being a Qaeda operative, Abu Munthir, who was visiting from Pakistan.

Videos showing the slaughter of Muslims in Chechnya and Bosnia jolted Mr. Amin into sending money to "freedom fighters" in Kashmir to buy arms and ammunition. The lectures of the radical Muslim cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri at the Finsbury Park mosque in London shortly before 9/11 and the American-led invasion of Afghanistan helped persuade him that he should join the Afghan fight.

Two months after 9/11, Mr. Amin sold his house in Luton and went to Pakistan in search of training with militants, according to his confessions. The prosecution argues that over the next three years, Mr. Amin, Mr. Khyam and their associates entered a hidden world of terrorism with tentacles on three continents.

Secrecy was maintained by using aliases and coded language. Cellphone conversations were avoided. Rather than using e-mail messages, communications were passed through Internet chats or by electronic messages stored for others to pick up later with passwords. Computer hard drives and cellphone SIM cards were discarded and replaced often.

The prosecution's guide through that world was a Pakistani-American named Mohammed Junaid Babar, who said he worked for the New York chapter of Al Muhajiroun.

Defense lawyers portray Mr. Babar as a fabricator and possibly an agent for the United States government. "You are a liar, a deceitful, self-centered, arrogant fantasist," Michel Massih, a lawyer for one of the defendants, told Mr. Babar during cross-examination last April.

Mr. Babar acknowledged having lied when first questioned by the F.B.I. He pleaded guilty in New York in June 2004 to providing material support for terrorists, and he said in court that he was testifying against the Crevice suspects to reduce his sentence.

Yet during 17 days on the witness stand, Mr. Babar, the star witness for the prosecution, told a riveting story.

A militant networker, Mr. Babar said he moved to Pakistan in November 2001 with money and instructions from Al Muhajiroun. A year later, on a fund-raising trip to London, Mr. Babar said, he first met members of what he called the "Crawley lot," including Mr. Khyam and Anthony Garcia, an Algerian-born aspiring fashion model who had changed his name and is now accused of purchasing the secreted fertilizer.

DOJ_NMG_0098274

Mr. Babar said Mr. Khyam told him that he and other "brothers" from Crawley were not just a local operation but reported to a man called Abdul Hadi, described by Mr. Khyam as the "No. 3" in Al Qaeda.

In mid-2003, the prosecution said, the Crevice suspects began coming together in Pakistan where Mr. Babar's home in Lahore was a haven for young, radical Britons of Pakistani descent.

Bomb-related equipment like detonators, fertilizer and aluminum powder that can be used to fuel an explosion, and beans to make the poison ricin were stored in a bedroom cupboard, he said. The backyard was used for small-scale experiments with explosives, including the detonation of a spice jar packed with chemicals.

Mr. Amin, meanwhile, was living close by. He said in his police confessions that he had been collecting money and materials for fighters in Afghanistan and passing them on to the man accused of being a Qaeda operative, Abu Munthir, who had once visited the Luton prayer center.

When Mr. Khyam arrived in Pakistan in 2003, hoping to train to fight in Afghanistan, he was told there were enough fighters there, according to Mr. Amin's confessions. Instead, Abu Munthir sent word that if he was really serious, he should "do something" in Britain, Mr. Amin told the police.

Later that year, Mr. Khyam, Mr. Amin and another man traveled to a safe house in Kohat, Pakistan, for two days of training in making explosives, including fertilizer bombs, Mr. Amin said. Mr. Khyam then organized a session in the mountains around Malakand near the Afghan border, allegedly to teach others what he had learned.

Mr. Khyam and a core group of three other Crevice suspects, including Mr. Babar, made their way there by posing as Western tourists looking to visit lakes and glaciers.

Mr. Babar said one of the men he brought along was a Canadian named Mohammed Momin Khawaja, a computer engineer, now 27, who is accused of being the detonator-maker in the plot.

Mr. Babar recalled in court that the first test with fertilizer-based explosives failed; the second was moderately successful.

"It created a U in the ground," Mr. Babar testified. "It went down, sideways and back up the other way." The group videotaped the scene, he added, hoping to produce a "a minimovie-type thing" with Koranic verses or songs, to inspire others.

If Mr. Babar is to be believed, Mr. Khyam became so determined to carry out an attack in Britain that during this time he also took a 10-day trip to seek more guidance from Qaeda operatives.

Mr. Babar said Mr. Khyam told him that the instructions from Abu Munthir were for "multiple bombings," either "simultaneously or one after the other on the same day."

Mr. Babar recalled Mr. Khyam saying that Britain was as responsible as the United States for what was happening in the Middle East and should be attacked. "He said we need to hit certain spots like pubs, nightclubs and trains," Mr. Babar said.

An Undercover Investigation

Precisely how and when the authorities learned of the group's activities is unclear, but by early February 2004, they had begun one of Britain's largest antiterrorist undercover investigations. Operation Crevice, aided by the United States, Canada and Pakistan, involved round-the-clock human surveillance, audio wiretaps in cars and homes and video surveillance.

On Feb. 20, investigators got an extraordinarily lucky break: a suspicious employee at a self-storage warehouse outside of London called the police to report that someone named Nabeel Hussain was storing a large amount of fertilizer.

The police inserted an undercover officer called Amanda as the receptionist and secretly replaced the fertilizer with a benign substance. A hidden camera was installed and filmed Mr. Khyam when he showed up to check the contents.

The police continued to watch and listen, and their 3,500 hours of surveillance tapes are at the core of the prosecution case. Some of the most chilling conversations played in court are between Mr. Khyam, whose Suzuki sport utility vehicle and apartment had been bugged, and Jawad Akbar, 23, a college student whose apartment had been bugged.

In a conversation recorded in February 2004, Mr. Akbar talked of an "easy" target, like a nightclub, "where you don't need no experience and nothing and you could get a job." In such a place, he said, "no one can even turn round and say, 'Oh, they were innocent,' those slags dancing around," using a slang term for loose women.

When Mr. Khyam asked what he would do if he got a job at a place like the Ministry of Sound, London's largest nightclub, Mr. Akbar replied, "Blow the whole thing up."

In March, Mr. Khyam talked about a simultaneous attack of Britain's gas, electricity and water systems.

"The electrics go off so it's a blackout, and then the gas lot move in and bang," he said. "Then something goes wrong with the water, a simultaneous attack."

In late March, when Mr. Khyam and his younger brother, Shujah Mahmood, 19, also a defendant, bought tickets to fly to Pakistan on April 6, the police feared that an attack in Britain was imminent.

DOJ_NMG_0098275

On March 30, 700 police officers raided two dozen locations, shutting down what they suspected was a cell and arresting six of the defendants.

They found the cookie tin containing aluminum powder behind a shed at Mr. Khyam's family home in Crawley. They also found a dozen CD-ROMs giving detailed plans of Britain's electricity and gas systems that they charged had been stolen from the National Grid Transco utility company by an employee, Waheed Mahmood. At 34, Mr. Mahmood, a father of four, is the oldest Crevice defendant.

The police seized a list of British synagogues and computer video files containing parts of an explosives handbook and a military training manual. Investigators also found instructions for how to react if contacted by counterterrorism authorities.

Meanwhile, Mr. Khawaja, who had recently returned from visiting Crevice suspects in Britain, was arrested in Canada. Electrical equipment, described by British authorities as remote-control devices that could be connected to bomb detonators, as well as guns and ammunition, were found at his home. He is awaiting trial in Canada, the first suspect to be tried under Canada's 2001 Antiterrorism Act.

The Prosecution's Case

Prosecutors acknowledge that they have not been able to identify either a fixed target or a date for an attack, but they do not have to. To win convictions, they only have to prove that the seven defendants conspired to cause an explosion "likely to endanger life" in Britain.

Mr. Khyam, Mr. Garcia and Mr. Hussain are also charged with possessing 600 kilograms, or about 1,320 pounds, of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, and Mr. Khyam and Mr. Mahmood with possessing aluminum powder, in both cases with the intent to use the ingredients to commit an act of terrorism.

In considering the surveillance tapes, defense lawyers argue that their clients may have been doing a lot of talking about deadly chaos, but that it was nothing more than talk. Some of the schemes seemed like fantasy, like injecting poison into beer cans at soccer games. Others were more frightening, if true: Mr. Amin is accused of making inquiries about buying a radioactive "dirty bomb" from the Russian mafia in Belgium.

As in other criminal cases in Britain, some of the evidence against the suspects is not permitted to be disclosed — either to the jury or the public — until the trials are over for fear that juries will be improperly swayed. Even the news media is under a strict order by the judge to avoid revealing certain information about the case.

The evidence presented shows that the radicalization of the defendants began years ago, raising questions about how well the British security services monitored militants in their midst before last year's transit bombings. The authorities continue to investigate any links between the Crevice defendants and the 2005 bombers, one of whom, the government says, had visited a training camp in Pakistan before the attack.

Investigators closely watch traffic between Britain and Pakistan. But that is a significant challenge with nearly 400,000 visits by residents of Britain to Pakistan in 2004, of an average length of 41 days. And it is even more difficult to determine which, if any, of those visitors are militants following the dangerous route of traveling to Pakistan for indoctrination and training.

"Counterterrorism efforts haven't been able to penetrate the process of radicalization and recruitment," said Sajjan M. Gohel, director for international security at the London-based Asia-Pacific Foundation. "For every individual captured or killed, there are at least five more coming down the assembly line."

Scalia The Civil Libertarian? (NYT)

By Scott Turow

The New York Times Magazine, November 26, 2006

The conservative ideological majority on the U.S. Supreme Court that determined the 2000 election in favor of President Bush should have grown stronger when Bush chose Justice Samuel Alito to replace the moderate Sandra Day O'Connor. Yet in carrying out its first priority, the war on terror, the White House has encountered unwelcome resistance from the court. Objections to Bush's sweeping view of executive power have come not only from liberals and centrists, like Justice Anthony Kennedy but, more remarkably, from Justice Antonin Scalia, who may end up playing a pivotal role in future war-on-terror cases.

Scalia has long been regarded as an administration favorite. Bush suggested during the 2000 campaign that Scalia was his idea of a model justice. In the court's Bush v. Gore decision, which brought that campaign to an end, Scalia ventured the opaque claim that candidate Bush would experience "irreparable harm" if the recount continued in Florida. Not long after, the justice's son was appointed by the president to a top position in the Labor Department. In January 2004, Scalia took a free ride on Vice President Cheney's plane to go duck hunting with him; later he refused to step aside in a major case involving Cheney.

Even beyond these affiliations, Justice Scalia's flamethrowing rhetoric and his hostility to whole chapters of 20th-century jurisprudence have made him a conservative icon and a favorite face on liberal dart boards. The justice has declared that the Constitution not only creates no right to abortion but does not even protect private adult sexual conduct, blasting the court's 2003 decision to strike down a Texas sodomy law as "largely sign[ing] on to the so-called homosexual agenda." He has scaled back the exclusionary rule, which bars evidence obtained by unlawful police searches, and made it clear that he would like to do away with Miranda warnings.

DOJ_NMG_0098276

Less noted, however, is the fact that Justice Scalia, especially in the last decade, has frequently taken an expansive view of the Bill of Rights, thus supporting defendants in criminal cases. Scalia is one of the intellectual godfathers of a strand of Supreme Court decisions, crystallized by Apprendi v. New Jersey, that revolutionized sentencing laws. Following a strict interpretation of the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of due process of law and the Sixth Amendment's right to trial by jury, Scalia has insisted that any fact used to extend punishment beyond normal statutory limits must be specified and proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt. Despite his fevered support for capital punishment, Scalia also joined a court majority in holding that the Constitution requires a death sentence to be decided by a jury, rather than by a judge, effectively setting aside every capital sentence still on direct appeal in five states.

Nor are Scalia's pro-rights decisions limited to one arcane area. In Kyllo v. U.S. (2001), Justice Scalia, writing for the court, deemed police use of heat-seeking technology to detect whether marijuana was being grown inside a house a violation of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches. In a 2004 opinion, Scalia spoke for a court majority in finding unconstitutional the widespread practice of using recordings or prepared statements to the police as a substitute for the testimony of unavailable witnesses. And last term, supported by the court's four more liberal justices, Scalia held that a defendant wrongly deprived of the lawyer of his choice gets a new trial, no matter how overwhelming the evidence of his guilt.

Justice Scalia is led to these seemingly divergent positions by his unyielding adherence to a school of constitutional interpretation called originalism. To Scalia, the Bill of Rights means exactly what it did in 1791, no more, no less. The needs of an evolving society, he says, should be addressed by legislation rather than the courts.

In all of this, Scalia is first and foremost a legal formalist — meaning that to him, the rules are the rules. He did not sign on to the Apprendi cases out of any special sympathy for criminal defendants — indeed, he once wrote an opinion refusing to uphold an acquittal on the grounds that the defendant's motion for acquittal was filed one day too late. Rather, he was motivated by the assumption that, as he put it in the capital-punishment case, "the right of trial by jury is in perilous decline." In other words, over the years the right had come to be interpreted more narrowly than in 1791.

In adjudicating the war on terror, Scalia has come down strongly on behalf of the administration and its prisoners in a number of cases. The extensive powers claimed by the Bush administration would seem to pose a problem for originalists, because the Bill of Rights was indubitably added to the Constitution to keep the new American executive from repeating the monarchal abuses of King George. Yet in a speech in suburban Cleveland in March 2003, just before the invasion of Iraq (where one of his sons would serve), Justice Scalia told his audience that "most of the rights that you enjoy go way beyond what the Constitution requires" and predicted that in war time "the protections will be ratcheted right down to the constitutional minimum." In one of the first war-on-terror cases to reach the court, Rasul v. Bush, a majority agreed that the foreign detainees at Guantánamo had a right to file habeas corpus petitions. Scalia strongly dissented, as one might have expected given the fact that the Constitution's protections are generally intended for only American citizens.

It thus verged on the breathtaking when Justice Scalia wrote in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld: "Many think it not only inevitable but entirely proper that liberty give way to security in times of national crisis. ... Whatever the general merits of the view that war silences law or modulates its voice, that view has no place in the interpretation and application of a Constitution designed precisely to confront war and, in a manner that accords with democratic principles, to accommodate it."

Hamdi, an American citizen, was supposedly captured among Taliban forces in Afghanistan. Four justices thought that the Congressional resolution passed immediately after 9/11, authorizing the use of force against Al Qaeda, permitted the president to detain Hamdi as an enemy combatant. A majority ruled, however, that Hamdi could not be held indefinitely simply on the president's say-so and was entitled to a meaningful hearing. Justice Scalia would not even concede the first point. Instead, he declared Congress has not given the president the power to hold any American, even one who has taken up arms against his country, as an enemy combatant and instead must press criminal charges or let him go.

Now the looming question is where Scalia will settle as future war-on-terror cases come before the court, and whether his unique jurisprudence will accord him a leading role. The court's centrists, most notably Justices Kennedy and Breyer, are inclined to apply nuanced balancing tests. Weighing, for example, the need to hold battlefield captives like Hamdi against the reality that such a detention could last most of the detainee's lifetime, both justices voted to create a right to a hearing for citizen-combatants. Yet their war-on-terror decisions have been so factbound that they offer little future guidance on the meaning of the rights involved. For instance, what happens when a citizen who is a supposed enemy combatant is captured in this country rather than on the battlefield? The other conservatives on the court — Justice Thomas and, in their limited times, Justices Alito and Roberts — have shown an inclination to defer blankly to executive power. Scalia's originalism, too, tends to view executive power expansively, but only when it is applied to the many areas beyond the narrow preserves created by the Bill of Rights. As the Apprendi cases demonstrate, Scalia is more like the court's liberal members in seeing the Bill of Rights as a constitutional trump when it collides with government power.

DOJ_NMG_0098277

Apparently unsure about what the future holds, the administration recently has been trying to sidestep the Supreme Court altogether. It persuaded Congress to remove the habeas corpus rights the court had previously granted foreign detainees at Guantánamo. The White House also wants to rewrite the wiretapping laws to bolster the president's assertions that he had the constitutional power to wiretap certain calls without a warrant. The president has asked the lame-duck Republican Congress to push through the change, but the newly emboldened Senate Democrats say they will block it. It appears most likely that when the wiretapping program inevitably reaches the court, the justices will have to weigh the president's claim of inherent authority against the statute in place when the program began. The statute explicitly says its warrant procedure is "the exclusive means" to wiretap calls to or from the U.S. for national security reasons.

Scalia has seldom been a consensus builder on the court, preferring to stick with his own views rather than troll for votes. But his occasional alliance with the court's more liberal justices could be struck again in future terror cases. The result would be an unequivocal declaration that executive power must yield to constitutional liberties, even when the nation is on the prolonged war footing we seem to have adopted.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Vows Continued Aid To Gulf Hurricane Victims (WP/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday renewed the nation's commitment to help victims of last year's Gulf Coast hurricanes and thanked U.S. troops fighting abroad.

In his Saturday radio address, Bush said Americans are grateful to those who rallied after hurricanes Katrina and Rita to bring food, water and hope to people who lost everything.

"We renew our commitment to help those who are still suffering and to rebuild our nation's Gulf Coast," Bush said.

Next week, the president will attend a NATO summit in Europe and will meet in Jordan with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. On Saturday, he reminded Americans that many U.S. troops are spending the holiday weekend far from their families.

"We know that their service makes it possible for us to live in freedom," Bush said.

He said the desire for freedom that led pilgrims to America still guides the nation today. "While they were only a shivering few, we are now a strong and growing nation of more than 300 million."

On Tuesday, Bush visited U.S. troops stationed at Hickam Air Force Base in Honolulu. He stopped there on his way back from a trip to Indonesia, Singapore and Vietnam.

"Our service members there have deployed around the world to fight the terrorists in Afghanistan and Iraq, conduct important maritime exercises in the Pacific, help deliver humanitarian aid to the victims of disaster and fight drug trafficking," Bush said.

He singled out Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y., who died after throwing himself on an enemy grenade, saving two of his fellow Marines in Iraq. The Medal of Honor -- the nation's highest decoration for valor -- will be given posthumously to Dunham, who died April 22, 2004, after an ambush near the Syrian border.

"This Thanksgiving, our thoughts and prayers are with his family and with all military families, especially those mourning the loss of a loved one," Bush said.

CIA Recruiting Comes Out Of The Shadows (WT/AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The Washington Times, November 26, 2006

The CIA scrapped a ho-hum test for steering job applicants toward mysterious careers, replacing it with one that's cloaked in jest.

Invisibility or ESP? Jet pack or amphibious sports car? Walk the Great Wall of China or sip champagne at a New York gala?

The results from the CIA's online personality quiz are just a few clicks away. Test-takers are diagnosed as daring thrill-seekers, thoughtful observers, curious adventurers, innovative pioneers or impressive masterminds.

The CIA wants to hire them all.

DOJ_NMG_0098278

The quiz (https://www.cia.gov/ careers/CIAMyths.html) was designed to encourage job applications while dispelling myths about the agency, some of them born of the James Bond stereotype.

For instance, the CIA wants applicants to know that no one who works there drives a sports car with machine guns in the tailpipes. Successful applicants will, in fact, see family and friends again.

Also, according to the quiz, "you don't have to know karate or look good in a tuxedo to work at the CIA."

All fun aside, the hiring push began almost immediately after the September 11 terrorist attacks. The effort picked up steam in November 2004, when President Bush called for a 50 percent increase in the agency's ranks of operatives and analysts.

The president wanted twice as many scientists whose research combats terrorism and the spread of weapons of mass destruction. The agency hopes to meet those goals by 2011.

One in seven of the CIA's current employees signed up in the past year, and nearly 40 percent began working after the September 11 attacks -- statistics at once helpful and troubling.

"This is the youngest analytic work force in the history of the Central Intelligence Agency," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden said at his confirmation hearings in May. "In more disappointing language, this is the least experienced analytic work force in the history of CIA."

The CIA stumbled as it stepped out of the shadows to recruit.

The agency rolled out black-and-white ads in 2002. Its television ads last year, aired during Washington Nationals baseball games, were so unassuming that fans might have thought their cable went out for 30 seconds if they headed to the kitchen for a snack.

Officials in charge of hiring realized they needed a new plan. They hired an ad agency, TMP Worldwide.

The "Bug Spot" was born. A snooping dragonfly zooms through the ad, showing how scientists at the CIA's Directorate of Science and Technology develop Bond-esque devices -- "technology so advanced, it's classified," the ad boasts.

The ad debuted on the Discovery Channel. The agency shortly received 3,500 resumes from applicants who said they had seen the spot.

An ad for the National Clandestine Service, the agency's secret operatives, followed.

Now, the CIA is revamping its Web site. It is buying space on airport billboards and in movie trailers. It is taking out ads in publications from the Locksmith Ledger to Women's Wear Daily to Arab Times, seeking applicants who can crack locks, create disguises and speak polished Arabic. It is reaching out to soon-to-be retired military officers.

The CIA also created the updated personality quiz, with a disclaimer straight from the legal department: "The Myths Quiz is for educational entertainment purposes only. ... This quiz will not affect your ability to get a job with the CIA."

The lawyers have company in not taking the quiz lightly. Some of the CIA's traditionalists fear the agency is bruising proud, exclusive roots to meet the presidential directive. They worry that the CIA quiz and ads during "MythBusters" and other cable shows are too gimmicky.

In short, the traditionalists worry that the agency is sacrificing quality to get quantity. Last year alone, the CIA received 135,000 applications -- more than double the number before the September 11 attacks.

Tom McCluskey, the CIA's chief of hiring and employee development, heard the concerns firsthand at a recent gathering of the Florida chapter of the agency's retirees association.

"Some of the old-timers grumbled, 'Where's the mystique? Where is the aura of mystery around what we do?' " Mr. McCluskey said.

Meanwhile, Congress is watching the recruitment efforts. The incoming chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, has said one priority is investigating whether the CIA has the right workers in the right jobs and ensuring the CIA has enough employees who are fluent in Arabic and other crucial languages.

Even if Congress holds agency officials' feet to the fire in public, odds are it could help.

"We see spikes in applicants after bad stories," said Betsy Davis, deputy chief of the CIA's recruitment and advertising. "We see spikes in applicants after good stories."

WAR NEWS:

Baghdad Braces For More Reprisals (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan, Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 -- In the aftermath of one of the deadliest spasms of violence, a new level of fear and foreboding has gripped Baghdad, fueled in part by sectarian text messages and Internet sites, deepening tensions in an already divided capital.

DOJ_NMG_0098279

In interviews across Baghdad on Saturday, Sunnis and Shiites said they were preparing themselves for upheaval, both violent and psychological. They viewed the bombings that killed more than 200 people Thursday in the heart of Baghdad's Shiite Muslim community of Sadr City as a trigger for more reprisal killings.

"We feel our world has become narrow, and we are being squeezed," said Karar al-Zuheari, 31, a Shiite taxi driver. "We have no place to run."

Since those attacks, quasi-armies of residents in mixed and majority-Sunni Arab neighborhoods have formed to protect their streets. Sunni Web sites are offering advice on how to kill Shiite militiamen. College students and executives pace at their homes, clutching rifles and handguns around the clock. Iraqis are posting pleas on Internet message boards to buy extra ammunition and weapons.

Despite a government-imposed curfew, Iraqis described Shiite militiamen murdering Sunnis at checkpoints, controlling neighborhoods with impunity and conspiring with Iraq's majority-Shiite police force, which the Interior Ministry controls. Other Iraqis spoke of mortar shells raining on their mosques and gun battles outside their houses, deepening their mistrust of Iraq's security forces and elected politicians.

Over the past two days, warnings have spread through messages delivered to the cellphones of Sunni Muslims. In Arabic, they read:

"Very big armed groups are being formed in Sadr City, backed up by the Interior Ministry, to kill great numbers of the citizens of Baghdad once the curfew is lifted. Spread the word among our people."

It signed off: "A reliable source."

Yet amid the fear gripping this city of 7 million, there were also signs of Iraq's famous cohesiveness, even as the sectarian divide widened. In some mixed neighborhoods, Shiites provided shelter to Sunnis targeted by Shiite militiamen, even though they risked being branded as collaborators. Others took care of Sunni children or bought groceries for Sunni neighbors who feared walking to the local market.

Outside their houses, the revenge attacks raged on. Gunmen wearing Iraqi army uniforms rounded up 21 men, including a 12-year-old boy, from two Shiite homes in the village of Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad in Diyala province. On Saturday morning, their bodies were found, all handcuffed, blindfolded and shot to death, said Bahaa al-Sodani, a provincial police official. The attacks were in apparent retaliation for assaults by Shiite militiamen on Sunni mosques in Baghdad and Baqubah the previous day.An Informant's Nod

"This is taking a turn for the worse," Hussam Sammaraie, a Sunni Muslim cellphone company executive, said on Saturday.

Less than two hours after car bombs, mortar shells and missiles bombarded Sadr City on Thursday, Shiite militiamen had taken over a checkpoint in front of his house in the New Baghdad neighborhood. The gunmen, clutching AK-47 assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers, were members of the Mahdi Army, the militia run by Moqtada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric who controls Sadr City.

As Sammaraie watched from his front gate, two militiamen stopped a Sunni man who worked in an electrical shop. A local informant looked at him and nodded. Then one of the gunmen shot him dead and left. Two weeks ago, the electrician had complained loudly when Shiite gunmen attacked a nearby Sunni mosque.

Zuheari, Sammaraie's Shiite neighbor, also witnessed the killing. At that moment, he felt hatred for his own sect. "We don't accept this behavior from our own people," he said.

Sammaraie also shook, not out of anger but fear. New Baghdad was once a mixed neighborhood, but its Sunni population has left in droves since February, when the bombing of a Shiite shrine in the town of Samarra set off waves of sectarian violence. Now Sammaraie and his family are the only Sunnis on his block.

A half-hour after the electrician was killed, police arrived to investigate. The militiamen who committed the crime came along.

"It was the same murderers -- I saw it with my own eyes," Sammaraie said.

Since Thursday, he said, he has stayed inside his home. He carries his AK-47 and 60 bullets everywhere, even to bed. "I hug my AK-47 more than my wife," Sammaraie said.

His two small daughters don't understand. His 14-year-old asked him why he carried a gun all the time. He replied: "Do you want your dad to get killed?"

At night, he heads to the roof of his house, a cup of coffee in one hand, his AK-47 in the other. From there, he scans the streets for militiamen.

But if his house gets attacked, he will turn to Zuheari for help. Zuheari said he can't forget when Sammaraie's relatives offered shelter to his family during the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Now it's his turn to return the favor. The men placed a ladder against a wall in Sammaraie's back yard. If Shiite militiamen appear, Sammaraie and 16 relatives will use it to climb over the wall and into Zuheari's home.

DOJ_NMG_0098280

"If the Mahdi Army finds out we are supporting a Sunni, maybe they will turn against us," Zuheari said. "They will think we are collaborators. This is a big problem. We don't know what will happen. I have one AK-47. We cannot do anything."

Still, Zuheari warned Sammaraie on Friday when he received a text message from a Shiite friend in Sadr City saying that the "young people of the Mahdi Army have taken revenge on the Sunnis." Without revealing the message, "I told him he should move his family inside my house," Zuheari said.Defending the Neighborhood

Luaa Abdul Hade, 21, knew it was his job to protect his sisters and mother. So he grabbed the family's only gun -- an AK-47 -- and joined the approximately 300 young men who have formed a quasi-army to guard the neighborhood of Ghazaliya since violence erupted there on Thursday after the Sadr City bombings.

Since then, the full-time student has slept just four hours. The nights have been cold, but he makes do with a coat. People in the neighborhood cook meals for the guards. Some of the men go back home for rest. Others sleep at a nearby mosque. If any major attack takes place, the mosque will announce it.

"It's our neighborhood," Abdul Hade said. "If they want to attack us, we're going to go out and defend our neighborhood."

Abdul Hade said that he and the other men his age did not know how to defend the neighborhood, so residents with war experience became their advisers, telling them where to stand and what to do. Four or five young men stand on every street corner or roof. Older men guard their houses. They have blocked off entrances to the community with stones, branches and other materials.

In the meantime, Abdul Hade's three sisters and mother remain home, praying regularly and keeping themselves busy by surfing the Internet, talking to friends on the phone and watching TV. A mortar blast already destroyed one of their windows, so now they have blankets on the windows to prevent glass from flying around.

On Friday, gunmen in more than 40 cars drove into Ghazaliya to shoot at houses, he said. The neighborhood army shot back, until U.S. forces intervened. It happened again Saturday morning.

"If they came into our neighborhoods, what would they do with our families?" Abdul Hade said. He said he is not afraid to die to protect his family and home: "We do believe in destiny. We do believe in God."Recipe for Civil War

On the Iraq Rabita Web site, created for Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, is a big black square with red Arabic lettering.

It reads: "Defend Yourself."

Click on it and a message appears.

"The curfew will not affect the sectarian killing militias. The Americans will not rush to help you," it says. "The entire world around you is not concerned about what happens to you. The evil people want to pluck you off one by one. So rush to your weapons and defend yourselves and use this page to inform us of what's going on in your areas and launch rescue calls."

On Saturday, the Web site displayed a recipe for civil war. It recommended protecting Sunni neighborhoods by "spreading snipers on the roof of buildings," planting roadside bombs at neighborhood entrances and distributing grenades. It advised "antitank missile holders" to make trenches and to attack the first and last vehicles of any convoy.

At the end were instructions for preparing ambushes by "attracting the enemy by using small cars as bait so they would chase them and be dragged to the killing zones."'To Whom It May Concern'

In the Wihda district on Baghdad's southern outskirts, Haqi Ismaeil's brother called him at work Thursday to tell him not to come home. Their family, and 30 other Sunni families in the area, had received a letter that morning signed by something called "the punishment committee." It was addressed to Sunni extremists and loyalists of Saddam Hussein, but in fact it referred to all Sunnis.

"Warning, warning, to whom it may concern," it read. "The Wahhabis and Baathists and Saddamists, leave our country or we will punish you."

Their small Sunni enclave is surrounded by a large Shiite community. But the Sunni and Shiite families generally have gotten along. When they had problems, the Sunni families would invite local Mahdi Army representatives to dinner to smooth relations. It usually worked, Ismaeil said.

After the letters arrived, Shiite residents visited the Sunni families to offer them support. "They've become more like family to us," he said.

Heeding his brother's advice, Ismaeil, 24, spent Thursday night at a friend's car dealership outside Baghdad. He sneaked back to check on his family the next day, and does not intend to go back to work.

The family has one weapon, an AK-47, and it will remain next to Ismaeil's bed until the family can find another place to stay. But it won't be easy, he said. There are 11 of them living together.

The Mahdi Army has set up checkpoints across the town. "We are really terrified and living in horror," he said.A Rupture of Trust

DOJ_NMG_0098281

On Palestine Street, Fehad Galib heard the rumors. The Mahdi Army had rounded up 150 young Sunni men like him and taken them to Jamila Market, the area in Sadr City where two of Thursday's car bombs exploded. Then they executed them. There was another rumor -- that the Interior Ministry was handing out police uniforms to the Mahdi Army.

That is why Galib was reluctant to allow his kid brothers to stay with Shiite neighbors his family has known for decades. "We don't have complete trust in them," said Galib, 21, a college student who carries an AK-47. His 17-year-old brother carries a Smith and Wesson handgun.

The family, he said, plans to move. "When they lift the curfew, we're going to move straight to Tikrit," Galib said, referring to ousted president Hussein's home town. "Maybe the next day the Mahdi Army may storm our house."

47 Sunni Militants Die In Iraq Gunfights (NYT)

By Kirk Semple, Omar Al-Neami

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 — At least 47 Sunni Arab insurgents were killed Saturday during long gun battles with Iraqi security forces in and around Baquba, the capital of Diyala Province, a police spokesman in Baquba said.

In the largest and deadliest fight, scores of insurgents, using assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, laid siege to several government buildings in the center of the city, according to the spokesman. At least 36 of the Sunni Arab insurgents were killed in that clash, which raged for about four hours, according to the official, who said he did not yet know if any Iraqi security forces had been wounded.

Gun battles also broke out in Buhruz, a predominantly Sunni village just south of Baquba, when gunmen assaulted the main police station from three directions using mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and assault rifles, the police spokesman in Baquba reported.

The gunmen began their attack using the cover of date palm orchards that surround the village and retreated after two hours of fighting, the official said. No immediate word of casualties on either side was available. After nightfall, clashes broke out between gunmen and Iraqi Army troops in the Al Tahrir neighborhood in Baquba, according to the police spokesman there. At least 11 insurgents were killed in the fighting, he said.

An American military spokeswoman in Baghdad also said there had been an attack in Buhruz, but had no details, and she was unable to confirm the Iraqi accounts of other gun battles.

Diyala has been an increasingly bloody battleground between Sunni and Shiite death squads vying for sectarian domination. Shiite militiamen have recently mobilized there in large numbers in defense of its Shiite inhabitants against the Sunni Arab-led insurgency, which has long made the province a redoubt in its campaign to topple the Iraqi government and drive American forces out of the country. American officials have accused the province's police and military forces of siding with the Shiite militias.

The police in Baladruz, a rural village in Diyala, recovered the bullet-ridden corpses of 21 men who had been dragged from their homes by gunmen wearing Iraqi military uniforms and then abducted in pickup trucks, the Diyala police spokesman said. The men, all farmers, were from two extended Shiite families and were taken Friday evening from two neighboring houses in Baladruz, about 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, the police spokesman said. The motive for the attack remained unclear.

The Iraqi security forces have been accused of protecting sectarian death squads, though Iraqi officials have also contended that gunmen sometimes disguise themselves in military and police uniforms, which are readily available on the black market. Efforts to reach the spokesman for Iraq's Defense Ministry were unsuccessful.

The United Nations' special representative for Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, urged the Iraqi government on Saturday to stop the "cancer" of sectarianism from destroying the country and warned that a retributive cycle of violent revenge was "tearing apart the very political and social fabric of Iraq."

"No country could tolerate such a cancer in its body politic," Mr. Qazi said in a statement.

A series of car bombs killed more than 200 people in the Shiite enclave of Sadr City on Thursday and, in apparent retaliation, Shiite militiamen attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and Baquba on Friday. Four of the mosques were in the mixed Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriya, according to Iraqi officials.

But the United States military said on Saturday that Iraqi soldiers patrolling the Hurriya neighborhood found only one mosque that had been damaged during Friday's violence.

Relatively little violence was reported in Baghdad on Saturday amid a curfew that was imposed here on Thursday after the car bombings.

Shiite and Sunni militants traded volleys of mortar fire on Saturday evening. A mortar shell exploded in Hurriya, killing a woman and wounding three other people, an Interior Ministry official said, and at least one mortar round fell in Sadr City, wounding a woman.

DOJ_NMG_0098282

Later in the evening, several mortar rounds landed in the Shiite neighborhood of Al Mustansiriya in eastern Baghdad, wounding seven people, according to the ministry official, and five mortar rounds exploded in the predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Ghazaliya, wounding five. At least 17 bodies with bullet holes in their heads were recovered in various places around the city, the official added.

Sheik Harith al-Dhari, the Sunni Arab leader who is under investigation by the Iraqi government for allegedly abetting the insurgency, accused the Shiite-led government of sectarian bias and of "trying to stir up the situation."

Speaking at a televised news conference in Cairo, Mr. Dhari called on other Arab countries, the Arab League and the United Nations "to withdraw their support for Iraq's government, otherwise there will be disaster in Iraq."

The United States military command reported that American forces killed 22 insurgents and an Iraqi civilian, and destroyed a bomb-making factory during several operations north of Baghdad on Saturday. A marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team Five died Friday from wounds sustained in fighting in Anbar Province, the military said.

The Iraqi government announced the partial lifting of the curfew in Baghdad to permit pedestrians in the streets beginning Sunday and said the airport would reopen on Monday.

21 Shiites Gunned Down In Front Of Families (CNN)

CNN.com, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Sunni gunmen stormed two Shiite homes in Diyala province overnight and slaughtered 21 men in front of their families, Diyala authorities said Saturday.

Also on Saturday, a suicide car bomber at a checkpoint northwest of Khalidiya in Anbar province killed two children, an adult and a U.S. Marine, the U.S. military said. Ten other people, including a coalition service member, were wounded.

The attacks add to the series of sectarian reprisals since Thursday's assault on the Baghdad Shiite enclave of Sadr City, considered the single worst attack in Iraq since the war began.

At least 200 people were killed and 250 wounded in that attack, which many balme on Sunni militants.

In response, officials have imposed a strict curfew and ban on traffic until Monday, and shut down Baghdad's airport, forcing Iraqi President Jalal Talabani on Saturday to postpone a trip to Iran.

He was to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to discuss ways Iran might help stabilize Iraq.

Vice President Dick Cheney was on his way back to Washington on Saturday after a daylong whirlwind meeting with Saudi Arabian King Abdullah.

They discussed developments in Iraq, Iran's growing influence in the region, the status of Hamas in Gaza, and Syria's influence in Lebanon's government, a Saudi adviser told CNN.

The political efforts come as a top Sunni leader urged the world community, including Arab nations, to help end the hostilities and rein in what he said was the Shiite-dominated government's backing of militias.

Hareth al-Dhari called the government "biased" and an "excellent sectarian government" and said that "what is going on in Iraq is a political crisis and not a sectarian crisis -- like some politicians like to say."

His group, the Association of Muslim Scholars, had swiftly condemned the Sadr City attack and sent "condolences to the martyrs," a reference to those killed. It called the bloodbath a "repeated scene to agitate sectarian sedition."

Al-Dhari's appeal, which was made in Egypt, came a day after anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's bloc threatened to withdraw support for Iraq's prime minister if a meeting with President Bush goes ahead as planned.

Since the Sadr City attack, enraged Shiites have retaliated by burning people to death and torching Sunni mosques, witnesses told CNN.

The violence threatens to bring Iraq to all-out civil warfare, a run-up toward chaos that has been escalating since February when a Shiite shrine was bombed in Samarra.

That shrine attack prompted Sunni-Shiite vendettas that have continued throughout the year.

On Saturday, mortar rounds landed on two houses in the northwestern Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriya, killing one person and wounding three others.

The Shiite majority neighborhood, which includes Sunnis, was also the scene of violence Friday, when Shiites attacked two Sunni mosques with rocket-propelled grenades and torched two other Sunni mosques.

Shiite militiamen are reported to have doused Sunnis with kerosene and burned them, while shooting at other people.

Mortar rounds also hit the Shiite district of Abu Dshir in southeastern Baghdad, wounding four people, and Sadr City on Saturday afternoon, wounding a woman.

Thirteen were wounded by mortar rounds in the neighborhood of Adhamiya, a Baghdad police official said Saturday.

Police on Saturday said they found 17 bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad neighborhoods, apparently killed in Sunni-Shiite fighting.

DOJ_NMG_0098283

The U.S. military set up additional security checkpoints Saturday around Baghdad bases where Iraqi military operations are being conducted, he said.Insurgents targeted

The U.S. military said coalition forces killed 22 insurgents and launched three airstrikes on a bomb-making factory during two separate operations north of Iraq's capital Saturday.

In an operation conducted in Taji, 10 insurgents and a teenage boy were killed in a firefight.

In a written statement, the military said a pregnant woman was wounded and taken to a hospital for treatment. She is expected to be released Sunday.

Coalition forces said they found rocket-propelled grenades, machine guns, anti-aircraft weaponry, pipe bombs and more than 3,000 feet of detonation cord in the area.

In another operation, the military said, coalition forces killed 12 insurgents in fighting north of Baghdad.

U.S. forces opened fire on a suspected militant traveling in an entourage of three vehicles when the vehicles would not stop.

The military also said the terrorist suspect makes bombs and channels foreign fighters into the northern Baghdad area. During the operation, the coalition approached three vehicles carrying the militant and his associates.

"Twelve armed terrorists ignored warning shots and attempted to maneuver on the ground force," a military statement said.

The coalition forces then opened fire on the vehicles and killed them.U.S. soldier dies

A U.S. Marine died Friday after being wounded in fighting in Anbar province, the U.S. military said Saturday.

The Marine was assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, and the death brings the number of U.S. troop deaths in the Iraq war to 2,867.

Seven military contractors have also died in the war.

Iraq Extends Curfew Amid Violence (BBC)

BBC.com, November 25, 2006

The Iraqi authorities have extended until Monday a curfew imposed on Baghdad in response to recent killings.

The measure was intended to prevent reprisals for bomb attacks on the Sadr City area which killed more than 200.

Violence continued across Iraq however, with 21 bodies found in a village north of Baghdad. US and Iraqi forces said more than 50 insurgents died in raids.

President Jalal Talabani has also had to postpone a much-anticipated trip to Iran, as Baghdad's airport is closed.

Mr Talabani had been due to meet Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for talks on Iraq's security situation.

A spokesman for Mr Talabani said he would travel when the airport re-opened.

Separately, US Vice-President Dick Cheney has arrived in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, for talks with King Abdullah on the situation in the Middle East, particularly Iraq.

Despite the heavy police presence in the capital, there were reports that the Shia Sadr City district had been hit by a barrage of mortars on Saturday, says the BBC's Andy Gallacher in Baghdad.

An Iraqi journalists living in the area said he had heard 12 explosions but there have been no immediate reports of casualties, our correspondent adds.

Moqtada Sadr's group is calling for US forces to leave The US military said the 22 insurgents killed by its forces had died in clashes to the north of Baghdad.

Ten insurgents died in a raid on a bomb-making factory in the town of Taji, it said, while a teenage boy was killed in the crossfire and a pregnant woman was wounded.

US forces said they had discovered caches of rocket-propelled grenades, machine guns, pipe bombs and anti-aircraft weapons in the area. These were later destroyed in an air strike.

In another incident, US forces said they had killed 12 insurgents in a convoy of cars that ignored warning shots.

Iraqi security services said they had killed more than 30 insurgents in a series of raids in Diyala province.

Earlier in the day, the bodies of 21 Iraqis were discovered in the same province, in a village about 80km (50 miles) north-east of Baghdad.

Police said gunmen had raided the homes of two Shia families, dragged out 21 males and shot them dead. It is thought the youngest victim was a 12-year-old boy.

In central Anbar province, a suicide car bomber attacked a checkpoint and killed three Iraqis, two of them children, and a US serviceman, the US military said.

Meanwhile, leading Sunni cleric Harith al-Dhari, head of Iraq's Association of Muslim Scholars, called on Saturday for Arab countries to withdraw their recognition of the Iraqi government.

Mr Dhari, who spoke in Cairo, faces questioning if he returns to Iraq for allegedly inciting sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0098284

Earlier this week, at least 230 people were killed in two days of violence in Baghdad.

Several blasts struck Sadr City in quick succession In one incident, gunmen attacked Hurriya, a Sunni Arab area of Baghdad, burning mosques and homes, and at least 30 people were reported killed.

The attacks were in apparent revenge for Thursday's bombings that killed more than 200 people in the Shia Sadr City district.

There is a real feeling that the situation is moving to the brink amid the cycle of attacks, says the BBC's David Loyn in Baghdad.

To add to the Iraqi government's woes, a key Shia group loyal to cleric Moqtada al-Sadr threatened to quit parliament and the cabinet if the prime minister goes ahead with a planned meeting with US President George W Bush next week.

The withdrawal of the group headed by Mr Sadr would deal a major blow to an already unstable government.

In a sermon on Friday, the young cleric appealed for Muslim unity, but also demanded that the leading religious figure from the Sunni minority issue a fatwa against al-Qaeda members.

Moqtada al-Sadr's Mehdi Army militia dominates the sprawling Sadr City slum in east Baghdad.

Thursday's multiple car bomb attacks in Sadr City - in which 250 people were also wounded - were the deadliest in Iraq since the US-led invasion of 2003.

Iraqi Clerics Call For End To Hostilities (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — Shiite and Sunni clerics, among the last vestige of authority in a country rapidly losing faith in politicians, charged Saturday that Iraq's plight was the result of U.S. mistakes and pleaded with their faithful to stem the bloodshed that followed a devastating attack on a mainly Shiite Baghdad neighborhood.

In interviews Saturday and in recent sermons, clerics articulated one message that appears to be gaining traction on both sides of Iraq's civil war: The U.S. presence is making matters worse, and the Americans should go home.

"The roots of our problems lie in the mistakes of the Americans committed right from the beginning of their occupation," said Sheik Ali Merza, a Shiite cleric in Najaf who is a leader of the Islamic Dawa Party.

Iraq's most prominent Sunni cleric expressed a similar viewpoint. At a Cairo news conference, Harith Dhari demanded that American troops withdraw.

"Since the beginning, the U.S. occupation drove Iraq from bad to worse," said Dhari, who became a fugitive this month after the Shiite-led government issued a warrant for his arrest on allegations that he has supported terrorism.

The increased focus by the clerics on the U.S. presence in Iraq comes as U.S. officials review a broad range of options to address the increasing violence and dwindling domestic support for the war. Options range from a short-term increase in the number of troops — which stands at 144,000 — to a phased withdrawal.

Vice President Dick Cheney made a quick visit Saturday to Saudi Arabia, a neighbor of Iraq and a regional power. Saudi Arabia also is a source of funds for Sunni Arab insurgents in Iraq.

President Bush is scheduled to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in Jordan this week.

The clerics appealed for an end to retaliatory killings and kidnappings in the wake of a series of bombings Thursday in the Sadr City neighborhood of Baghdad that killed more than 200 people.

"The explosions we are witnessing and this series of attacks and killings only aim at triggering a sectarian war, which neither Shiites nor Sunnis will win," Sheik Abdul Aziz Mohammed, a Shiite cleric in Kirkuk, said in his most recent sermon. "The prophet Muhammad said religious strife is dead, and condemned anyone who attempts to resurrect it."

Khalil Maliki, a Shiite cleric based in the southern port city of Basra, also blamed the United States.

"We have all concluded that the primary party responsible for all these massacres is the American occupation," said Maliki, a representative of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Most here expect Iraq's civil war to deepen as the government lifts curfew restrictions today, and it is unclear whether the clerics' appeals for calm are being heard.

Some prominent religious and political leaders accuse the U.S. military of conspiring with their enemies. Sunni Arabs say U.S. troops are raiding their communities in coordination with Shiite militias.

And Shiites say that U.S. forces are working with Sunni terrorist groups to conduct strikes such as the devastating car bomb barrage in Sadr City.

U.S. troops seeking a missing American serviceman believed to be held by Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia raided Sadr City only hours before Thursday's insurgent car bomb attack. Some Shiite clerics and politicians cited those raids as evidence of American involvement in the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0098285

"Recently, it has become obvious that there is cooperation between the occupation forces, Al Qaeda and the Baathists," said Sahib Amry, a Sadr representative in Najaf.

Although U.S. military officials acknowledge that they have increased attacks in Shiite areas in Baghdad in pursuit of Army Spc. Ahmed Qusai Taei, they dismiss the conspiracy theories as ridiculous. But the fact that so many influential Iraqis find them credible complicates U.S. efforts to stop the bloodletting.

Sadr, whose representatives make up a key element in Maliki's Shiite coalition, threatened Friday to stage a walkout and bring down the government if Maliki went ahead with his meeting with Bush. U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday that there were no plans to cancel the meeting.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani canceled a trip to Tehran today, where he had planned to discuss an Iranian proposal for a three-way summit with Syria.

Reports emerged Saturday that Sunni Arab gunmen, using tactics usually attributed to Shiite militiamen, donned Iraqi army uniforms and kidnapped 21 men from a Shiite neighborhood in Balad Ruz, about 45 miles northeast of Baghdad. Police later found their corpses. Eleven of the dead were men from the same family.

In west Baghdad, where most of Friday's sectarian fighting took place, at least two dozen mortar shells pounded a single block in the Sunni Arab-dominated Ghazaliya neighborhood, where residents remained inside their concrete and brick houses. One person was killed.

After the mortar barrage, U.S. forces swept into the neighborhood and arrested at least 10 people, a resident said.

Projectiles also hit Sadr City and the neighborhood of Mustansiriya, crashing into a house and an open-air market; 14 people were injured.

The U.S. military announced that it had killed 22 suspected insurgents in the north Baghdad area in three separate incidents, which included an airstrike on a suspected bomb construction site.

A pregnant woman and a male teenager were injured in one fight, the military said.

"It is always a shame when terrorists hide among civilian women and children, putting them in harm's way," the military said in a statement.

Police in Baghdad found 17 bodies, all of them stripped of identification papers and riddled with bullet holes.

In Baqubah, gun battles between Iraqi police and suspected insurgents left at least 30 dead.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, Iraqi police said they had killed two insurgents who were attempting to plant a bomb, and that four police officers were injured by a roadside explosive.

The U.S. military announced that a Marine was killed by enemy fire in the western province of Al Anbar.

Many Iraqis said they expected violence to increase in the coming days.

"I don't think these attacks against Sadr City will be the last," said Diyadhin Fayadh, a Shiite cleric in Baghdad. "There will be more explosions."

"What happened in Sadr City is a very grave development, and I think the real reaction to it has not started yet," said Adnan Abo-Shabbot, 52, a Najaf supermarket owner. "I think that Baghdad will become an open battlefield. The worst is yet to come."

"The clerics and political leaders are insisting that people must be quiet and patient, because the consequences will be dire if the Muslim is killing his brother," said Ibrahim Hassan, 26, an engineering student in Sadr City. "But if someone loses two or three family members, he will never stay peaceful. Nobody can stop him. Not the clerics nor the politicians."

Learning From Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

While politicians from both parties spin out their versions of Iraqs that should have been, could have been and just maybe still might be, the Army has taken on a far more useful project: figuring out why the Bush administration's military plans worked out so badly and drawing lessons for future conflicts.

That effort is a welcome sign that despite six years of ideologically driven dictates from Donald Rumsfeld's Pentagon, Army leaders remain usefully focused on the real world, where actual soldiers daily put their lives on the line for their country and where the quality of military planning goes a long way toward determining whether their sacrifices help achieve America's national purposes.

Two hopeful examples are the latest draft of a new Army field manual that will be taught to officers at all levels beginning next year and a series of oral history interviews conducted with Iraqi and American officers involved in the disappointing efforts to establish and train Iraqi security forces. Last week, The Los Angeles Times published details of some of the major changes being incorporated into the new field manual, while The Washington Post reported on some of the lessons learned in the Iraqi training programs.

DOJ_NMG_0098286

The field manual, the Army's basic guidebook for war, peacekeeping and counterinsurgency, quietly jettisons the single most disastrous innovation of the Rumsfeld era. That is the misconceived notion that the size and composition of an American intervention force should be based only on what is needed to defeat the organized armed forces of an enemy government, instead of also taking into account the needs of providing security and stability for the civilian population for which the United States will then be responsible.

Almost every post-invasion problem in Iraq can be directly traced to this one catastrophic planning failure, which left too few troops in Iraq to prevent rampant looting, restore basic services and move decisively against the insurgency before it took root and spread.

Modern innovations in warfare make it possible for America's technologically proficient forces to vanquish an opposing army quickly and with relatively few troops. But re-establishing order in a defeated, decapitated society demands a much larger force for a much longer time.

The new field manual will rightly call for stabilization efforts to start as soon as American troops arrive. And it will legally require American field commanders to request sufficient forces to successfully carry out these stability operations. That should short-circuit future debates about whether Pentagon policy makers are providing all the troops that the generals on the spot honestly feel they need.

Correcting deficiencies in American military training is also essential, since the biggest reason the United States has not been able to withdraw significant numbers of its own troops over the past three years has been the lack of adequately prepared and reliable Iraqi security forces.

Iraqi officers interviewed for the oral history complained that their American trainers were often junior officers without combat experience. American officers expressed unhappiness about how their own training teams had been selected and prepared. One major tellingly remarked that "I went there with the wrong attitude and I thought I understood Iraq and the history because I had seen PowerPoint slides, but I really didn't."

These are useful insights. But they can only go so far when a host government lacks the will to rid its security forces of sectarian militia fighters more intent on waging civil war than achieving national stability. That so far has been the biggest obstacle in Iraq.

Transforming American forces to fight 21st-century conflicts was the ubiquitous but largely empty slogan of the Rumsfeld era. Incorporating the hard lessons learned in Iraq into future military planning and training operations would constitute a far more practical variety of transformation.

In Search Of The Fixers (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD

ARMED militias are stalking the streets of Iraq's cities and towns, but that only begins to describe the problem that the United States faces here. As the violence on those streets increases, there seem to be more and more militias or armed gangs — smaller and more loosely controlled fragments of armed groups — than ever before, and in many ways that is the most serious part of the picture. It would be far easier for the United States if these groups, no matter how antagonistic they are to the Americans, had stuck together; then, at least, they could negotiate, make binding agreements and help knit together a nation.

In America, generals, congressmen and commentators across the political spectrum are embroiled in a debate over troop levels and exit timetables. But if the United States seeks to establish stability so its troops can leave, it must answer the question: whom does it talk to?

Which Sunni and Shiite militias, armed tribal groups and even criminal gangs need to be fought? Which can be bargained with? Which are potential allies as the United States seeks to break the increasingly chaotic cycles of attack, revenge and rivalry for turf and spoils?

Last week, it was Sunni militiamen who staged deadly attacks on the Shiite-led Health Ministry and Sadr City, presumably in retaliation for a mass kidnapping from the Sunni-dominated Higher Education Ministry the week before. Those kidnappings, in turn, were carried out by men in official uniforms who were thought to be Shiite militiamen who had infiltrated the army and police force. But, as always, it was unclear which militia was responsible, or whether the kidnappers were from a breakaway group.

The largest Shiite militia, led by Moktada al-Sadr and called the Mahdi Army, has been widely reported to be splintering. But there is also a growing profusion of other groups: in addition to longstanding rival Shiite militias like the Iranian-trained Badr Organization and the Fadhila militia, both of which are powerful in the south, there are Sunni fighters attached to tribal leaders, ex-Baathists or Al Qaeda cells; Iraqi private security contractors; quasi-government militias originally assembled to guard oil pipelines and power lines; criminal gangs; and neighborhood watch groups.

DOJ_NMG_0098287

For the Americans, the disintegration of order has complicated any effort to deal with the armed groups, said Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director of the International Crisis Group, an organization of experts on dealing with conflicts that is formulating its own last-ditch plan to salvage peace in Iraq. "Now you have purveyors of violence that are completely independent of everyone else," Mr. Hiltermann said.

With one or two exceptions, he added, the politicians who nominally head some of the larger militias that are now splintering "don't control anything."

The most violent militia is the Mahdi Army, led by Mr. Sadr. Recent conversations with American military commanders in Iraq indicate that the United States ultimately may have to attempt to disarm it in its base in Baghdad — and it will be some time, if ever, before Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who needs Mr. Sadr's support in Parliament, will be a willing partner.

But because there have been so many reports that freelance commanders have broken away from Mr. Sadr's group and are operating on their own, carrying out their own kidnappings, executions and paramilitary operations, the impact of such an operation is difficult to calculate. For one thing, nobody knows exactly how much Mr. Sadr controls his group. For another, nobody knows to what extent commanders who have seemed to operate on their own might retain loyalty to Mr. Sadr in a major fight.

Some American commanders believe that Mr. Sadr retains influence over some groups he has declared to be renegades. If that were the case, the splinter groups would be functioning like the Salvadoran death squads of the 1980s; those operated quasi-independently and gave their government a measure of deniability even when it almost certainly had ordered killings.

If a similar situation applies here, it could lend credence to the arguments of American commanders who believe that the United States military may ultimately have to go in force to Mr. Sadr's base of power, a place where it has trod lightly for the past three years, in order to disarm militiamen who remain defiant. Mr. Sadr's base is a northeastern Baghdad slum populated with two million Shiite Arabs and named after his father.

But Iraqis mostly believe that such a step would be folly because it could inflame Shiites in general. No matter how unruly the groups in the Mahdi Army have or have not become, this argument goes, Mr. Sadr's own popularity, as well as the number of men in the Mahdi Army, has soared throughout Baghdad and the south as the American military has worn out its welcome.

"This is actually very dangerous," said Qasim Daoud, a former Iraqi national security advisor who is now a member of Parliament representing the southern holy city of Najaf. "It will go to a flare-up of the whole southern area."

The roots of the problem with independent armed groups in Iraq trace back to when the United States invaded the country with the help of a strategically placed militia: the fighters who were loyal to two Kurdish clans in the north. In the aftermath, the United States had little appetite for disarming the Kurds, especially since their fighters are under the firm control of their leaders.

Less well known is that before the invasion, the United States also cozied up to some of the Shiite militias, who were then expatriates, with promises that they would not be immediately disbanded if they returned to Iraq, said Amatzia Baram, director of the Ezri Center of Iran and Gulf Studies at the University of Haifa in Israel. Before the invasion, when he was a scholar based in Washington, he warned of the dangers of letting the militias keep their arms.

The problem, Mr. Baram said, was that the most powerful of those groups, the Badr Organization, never really returned the warmth. The Badr leadership, Mr. Baram said, "never wanted to be engaged more than, 'Yes, when you kick Saddam out, we will be there.' They were very standoffish."

With those precedents, the United States had little standing to disarm the other militias after the invasion, and they gained steadily in power.

There is, however, a temptation for American officials to see the possibility of working with some armed groups, even today. Travels with American military units and a reading of recent embassy initiatives in Iraq indicate that along with preparations for potential military activity against the Mahdi Army, the United States is stepping up efforts to identify militias associated with Iraqi tribes, political parties, geographic regions and even insurgent groups — to placate and co-opt those they can, and even play some off against each other.

In an indication of that strategy, some local American field commanders now give snap analyses of differences between the Janabi, Juburi and Duleimi tribes, an arresting shift from the early days of the conflict when words like those would have drawn blank stares in an American Humvee rumbling through the desert.

Such efforts have sometimes seemed promising. In September, 25 tribes in the Sunni-dominated Anbar province agreed to cooperate militarily in order to combat the local influence of Al Qaeda. But so far, that agreement seems to have had little influence on security; American and Iraqi troops continue to die at a disheartening rate in Anbar.

Looking forward, Representative Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee in January, says the cultural importance of guns in Iraqi society, combined with the practical need for Iraqis to protect themselves, makes it all but impossible for the prime minister to disarm the militias, despite his pledges to do so.

"I don't know how he's going to do it," Mr. Skelton said.

DOJ_NMG_0098288

Mr. Daoud, the former security adviser, said that a better strategy would be to absorb militias loyal to the elected government into the official armed forces and give the rest jobs under the civilian government if they take appropriate training courses.

"I prefer, really, to make a sort of evaluation of each single person," Mr. Daoud said.

That approach, which would amount to absorbing many of the militias into the government, may bring less order than hoped, said Marina Ottaway, director of the Middle East program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

"The question is not whether the militias can rule much of the country, which I don't think they can," Ms. Ottaway said. "The question is whether they can make it impossible for anyone else to rule the country."

Long After We Withdraw (NYT)

By David Rieff

The New York Times Magazine, November 26, 2006

As the situation in Iraq continues to deteriorate and as policy makers debate how to extricate the United States honorably from what increasingly appears a war without end, it is worth remembering that all wars do end eventually, and that postwar relationships between the bitterest of enemies can turn out surprisingly well. President Bush's recent trip to Vietnam, where he attended the annual meeting of APEC — the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation organization — illustrates this reality and even offers a measure of hope at a time when battlefront reports are almost unrelievedly bad and when America's foreign policy seems to lurch from crisis to crisis.

It often seems as if the U.S. presence in Iraq has created so many new enemies in the Muslim world that the clash of civilizations described by Prof. Samuel Huntington has gone from being the hypothesis of a Harvard political scientist to a historical inevitability. Even many of those who resist the notion that Islam and the West are on a collision course still worry that the harm that has been done in Iraq to relations between the U.S. and the Islamic world will be almost impossible to undo.

And yet the example of Vietnam suggests otherwise. If anything, the trauma of the Vietnam War on the American psyche was and for some still is far deeper than anything the Iraq war has yet produced. These days we speak — probably too glibly — of an America almost evenly divided between so-called red and blue states. But for anyone who remembers what this country was like during the Vietnam era and in its immediate aftermath, these contemporary divisions seem rather shallow. Vietnam truly split the country and brought millions of people into the streets against their own government. People died protesting the Vietnam War on campuses like Kent State. On the battlefield, there was also tremendous savagery. Think of the C.I.A.-run Phoenix program of targeted assassination or the systematic torture of American prisoners of war by the North Vietnamese.

Nevertheless, 30 years after the end of a war that left Vietnam in ruins and America in turmoil and confusion, the issues left over — accounting for the missing in action, reuniting families and even paying compensation for Agent Orange-induced maladies — are far less central to U.S.-Vietnamese relations than issues of trade and investment. America is now Vietnam's leading trading partner, and Intel has just announced the expansion of its factory near Ho Chi Minh City. While Congress dealt a temporary setback to President Bush's efforts to promote trade with Vietnam, few doubt that such efforts will succeed. As Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, has put it, Vietnam is "reforming" and "booming." (Of course, he might have added that it is hardly a paragon of human rights.)

Remarkably, President Bush's cordial reception to Prime Minister Phan Van Khai in 2005 was accepted with little protest except from small groups of Vietnamese-Americans. On the Vietnamese side, the dour commissars who fought the French and then the Americans, at the cost of more than a million of their own dead — "born in the North, die in the South" was a well-known saying in the North Vietnamese Army at the time — have given way to proud capitalists who, despite their Communist affiliations, are far more interested in deepening trade relations with America and in warding off their historic rival China than in pulling the scabs off old wounds.

Is there a lesson here for Iraq? The answer is that, in fact, there are many. The first, and perhaps the most important, is that history is not predictable and even the most deep-seated enmities can evaporate over time when the conditions are right. As President Bush himself said when he was in Hanoi last week: "History has a long march to it. Societies change, and relationships can constantly be altered to the good." There is no iron law of history that says that the bad relations between America and the Islamic world, and even between the United States and radical Shiite groups like the one led by the militant cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, are fated to continue this way indefinitely and immutably. Nor is there any reason to believe that an American withdrawal from Iraq will harm these relations any more than the U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam permanently damaged U.S.-Vietnamese relations.

After the searing experience of Iraq, few among us believe that outsiders can impose democracy at the point of a gun. Nations and peoples simply have to find their own way. Of course, it is crucial not to romanticize this process. For the Vietnamese, the first decade after the fall of Saigon in 1975 was an appalling one — an era of mass repression and mass hunger. It is entirely possible, likely even, that in Iraq the situation will get considerably worse after a U.S. withdrawal, as it did in Vietnam. To put it starkly, however, the effort to foster democracy in Iraq has failed, and with that failure, short-term suffering may have to be the price of long-term coexistence. Is this perspective harsh to the point of cruelty? Perhaps. But it may be a necessary and sober one as well.

DOJ_NMG_0098289

No one in his right mind should imagine a rosy future for Iraq — regardless of whether American commanders choose to preserve the status quo, start withdrawing or even add more troops to try a "final push" this spring. But again, all wars do end eventually. And in their aftermath, in the peace that follows, possibilities arise that seem almost unimaginable as people lie bleeding. It is conceivable that 30 years from now, one of President Bush's successors will travel to Baghdad not for crisis meetings in the Green Zone or to serve Thanksgiving turkey to the troops but to talk about peacetime matters like trade, tourism and the environment. Yet given America's inability to guarantee the security of ordinary Iraqis after an occupation that has lasted almost as long as our participation in World War II, it is possible to speculate that the sooner American forces leave Iraq, the sooner such a trip is likely to happen.

The Way To Win A Guerrilla War (WP)

By T.X. Hammes

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

In all the barrels of ink being spilled in the argument over whether the United States can or can't possibly win the war against the insurgency in Iraq, one critical aspect is often overlooked: how the nature of insurgency has changed over the past few decades, and what that means for the counterinsurgent.

Insurgencies are still based on Mao Zedong's fundamental precept that superior political will, properly employed, can defeat greater economic and military power. Because insurgents organize to ensure political rather than military success, an opponent cannot defeat them with military force alone. But complicating our problem today is the fact that insurgencies are no longer the unified, hierarchical organizations that the Chinese, and later the Vietnamese, developed from the 1920s to the 1960s. Rather, they are loose coalitions unified only by the desire to drive out an outside power. All elements of the insurgency know that when the outside power is gone, they will fight a civil war to resolve their differences. Learning to adjust is the key to success in counterinsurgency. Conventional military weakness forces insurgents to be adaptable, so defeating them requires coherent, patient action -- encompassing a range of political, economic, social and military activities -- that can only be executed by a team drawn from all parts of government. You don't outfight the insurgent. You outgovern him.

This was one of the real sources of frustration during my brief tour of duty in Iraq in 2004. The United States had clearly failed to learn from previous insurgencies. We were focused on killing insurgents rather than providing security and governance. Fortunately, we're now showing signs of learning -- thanks to some smart people who are both practitioners and students of counterinsurgency.

Any study of modern insurgency has to start with Mao. The communist leader who defeated China's nationalist forces not only succeeded as an insurgent but also wrote about how he won. "On Guerrilla Warfare " is a how-to guide for insurgent leaders that has been quoted by nearly every insurgent strategist since, including al-Qaeda's. The best translation is by Marine Brig. Gen. Samuel B. Griffith, whose fluency in Chinese and extensive travel in China during its civil war enabled him to provide unique insights into Mao's work.

No American discussion of insurgency could ignore Vietnam. Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap's "People's War, People's Army" is still the basic reference on the North Vietnamese view of the war and an illustration of how warfare continually changes. While Mao was able to confront his opponent on the Chinese mainland, Ho Chi Minh and Giap had to defeat the French and the Americans without ever being able to threaten their home bases. They expanded on Mao's concept by using the media and peace activists to convince the American people that we couldn't win the war. They won not by defeating our armed forces but by breaking our political will.

In the 30 years since the fall of Saigon, insurgency has continued to evolve. For an up-to-date overview, National Defense University professor Bard O'Neill's "Insurgency and Terrorism: From Revolution to Apocalypse," published in 2005, is hard to beat.

Counterinsurgency is a very different animal. Insurgents practice the art of destruction, which is easy; counterinsurgents have the far more difficult task of creating a functioning government. Written in 1964, David Galula's "Counterinsurgency Warfare: Theory and Practice" is still one of the best books to make this case. Galula, who was a French army officer during World War II and later in Indochina and Algeria, makes it clear that counterinsurgency is not about killing insurgents but about providing security and the hope for a better future. If a government can't give its people both, the insurgents will overthrow it.

"Learning to Eat Soup with a Knife: Counterinsurgency Lessons from Malaya and Vietnam," by Lt. Col. John Nagl, is a comparison between the British experience in Malaya from 1948 to 1960 and the U.S. experience in Vietnam. The British army,

DOJ_NMG_0098290

Nagl says, managed to created a "learning institution" that was able to understand the type of war it was in and adjust accordingly. In contrast, the U.S. Army in Vietnam kept trying to apply conventional warfare doctrine to an unconventional war. By the time it finally did adjust, it was too late.

Journal articles offer another rich vein of enlightenment on the conduct of counterinsurgency. In "Best Practices in Counterinsurgency," in the May-June 2005 issue of Military Review, Kalev I. Sepp, a former Special Forces officer and now professor at the Naval Postgraduate School, studied 51 recent counterinsurgencies to develop a list of 12 "best practices" common to all successful ones, and nine "worst practices" of the unsuccessful ones. Sadly, in Iraq, the United States scores below 50 percent on the first and above 50 percent on the second.

David Kilcullen's "Counterinsurgency Redux" appears in the current issue of Survival. I've found it the best discussion of insurgency's evolution from classical Maoist to the modern transnational, multilateral "coalitions of the willing" that challenge the United States today. "In modern counter-insurgency," Kilcullen writes, "the security force must control a complex 'conflict ecosystem' -- rather than defeating a single specific insurgent adversary." This is a long way from the monolithic organizations Galula fought.

Two important articles are written from the unique perspective of a senior military officer fighting an active counterinsurgency. In "Challenges in Fighting a Global Insurgency," in the summer 2006 issue of Parameters, Lt. Gen. David W. Barno, commander of U.S. and Coalition forces in Afghanistan from October 2003 to April 2005, highlights the insurgents' ability to think in terms of 25-year wars. "The Americans may have all the wristwatches," he quotes the Taliban reminding villagers, "but we have all the time." And in his influential "Winning the Peace: The Requirement for Full-Spectrum Operations" in the July-August 2005 Military Review, Maj. Gen. Peter Chiarelli describes how his division in Baghdad not only had to conduct combat operations but also train Iraqi security forces, provide essential services, promote Iraqi efforts to establish an effective government and foster economic competition in what had been a controlled economy.

All these sources influenced the new Army/Marine Corps Field Manual 3-24, "Counterinsurgency." Posted on the Internet in draft form, it updates the badly outdated doctrine based on U.S. experiences in the 1960s, offering thought-provoking observations such as "The best weapons for counterinsurgency do not shoot bullets" and "The more force you use, the less effective you are." It's already influencing both how the military is fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and how it is preparing for future wars.

If you're not inclined to read an Army field manual, three notable movies provide an insight into at least one aspect of counterinsurgency. David Lean's 1962 epic "Lawrence of Arabia," based on T.E. Lawrence's experiences in the Arab World War I uprising against the Turks, illustrates how hard it is for an outsider to understand another culture well enough to advise effectively. The 1966 classic "Battle of Algiers" shows how French brutality lost the war in Algeria. And 1993's "In the Name of the Father" reinforces that message, showing how "aggressive interrogation" techniques came back to haunt the British in their campaign against the Irish Republican Army -- a valuable insight for those trying to win these most difficult of wars.

T. X. Hammes, a retired Marine colonel, is author of "The Sling and the Stone: On War in the 21st Century" (Zenith Press).

U.S. Finds Iraq Insurgency Has Funds To Sustain Itself (NYT)

By John F. Burns, Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 — The insurgency in Iraq is now self-sustaining financially, raising tens of millions of dollars a year from oil smuggling, kidnapping, counterfeiting, connivance by corrupt Islamic charities and other crimes that the Iraqi government and its American patrons have been largely unable to prevent, a classified United States government report has concluded.

The report, obtained by The New York Times, estimates that groups responsible for many insurgent and terrorist attacks are raising $70 million to $200 million a year from illegal activities. It says $25 million to $100 million of that comes from oil smuggling and other criminal activity involving the state-owned oil industry, aided by “corrupt and complicit” Iraqi officials.

As much as $36 million a year comes from ransoms paid for hundreds of kidnap victims, the report says. It estimates that unnamed foreign governments — previously identified by American officials as including France and Italy — paid $30 million in ransom last year.

A copy of the seven-page report was made available to The Times by American officials who said the findings could improve understanding of the challenges the United States faces in Iraq.

The report offers little hope that much can be done, at least soon, to choke off insurgent revenues. For one thing, it acknowledges how little the American authorities in Iraq know — three and a half years after the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein — about crucial aspects of insurgent operations. For another, it paints an almost despairing picture of the Iraqi government’s ability, or willingness, to take steps to tamp down the insurgency’s financing.

DOJ_NMG_0098291

"If accurate," the report says, its estimates indicate that these "sources of terrorist and insurgent finance within Iraq — independent of foreign sources — are currently sufficient to sustain the groups' existence and operation." To this, it adds what may be its most surprising conclusion: "In fact, if recent revenue and expense estimates are correct, terrorist and insurgent groups in Iraq may have surplus funds with which to support other terrorist organizations outside of Iraq."

Some terrorism experts outside the government who were given an outline of the report by The Times criticized it as imprecise and speculative. Completed in June, the report was compiled by an interagency working group investigating the financing of militant groups in Iraq.

A Bush administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, confirmed the group's existence. He said it was led by Juan Zarate, deputy national security adviser for combating terrorism, and was made up of about a dozen people, drawn from the C.I.A., the F.B.I., the Defense Intelligence Agency, the State Department, the Treasury Department and the United States Central Command.

The group's estimate of the financing for the insurgency, even taking the higher figure of $200 million, underscores the David and Goliath nature of the war. American, Iraqi and other coalition forces are fighting an array of shadowy Sunni and Shiite groups that can draw on huge armories left over from Mr. Hussein's days, and benefit from the willingness of many insurgents to fight with little or no pay. If the $200 million a year estimate is close to the mark, it amounts to less than what it costs the Pentagon, with an $8 billion monthly budget for Iraq, to sustain the American war effort here for a single day.

But other estimates suggest the sums involved could be far higher. The oil ministry in Baghdad, for example, estimated earlier this year that 10 percent to 30 percent of the $4 billion to $5 billion in fuel imported for public consumption in 2005 was smuggled back out of the country for resale. At that time, the finance minister estimated that close to half of all smuggling profits was going to insurgents. If true, that would be $200 million or more from fuel smuggling alone.

For Washington, the report's most dismaying finding may be that the insurgency now survives off money generated from activities inside Iraq, and no longer depends on sums Mr. Hussein and his associates seized as his government collapsed. American officials said that as American troops entered Baghdad, Mr. Hussein's oldest son, Qusay, took more than $1 billion in cash from the Central Bank of Iraq and stashed it in steel trunks aboard a flatbed truck. Large sums of cash were found in Mr. Hussein's briefcase when he was captured in December 2003.

But the report says Mr. Hussein's loyalists "are no longer a major source of funding for terrorist or insurgent groups in Iraq." Part of the reason, the report says, is that an American-led international effort has frozen $3.6 billion in "former regime assets." Another reason, it says, is that Mr. Hussein's erstwhile loyalists, realizing that "it is increasingly obvious that a Baathist regime will not regain power in Iraq," have turned increasingly to spending the money on their own living expenses. The trail to these assets "has grown cold," the report adds.

The document says the pattern of insurgent financing changed after the first 18 months of the war, from the Hussein loyalists who financed it in 2003 to "foreign fighters and couriers" smuggling cash in bulk across Iraq's porous borders in 2004, to the present reliance on a complex array of indigenous sources. "Currently, we assess that these groups garner most of their funding from petroleum-related criminal activity, kidnapping and other criminal pursuits within Iraq," the report concludes.

One section of the report is dedicated to the role played by "sympathetic donors," including Islamic charities and nongovernmental organizations. It says that "intelligence reporting" indicates that only 10 to 15 of the 4,000 nongovernmental groups support terrorist and insurgent groups, but that those few take advantage of lax Iraqi regulation to divert funds to insurgent and other armed groups and, in some cases, "to provide cover for insurgent recruitment and the transport of weapons and personnel."

The possibility that Iraq-based terrorist groups could finance attacks outside Iraq appeared to echo Bush administration assertions that prevailing in the war here is essential to preventing Iraq from becoming a terrorist haven, as Afghanistan became under the Taliban. But that suggestion was one of several aspects of the report that drew criticism from Western terrorism and counterinsurgency experts working outside the government who were given the outline of the findings.

While noting that the report appeared to reflect a major effort by the administration to learn more about the murky world of insurgent financing in Iraq, the experts said the seven-page document appeared to be speculative, at least in its estimates of the funds available to the insurgent and terror groups. They noted the wide spread of the estimates, particularly the $70 million to $200 million figure for overall financing, the report's failure to specify which groups the estimates covered and the absence of documentation of how authors had arrived at their estimates.

While such data may have been omitted to protect the group's clandestine sources and methods — the document has a bold heading on the front page saying "secret" and a warning that it is not to be shared with foreign governments — several security and intelligence consultants said in telephone interviews that the vagueness of the estimates reflected how little American intelligence agencies knew about the opaque and complex world of Iraq's militant groups.

DOJ_NMG_0098292

"They're just guessing," said W. Patrick Lang, a former chief of Middle East intelligence at the Defense Intelligence Agency, who now runs a security and intelligence consultancy. "They really have no idea." He added, "They've been very unsuccessful in penetrating these organizations." He said he was equally skeptical about the report's assertion that the insurgent and militant groups may have surpluses to finance terrorism outside Iraq. "That's another guess," he said.

"A judgment like that, coming from an N.S.C.-generated document," he said, is not an analytical assessment as much as it is a political statement to support the administration's contention that Iraq is a central front in the war on terrorism. "It's a statement put in there to support a policy judgment," he said.

Several analysts said that, except for the possibility that Al Qaeda of Mesopotamia might be transferring money to Qaeda factions elsewhere, the assertion that insurgent money might be flowing out of the country was doubtful considering the single-minded regional focus of most of the militants operating here.

Dr. Magnus Ranstorp of the Swedish National Defense College, an author of extensive studies of the Iraqi insurgency, said he doubted Iraqi groups were ready to finance terrorism outside the country. "There's very little evidence that they're preparing to export terrorism from Iraq to the West," he said. "I think it's much too early for that."

The document tracing the money flows acknowledges that investigators have had limited success in penetrating or choking off terrorist financing networks. The report says American efforts to follow the financing trails have been hamstrung by several factors. They include a weak Iraqi government and its nascent intelligence agencies; a lack of communication between American agencies, and between the Americans and the Iraqis; and the nature of the insurgent economy itself, primarily sustained by couriers carrying cash rather than more easily traceable means involving banks and the hawala money transfer networks traditional in the Middle East.

"Efforts to identify key financial facilitators, funding sources and transfer mechanisms are yielding some results, but we need to improve our understanding of how terrorist and insurgent cells interact, how their financial networks vary from province to province or city to city and how they use their funds," the report says. It also says the United States must help the Iraqi government "to excise corrupt officials from its law enforcement and security services and its ministries" and "to prevent smuggled Iraqi oil from being sold within their borders."

Another challenge for the United States, the report says, was to persuade foreign governments to "stop paying ransoms." It gives no details, but American officials have said previously that France paid a multimillion-dollar ransom for the release in December 2004 of two French reporters held hostage by an insurgent group. Italy, these officials have said, paid ransoms on at least two occasions, in September 2004 for the release of two women, both aid workers, and in March 2005, a reported $5 million for the release of Giuliana Sgrena, a journalist for the Rome newspaper Il Manifesto.

Several American security consultants, all former members of government intelligence agencies that deal with terrorism, said in interviews that the ineffectiveness of efforts to impede the revenues to the insurgents was reflected in the continuing, if not growing, strength of Iraq's militants. "You have to look at what the insurgency is doing," Mr. Lang said. "Are they hampered by a lack of funds? I see no evidence that they are."

Jeffrey White, a defense fellow with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, also a former Middle East analyst with the Defense Intelligence Agency, agreed. "We've had some tactical successes where we've picked off a financier or whatever, but we haven't been able to unravel a major component of the system," he said. "I've never seen any indication that they're strapped for cash, never seen any indication that they were short on weapons."

He said the insurgency had demonstrated tremendous regenerative properties. "The networks fix themselves, they heal themselves," he said. He pointed to the success of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia in withstanding the loss of hundreds of combatants and dozens of major leaders. "They keep coming back," he said, "and I think the same thing has happened to the financial system."

Sunni Urges Arabs Against Iraq Gov't (AP)

By Omar Sinan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

A prominent Sunni religious leader accused in Baghdad of inciting terrorism warned Saturday that Iraq's escalating sectarian violence will spread throughout the Middle East unless the international community ends support for the Shiite-led Iraqi government.

"I call on the Arab states and the Arab League and the United Nations to stop this government and withdraw its support from it. Otherwise, the disaster will occur and the turmoil will happen in Iraq and other countries," said Sheik Harith al-Dhari, who heads the Association of Muslim Scholars in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0098293

The Iraqi Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant for al-Dhari earlier this month, accusing him of inciting terrorism and sectarian violence. The Sunni leader, who lives in Jordan and was in Cairo to meet with Arab officials, said he does not "take this warrant seriously."

Al-Dhari's comments came as Iraq is being wracked by an upsurge in sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites, including a bombing onslaught Thursday that killed 215 people in Baghdad's biggest Shiite neighborhood.

Sunnis charge Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is not serious about disbanding Shiite militias accused of sectarian killings. Sunni groups and politicians recently said the warrant for al-Dhari put an end to the national reconciliation program presented by al-Maliki in June.

Al-Dhari, who is an outspoken critic of al-Maliki's government and the presence of U.S.-led foreign troops, charged that the Shiite-dominated administration is using a curfew declared in Baghdad after the bombings as a way to carry out attacks on Sunnis.

"The government and the occupation forces are preparing the suitable environments to the militias and killing gangs, by imposing the curfew once or twice a week to attack our people (Sunnis)," al-Dhari said.

But he also urged Iraqis not to join in violence, which he said threatens to tear the country apart.

"Be patient and practice steadfastness and don't be lured into this sedition that aims to destroy" Iraq, he said.

Now It's Iraq On The Agenda For Mr. Fix-It Of The G.O.P. (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25 — Everyone in Washington knows that President Bush has a lot riding on the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel searching for a fresh strategy in Iraq. But so has the man whose name has become synonymous with the group: its Republican co-chairman, James A. Baker III.

The last time he dominated the news was in 2000, in Florida, when Mr. Baker — a former secretary of state who has been a friend and a tennis partner of the first President Bush since the current president was 13 years old — led the legal team that delivered the White House to its current occupant. That was Mr. Baker in partisan mode, cementing his reputation as Bush family confidant and Republican fix-it man.

Now, at 76, Mr. Baker is in high diplomat mode, on a mission, friends and supporters say, to aid his country and his president — and, while he is at it, seal his legacy in the realm of statesmen, a sphere he cares about far more than politics.

"I think he'd like to be remembered as a 21st-century Disraeli," said Leon Panetta, a Democratic member of the group, referring to the 19th-century British statesman and prime minister. "I think deep down he is someone who believes that his diplomatic career, in many ways, helped change the world."

On Monday, the 10 members of the Iraq Study Group — five Republicans and five Democrats — will convene in Washington for two days of deliberations, to try to produce a report by mid-December. The panel, formed at the urging of a bipartisan group in Congress, has a broad mandate to conduct an analysis of the situation in Iraq, including military, economic and political issues.

The group has conducted hundreds of interviews, but some question whether even the most thorough report can have any effect on the ground in Iraq, where sectarian violence is escalating.

The panel remains deeply divided over several critical issues, most notably whether to accede to calls by Democrats for a phased withdrawal of troops. Mr. Baker, who would not be interviewed for this article, has said he wants bipartisan consensus, but the panel's Democratic co-chairman, Lee H. Hamilton, acknowledges it will be difficult.

"It's not a guaranteed result," Mr. Hamilton said. "There is a lot of focus on our work, and a lot of attention to it, and high expectation from it. I think Jim and I both feel that pressure."

Mr. Baker is no stranger to world affairs; he presided over the end of the cold war, the 1991 invasion of Iraq (arguing famously against ousting Saddam Hussein) and was an aggressive dealmaker in the Middle East. He has always been "the quintessential pragmatist," in Mr. Panetta's words, a master at intertwining politics with diplomacy, at consulting everyone in the beginning so no one feels left out in the end.

That has been his modus operandi at the commission, where he has functioned almost as a shadow secretary of state, using his vast personal Rolodex to reach out to international figures the Bush administration has shunned — while testing the political waters at home.

He has made ample use of his Bush connections, dropping in on the president for private Oval Office tête-à-têtes. He led the study group on a mission to Baghdad, where they donned helmets and flak jackets to meet leaders of every political stripe. ("A lot of them knew him," Mr. Panetta said.)

DOJ_NMG_0098294

He has included Mr. Hamilton on every decision, going so far as to reject a photo shoot at Newsweek unless it included Mr. Hamilton, colleagues said. He insisted the report be released after the November election. He has let information slip out when it has suited him — like news of his quiet rendezvous with officials from Syria and Iran, rogue nations in the White House's view — but has demanded absolute secrecy about the substance of the panel's work.

"We've all been issued cyanide pills," said Edward P. Djerejian, who is helping Mr. Baker write the draft and is director of the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University, a university Mr. Baker's grandfather helped found.

As a two-time former cabinet secretary (at Treasury under President Ronald Reagan and the State Department under the first President Bush) and a two-time former White House chief of staff (Reagan and the first President Bush), Mr. Baker has been around Washington long enough to know how to play the expectations game. Right now, he is playing it to the hilt, putting out the word that Iraq 2006 is hardly Florida 2000.

"The expectations have gotten well beyond where he wanted them to get," said one person close to Mr. Baker, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "You're talking about a political equation as much as you are a strategic and diplomatic one. And one of the things that's making the situation difficult is this image that Baker's coming in, Baker's riding to the rescue. There are some very smart and very strong Democrats on this panel, and they're not going to do what Baker tells them to do."

Nor will President Bush; his press secretary, Tony Snow, insisted that the White House would not "outsource this problem to the Baker commission." The White House is already pushing back against the report, even before it is issued. The Pentagon is doing its own review of Iraq policy, and the White House has commissioned another. President Bush, meanwhile, is traveling to Jordan this week to meet Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki of Iraq, where he is expected to reassure the prime minister that the United States is not pulling out anytime soon.

Mr. Baker's relationship with the president is one of the great curiosities of Washington, and many here are trying to divine how he will use that tie to advance the Iraq Study Group. The two are not nearly as close as Mr. Baker is with Mr. Bush's father; Mr. Baker's recent autobiography, "Work Hard, Study and Keep Out of Politics," suggests tension just under the surface.

Mr. Baker writes that he did not mind being left out of the current administration: "We had our turn. Now it was his." Though people in Washington see a certain irony in his return to manage a new Iraq war gone wrong, he insists he is not "implicitly criticizing" Mr. Bush for the invasion. Yet Mr. Baker takes pains to point out, in a one-sentence footnote, that Mr. Bush is "an alumnus" of the "office boy pool" at Baker Botts, Mr. Baker's law firm in Houston. In one scene from the elder Mr. Bush's 1988 presidential campaign, he refers to "the ever-playful presidential son, George W."

These days Mr. Baker refers to that son as "Mr. President." The president calls Mr. Baker, 16 years his senior, "Jimmy." Aides to both insist Mr. Baker has not used his private Oval Office meetings to tip the president off to the commission's work. But then, Mr. Baker would never be that unsubtle.

"He's treating the president just like he is everyone else, as somebody to be co-opted, and brought into the process," said one outside adviser to the study group, who was granted anonymity to talk about the process.

Some Democrats consider that a good thing. "Baker has the great good possibility of success because he's so close to the president," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat and incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "He's able to give the president a way out, a way of saying, 'I didn't do what the Democrats said. I listened to Baker, my old buddy, Jim Baker.' "

By all accounts, Mr. Baker relishes his encore as elder statesmen.

"Look, he was certainly a very effective politician, a wise political strategist," said Donald L. Evans, a close friend of Mr. Baker's who served as commerce secretary in President Bush's first term. "But that was a means to an end. He's playing, I think, the role that he should be playing at this moment in life — the distinguished statesman that is there for leaders to go to, and listen to."

The study group, formed in March, operated below radar for months. But the assignment just happened to overlap with Mr. Baker's October book tour. Mr. Baker left no media outlet unturned, even appearing on "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart." ("Don't think for one minute they don't sell books," he later told The Houston Chronicle.)

Mr. Baker used the appearances artfully, promoting the book and setting the stage for public acceptance of the Iraq Study Group. He made clear his differences with the White House, telling the ABC news program "This Week" that "it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies" and that his panel would search for a middle ground between " 'stay the course' and 'cut and run.' "

The political landscape, though, has changed dramatically since then. If Mr. Baker can guide his group toward recommendations that are accepted by the White House and Democrats, and that yield real improvement in Iraq, he will be more than a Republican fix-it man. Mr. Evans, the former commerce secretary, said he would be remembered as "America's fix-it man."

DOJ_NMG_0098295

But foreign policy experts and politicians alike say there is no miracle elixir for Iraq; if there were, someone would have thought of it already. Ivo Daalder, a scholar at the Brookings Institution, says the real test for Mr. Baker is to pull the White House "out of the quicksand" in a way that has lasting political effects at home and strategic effects in Iraq.

"This is an impossible job," said Mr. Daalder, adding wryly: "Even God couldn't meet those expectations. Perhaps Jim Baker can."

Turning To Baker For New Iraq Plan (BOS/CHT)

By Stephen J. Hedges, Chicago Tribune

The Boston Globe/Chicago Tribune, November 26, 2006

Problem-solving prowess is noted

WASHINGTON -- To his Republican colleagues, James A. Baker III has always represented sensible stability and a steel spine.

He brought his calm, courtly efficiency to the Reagan and Bush administrations in the 1980s, serving as a White House chief of staff and secretary of state and treasury. He headed George H.W. Bush's two presidential campaigns. And when George W. Bush faced a historic legal challenge in the 2000 election, Baker quickly and successfully came to his aid.

The Houston attorney had a knack for making most problems appear as if they could be solved like a neighbor leaning over a fence post to talk things over. Now he faces a challenge like few others in his career, which has spanned five decades, namely how to help the president chart a new course in Iraq.

Officially, Baker is cochairman of a congressionally mandated, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Unofficially, he is the Bush family consigliere. He knows all of Washington's levers of power, and he knows that much of what needs to be said should be said behind closed doors.

When he talks publicly, as he has by gently nudging the president toward a strategic change in Iraq, it is almost certainly by design and probably with Bush family consent.

"After all, he is a Bush family guy," said Peter Galbraith, a former US ambassador to Croatia and author of the book "The End of Iraq." "The genesis of this came at a time when the Republican sponsors of his Iraq Study Group basically were hoping it would develop a bipartisan support of the Republican Iraq strategy of staying the course. It has now morphed into something different."

The Iraq occupation and its attendant problems have become defining events of Bush's presidency. Now the president needs a way out of Iraq and the political and diplomatic trouble it has brought him.

Enter Baker, the man who so often has entered a room with a problem and left with a solution. The question is, can he do it again?

The Iraq Study Group that Baker leads with Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, is expected to forward its recommendations for a new US strategy sometime in early December.

The group also includes retired Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former secretary of state Lawrence S. Eagleburger, lobbyist Vernon E. Jordan, former attorney general Edwin A. Meese III, former Clinton aide Leon E. Panetta, former defense secretary William J. Perry, and former senators Charles S. Robb and Alan Simpson .

Baker began a solo public relations offensive last month, with the publication of his book "Work Hard, Study. . . and Keep Out of Politics!" While he and Hamilton said early on that they would not discuss the study group's recommendations before the elections, Baker offered hints of the group's discussions during book tour interviews.

He casually suggested, for instance, that Bush needed "alternative views" on Iraq, an implication that those around Bush, such as Vice President Dick Cheney and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, were not serving him well.

Baker has also suggested that rather than vilify Iraqi's neighbors Syria and Iran, the administration ought to hold discussions with them. "It's got to be hard-nosed, it's got to be determined," he said. "You don't give away anything, but in my view it is not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Iraq Group A Study In Secrecy, Centrism (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

In the history of U.S. foreign policy, there's been nothing like it: a panel outside government trying to bail the United States out of a prolonged and messy war.

The innocuously titled Iraq Study Group, which has evolved into a parallel policy establishment over the past eight months, is also unique in the way it operates. For one thing, it's even more secretive than the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0098296

Forty experts -- on warfare, the Middle East, reconstruction and Islamic militancy -- were asked to craft options for the commission but have nary a clue what proposals will come out of the 10-member panel, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.).

"It doesn't have to take any of our recommendations," said Clifford D. May of the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies. "They can come up with something entirely different. I wouldn't be surprised if that's what they do."

Interviews with a dozen participants offer insights into the process and the possible outcome of the bipartisan commission, which was organized jointly by four think tanks, was funded with $1 million by Congress and is run by the United States Institute of Peace. It was at times an intellectual free-for-all, participants said.

"I was fascinated by how the big names just let the discussion develop among the experts," said Frederick Barton of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "It was anything but a congressional hearing. They really just said, 'Let us know what you think.' "

During a meeting between experts and the panel, participants said they were struck by former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor's thoughtful questions. "At the first open meeting, it was very moving, as she was the only one who spoke to daily reality. She wanted to know what could be done to help the lives of Iraqis at a time when everything was slipping into killing and decay," said Judith S. Yaphe of National Defense University.

Others recalled how another panel member, Charles S. Robb (D-Va.), a former senator and a former Marine, probed the ethnic divide in the Iraqi army.

All the experts wanted to make sure Baker, who is still closely connected to the Bush family, was in the room when they spoke. Several noted his telltale body language, which could dismiss a comment with as little as a raised eyebrow.

"We were all reading his face. If someone was expounding on something, Baker would get a distant look. He made clear he was not willing to go down that road," said an expert who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the final report has not been released. "He doesn't tolerate fools."

Some participants said the Iraq Study Group should be a model of how to bring the nation's wise men and women together to inject fresh perspective in solving the country's biggest problems. But others said that it, too, had serious flaws.

Despite Iraq's steady deterioration since the panel began its work in April, it moved at a deliberate pace -- too slow, in the view of some participants. The panel spent months analyzing U.S. policy and Iraq's situation. Experts, who were divided into four subgroups, met among themselves to answer a list of questions from the 10 commissioners -- five Republicans and five Democrats.

The panel will reconvene early this week to begin final deliberations. Its report is still weeks away.

Some experts were disgruntled that their ideas did not make it out of the working groups. Brookings Institution fellow Michael E. O'Hanlon advocates the "soft partition" of Iraq's Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish communities with land swaps and help with housing and jobs, so people could relocate to places where they are less threatened. He said he wishes he had testified before the panel so that his suggestion was not filtered out. "Some good ideas were killed in the cradle," he said.

Besides the experts, the commission also heard from others, including President Bush, former president Bill Clinton, Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem and Javad Zarif, the Iranian ambassador to the United Nations.

The panel was deliberately skewed toward a centrist course for Iraq, participants said. Organizers avoided experts with extreme views on either side of the Iraq war debate.

Neoconservatives, who supported and crafted much of the original Iraq strategy, say the panel was stacked against them. Michael Rubin, political adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority, resigned because he said he was a token.

"Many appointees appeared to be selected less for expertise than for their hostility to President Bush's war on terrorism and emphasis on democracy," Rubin wrote in the Weekly Standard. Baker and Hamilton "gerrymandered" the experts only "to ratify predetermined recommendations," he wrote. "Rather than prime the debate they sought to stifle it."

Only two of the 40 experts -- May and former CIA analyst Reuel Marc Gerecht -- are neoconservatives.

"My frustration was that there was often a feeling in the [experts'] room that President Bush should have asked them for their advice much earlier but didn't, so now they were all going to say, 'I told you so,' " May said. "I said, 'If you're going to say that this mission can't succeed and will face defeat, let's not have a failure of imagination.' "

In an interview, Gerecht said the goal of consensus among 10 Republicans and Democrats means that there will be no dramatic recommendations. In an op-ed piece in the Wall Street Journal, he wrote: "Its recommendations will probably be the least helpful of all the blue-ribbon commissions in Washington since World War II because it cannot escape from an unavoidable reality: We either declare defeat and withdraw completely tout de suite, or we surge troops into Baghdad and fight."

Although the experts have had their last meeting, the debate continues in what one participant described as "catty chatting" in a Web chat room. The panel also gets copies of those discussions.

DOJ_NMG_0098297

"Unfortunately, our deliberations have been degenerating lately into petty squabbling over picayune issues of tactics, and I'm afraid I show that I have lost my patience a little bit here," wrote former CIA analyst Ray Close in an e-mail about the experts' deliberations. "Some of our most obstinate neocon diehards are still trying to fashion a strategy that is no more than an ersatz version of 'stay the course until victory.' They have been wasting our time, in my view."

The only hint of a possible outcome came during an ad hoc vote. On Sept. 18, experts assembled to present two options to the panel: "Stability First," to stabilize Baghdad and make intense reconciliation efforts with insurgents, and "Redeploy and Contain," to gradually withdraw troops while containing terrorist threats.

The chairmen then called for a quick vote by the experts. Accounts vary, though most agree that the "Stability First" option won -- by a large margin, some said.

In a reflection of shifting U.S. sentiments on the war, the chairmen called for a second vote at their last meeting with the experts in October. This time, participants said, the vote was almost evenly divided between stability and gradual withdrawal. Sticking around to stabilize Iraq won by only a tiny margin.

Long Stints In Iraq Fracture Families (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

FORT STEWART, Ga. -- As a gray dawn broke, hundreds of 3rd Infantry Division soldiers gathered on a Georgia marching ground this month and listened to a long list of names of fallen comrades. Taps rose mournfully above rows of young redbud trees planted for each of the division's 317 soldiers who have died in Iraq.

Col. John Charlton, commander of the division's 1st Brigade, which next month begins its third Iraq tour in four years, stepped forward. "Be thankful for your families, your health, and for every day that you're alive," he advised. The brigade's mission, he said, is to bring peace to Iraq's volatile western Anbar province and its capital, Ramadi, which he said despite progress remain "a dangerous area, a very dangerous area."

"Take this time . . . to be thinking about those soldiers represented behind or in front of you," he said, "and as you'll notice, there's still some space on the sidewalk there for more trees."

This week, U.S. troops will have been fighting in Iraq longer than they did in World War II, with no relief in sight. Soldiers from 1st Brigade preparing at Fort Stewart for their third Iraq tour have been spending as much time in Iraq as at home. The rotations -- a year in Iraq followed by a year at home -- dictate soldiers' most intimate decisions: They mandate when troops can marry and have children. They sever relationships that cannot sustain the stress of absence or danger. And they lead some couples to pray for the war to end.

After the memorial service, Lt. Col. Doug Crissman gathered his 1st Brigade soldiers and sent them on leave with a warning not to get hurt, go to jail or go AWOL.

"You're all a little bit nervous. Hell, I'm nervous," said Crissman, of Burke, Va., who commands the 2nd Battalion, 7th Infantry Regiment. "The Army is asking us to do some tough stuff."

Then his voice softened as he nudged his troops to be attentive to their families. "I need you to think about this visit a little differently," he said. "Spend time with them. . . . Tell them you love them."Strained Relationships

In the living room of his Savannah home, Capt. Thom Frohnhoefer tumbled with his daughter Maggie, 2, as she jangled and waved his metal dog tags.

"She's the one I had after the first deployment," Frohnhoefer said. "It will be harder this time because she knows Daddy is leaving."

From courtship to parenting to divorce, the time away at war is having a profound impact on the families of active-duty soldiers, according to interviews with dozens of soldiers from the 3rd Infantry Division and their relatives. The division spearheaded the U.S. invasion of Iraq in March 2003 and returned for a second, year-long tour in January 2005.

For 1st Brigade soldiers such as Frohnhoefer, having children poses a wrenching choice: Leave your wife alone in pregnancy and birth, or miss your newborn's first year.

Frohnhoefer and several others in his brigade opted to start pregnancies soon after returning in January, creating a mini baby boom. Frohnhoefer's second daughter, Haley, was born three weeks ago. Another soldier in the unit had a baby last week.

"We take a lot of pictures," said Frohnhoefer, 28, of Queens, N.Y., as his wife, Audrey, quieted Haley with a pacifier. His biggest fear, he said, is "my kids not knowing me if something were to happen to me."

Sgt. 1st Class Jonathan Harper, 37, of Wichita, has two children and wanted more, but his wife gave him what he calls "the ultimatum": He had to be home for the pregnancy and beyond. The result: no more kids. "With me being gone, it's too much of a burden," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0098298

For single soldiers, finding a spouse is difficult. Spec. Christian Brown, 25, of New Smyrna Beach, Fla., is afraid that when he leaves next month he will lose the girlfriend he met earlier this year. "She doesn't know if she can handle me being gone," he said, adding that he no longer plans to reenlist.

Other soldiers are arranging hasty marriages before they leave -- for added benefits and to provide for their spouses if they die -- a trend officers discourage because they say it makes soldiers more vulnerable to divorce.

Capt. Neil Johnson, 25, of Crystal River, Fla., said that he wed in November 2004 but that the uncertainty and fear surrounding his Army job led to his divorce in June. "If I had been in Florida, I'd probably still be married," he said. Army divorce rates surged after 2001 and remain elevated, although they fell somewhat last year. Johnson sees more divorces coming. "It seems normal," he said. "No one is surprised."

Anxiety, depression and psychological trauma from repeated exposure to combat add to the stress, affecting 15 percent to 20 percent of soldiers, said Maj. Christopher H. Warner, a 3rd Infantry Division psychiatrist. Those factors contribute to drinking, drug use and domestic violence among a small percentage of soldiers, officers said.

While some GIs grow more resilient to combat stress, others get worse, Warner said. One soldier attacked by gunfire and bombs repeatedly at Iraqi bridges found himself afraid to drive through underpasses at home. Some soldiers under treatment for combat stress return to war but are screened to see if they pose a risk, Warner said.

Still, the bulk of psychological problems for soldiers relate to home-front issues such as separation and infidelity, he said.

Many soldiers doubt civilians can understand the pressures they face, and they see a widening gap between Army life and what some call "the outside world." "There are times you feel like, 'Why is it us?' " Audrey said. Civilians, she said, "don't have a concept of what we go through."A Changing Army

Sgt. 1st Class Kevin Bullock takes a break from loading up Bradley Fighting Vehicles and other equipment for shipping to Iraq. A divorced father of two, he had custody of his children all summer but was so busy he saw them for just two weeks. Next year he will not see them "unless luck is there and I get R and R in the summer."

Life for the roughly 3,800 soldiers of 1st Brigade is almost as hectic at Fort Stewart as it is in the desert, because their unit has only a year off the battlefield to rebuild lost manpower and equipment, train, and get ready for another deployment.

Escalating violence has kept troop levels in Iraq at more than 140,000, scuttling the Army's plans to shorten tours or give active-duty soldiers two years at home between combat duties. Given the size of today's active-duty Army compared with the high demand -- at least 17 out of 36 available combat brigades are in Iraq or Afghanistan -- the Army cannot keep all its units steadily filled with people and gear but instead "turns on the tap" for brigades first in line to deploy.

Last spring and summer, 1st Brigade began receiving hundreds of new soldiers and pieces of equipment and had to rush to complete a year's training in four months. An additional 100 soldiers will arrive next month just in time to deploy and train in Kuwait.

"We had to train on weekends, train on many a night," Crissman said. The pressure to meet deadlines was so great that the division commander, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, ordered that soldiers take off certain hours each week to spend with their families.

The stress is fundamentally changing Army culture, some officers say. "I am worried . . . you will see a more single Army, very combat-focused, 'get on the team or get out,' " a senior officer said.Worried Soldiers, Worried Families

Staff Sgt. Wendell Gee, 29, of Knoxville, Tenn., has had his share of close scrapes in Iraq. During the invasion, an Iraqi T-72 tank fired a round through Gee's Bradley.

Asked last week what helps him get through the deployments, the father of three answered: "Not dying has helped get me through it."

Even the most stoic soldiers, like Gee, who reenlisted on his most recent tour, say the Army cannot keep up this pace. The Army is not big enough, and the quality of new recruits has dropped, they say. Many worry pressure to pull out of Iraq will spell chaos and mean their comrades died in vain, but other soldiers and their spouses now say the war was a mistake.

"I look at this as a duty. You're in it for the long haul," said the brigade commander, Charlton. "Are we able to do this for the next 10 years? I don't know."

Gee's wife, Tracy, grows misty-eyed recalling hearing that the brigade would return to Iraq so quickly. "We cried. . . . We just weren't ready," she said over a fast-food lunch. Tracy, who juggles a 1-year-old and two older children with a job selling vacuums, said she has asked her husband to leave the Army.

What most disturbed her, she said, was when her 12-year-old son, Christopher, wrote in a school paper that he wanted to be just like his dad. "I don't want him to do that," Tracy said, tears welling in her eyes. "Hopefully, the war will be over by the time our children are grown."

In Alaska, Troops Return Home To Chills And Cheers (LAT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0098299

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA — The first soldiers with the 172nd Stryker Brigade returning from Iraq arrived in Alaska on Saturday to bone-chilling weather and welcoming cheers.

Friends and family gathered at Ft. Wainwright near Fairbanks to welcome about 625 members of the brigade who served an extended tour in Iraq. An additional 200 soldiers with the 4th Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment of the brigade arrived at Ft. Richardson near Anchorage.

As buses pulled into a cavernous building at Ft. Wainwright, cheers went up from the waiting crowd. The roar continued as soldiers got out and lined up in formation. Soon after, they were hugging their loved ones.

"Go easy on them. They're tired and a little chilly," Col. Robert Ball — the second highest-ranking Army officer in Alaska — told the families earlier.

Brigade members will be arriving each day until Dec. 5, according to Army officials.

Most of about 3,800 soldiers will return to Ft. Wainwright, where the brigade is stationed.

The soldiers are returning after 16 months in Iraq. They served their first year in northern Iraq, based out of Mosul, in what was the largest combat deployment of Alaska-based troops since the Vietnam War. The 172nd worked with Iraqi army and police forces, training them and conducting searches and patrols.

After the brigade began returning to Alaska in July, its tour was extended four more months to help quell violence in Baghdad. About 300 soldiers had already returned from Iraq and were sent back after the extension.

Seven brigade soldiers died during the extension, which followed the deaths of 19 brigade soldiers during the original deployment.

Many families at Ft. Wainwright on Saturday brought warm clothing for the soldiers, who came home to temperatures as cold as minus 32 degrees — a 102-degree difference from Baghdad. Reunions varied between romantic and boisterous.

"Oh, he's here!" said Tamatha Zavodsky, jumping up to get a glimpse of her husband, Sgt. Maj. Dennis Zavodsky.

Soldiers embraced toddlers or cradled infants they were meeting for the first time. Some single soldiers were met by families of other soldiers.

Some of the crowd, like Sue Ulibarri, didn't have a soldier returning on the first flights, but came anyway to gear up for their own reunions. Ulibarri's husband, Sgt. Maj. William Ulibarri, isn't due in Fairbanks until later in the week.

"But this is the most exciting thing happening in Fairbanks," she said.

Iraq's Palestinians In Bull's-eye (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

Accused of being favored by Hussein, many take refuge in an ethnic enclave or try to flee the country, which isn't easy.

BAGHDAD — Palestinians in Iraq, many of whom fled here as refugees more than half a century ago, are on the run again.

The civil war convulsing the country has raised worries about the fate of the approximately 20,000 Palestinians in Iraq, who are targeted by kidnappers and Shiite Muslim death squads because of what many Iraqis see as the group's favored status under former President Saddam Hussein.

Community leaders say more than 60 Palestinians have been killed since early last year, and thousands have left the country. Many of the Palestinians who have stayed behind, mainly in Baghdad, have been chased from their homes and taken refuge in a largely Palestinian neighborhood here called Baladiyat.

"We are living in a state of fear," said Lena Shaheen, 27, who fled the mainly Shiite Dora neighborhood with her family in September after gunmen announced through loudspeakers that Palestinian residents had 72 hours to get out.

Since then, some of the Palestinians' apartments have been taken over by members of the militia tied to the firebrand Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, residents said.

Palestinians, of course, have not been alone in suffering from the months of bloodletting, largely between armed bands of Shiite and Sunni Muslim Arabs. But international officials warn that Palestinians are in an especially precarious position because they are considered outsiders, even after decades of living in Iraq, and have difficulty gaining admission to other countries because they do not carry Iraqi passports.

Palestinians have also been targeted because they are predominantly Sunni and perceived as having received preferential treatment under Hussein, who sought to burnish his credentials as a pan-Arab leader by voicing support for the Palestinian quest for nationhood.

"They are a more vulnerable group than anybody else in Iraq," said Gianni Magazzeni, who heads the United Nations human rights office here.

DOJ_NMG_0098300

Palestinians deny they received special treatment from Hussein, including jobs and government payouts, or that they support the Sunni-led insurgency.

The U.N. refugee agency has appealed to the Iraqi government and U.S.-led forces to offer protection to Palestinians in Iraq, whose population has dropped from about 34,000 before the 2003 invasion that toppled Hussein.

"They haven't had much option, and we are extremely concerned over the plight of those remaining, and the inability to provide them with protection," the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees said last month.

Some Palestinians have been killed during mortar attacks against Baladiyat and in market bombings. Others were seized by gunmen and later found dead, showing signs of torture.

Uday Abu Hayja, a 32-year-old Palestinian, disappeared June 7 after going to work at a Baghdad flour mill in a Shiite neighborhood where he had been employed for two years. Abu Hayja and his Egyptian brother-in-law, who also worked at the mill, were taken aside by militiamen who said they needed to investigate the pair, family members said.

After more than a week, the family learned that the men had been killed on the day of their disappearance. It took days to find the bodies in the city's overcrowded morgue. They bore gunshot wounds.

The victims' relatives were too afraid to fetch the bodies for burial; some Shiite neighbors did so instead.

A month ago, the rest of the Abu Hayja family fled Baghdad, taking a bus to the Syrian border. One of Uday Abu Hayja's sisters, Muna, was allowed to cross into Syria because she carried Egyptian travel documents from her marriage.

But the others, lacking passports, have been living for weeks in a no man's land at the border in side-by-side tents, shivering at night as the temperatures drop. They and more than 300 other Palestinians stuck there have been tended by U.N. and other relief workers.

"We have suffered enough, quite enough," another sister, Maha, said by telephone from the border encampment. "Every family here has its own story of suffering."

She said the family's plans would hinge on whether Syria took them in. In May, Syria let in nearly 300 Palestinians who had languished for months along Iraq's border with Jordan. But it has not allowed any more Palestinians to enter.

Some Palestinians say they would be happy to be moved en masse from Iraq if another country would agree to take them. Many came to Iraq as small children at the time of the 1948 war that broke out as Israel was being established; others were born here but never granted full Iraqi citizenship.

International refugee workers say a bid to move Palestinians to the West Bank or Gaza Strip ran into opposition from Israel, and Arab nations have shown little interest in absorbing them.

A 57-year-old Palestinian attorney in Baladiyat who has promoted the rights of Palestinians said the neighborhood had taken on the air of a refugee camp because so many had flocked there for protection.

Residents are now afraid to venture out to other parts of Baghdad, and most would gladly move anywhere else they felt safe, said the lawyer, who asked not to be named out of fear he would be targeted.

"Even if they would put us in the desert, we would plant seeds and turn it green," he said. "As long as they provide us with security."

ellingwood@latimes.com

Local Surgeons Helping Iraqi Who Helped U.S. (NSDY)

By Carl Macgowan

Newsday, November 26, 2006

The right side of Uday's face is shattered. There's a hole where his cheekbone used to be and his eye is gone. His nose is crooked and bloated.

Uday nearly lost his life because, he said, he helped U.S. troops in the early days of the Iraq war.

Now the Baghdad native is in New York awaiting the second of three operations to rebuild his face. If all goes well, Uday could receive a prosthetic eye when the last surgery is completed early next year. And if Uday's fondest hopes are realized, his wife and four children will join him in the United States.

"My family wants to see my face after the surgery," Uday, 47, said.

The effort by two Garden City plastic surgeons to repair his broken visage completes a three-year odyssey for Uday, who wins friends with a gentle demeanor in stark contrast to the upheaval in his native land.

Because his family remains in Baghdad, where sectarian violence has led to hundreds of deaths in recent weeks, Newsday agreed to withhold Uday's last name.

Before the war, Uday, a Shia Muslim, was a mechanical supervisor for the government of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. When U.S. troops stormed the capital in April 2003, Uday, who speaks choppy but passable English, was hired as an Arab linguist by the Army's 626th Forward Support Battalion, 101st Airborne. He was kept on when that unit was replaced by the 407th Forward Support Battalion, 82nd Airborne. "I believe they came to help us," Uday said. "So I wanted to help them."

DOJ_NMG_0098301

On May 12, Uday said, he was returning to a base in south-central Baghdad after picking up soda and ice for the troops when he was approached by two or three men. He did not know them but believed they were supporters of Saddam Hussein.

"They waiting for me," Uday said. "They stopped me and ask, 'Why you work with them? Why you help them?'

"They shoot. ... They hurt anybody who help [Americans] like that."

Col. Jeffrey Douville, then a lieutenant colonel with the 407th Forward Support Battalion, said Uday was "car-jacked" around midday. "Our soldiers heard the gunfire, saw the commotion and provided immediate aid," Douville, 43, said. The attackers ran off before they could be caught. They left Uday to die.

"He was shot in the face point-blank and required extensive, immediate medical and life support," said Douville, now attending the Army War College in Carlisle, Pa. "Our medics and treatment professionals performed initial treatment to save his life and then we evacuated him to the next level of Army medical care, where initial surgery was performed."

Uday said he woke up in a Kuwait hospital five or six days after the attack. The right side of his face was blown away. His left arm had been disfigured by bullets when he lifted his arm to protect himself.

He remained in Kuwait for seven months, enduring 14 surgeries on his arm and face. Uday returned to Baghdad but after three months returned to Kuwait for more treatment. There he met Elissa Montanti, founder of Staten Island-based Global Medical Relief Fund.

"She told me she would try to help me make surgery which I need," Uday said.

Searching for help

Montanti said she met Uday in May 2004 while searching for children in need of surgery.

"I went to the hospital and met Uday, and I was just totally ... overwhelmed," Montanti, 49, said. "He nearly gave his life for our country."

When she returned to the United States, Montanti said, she spoke to doctors who wanted to help but couldn't get clearance from their hospitals. Her fortunes turned in January of this year when she met plastic surgeon Thomas Davenport at a charity event. Davenport approached Michael Dowling, chief executive and president of North Shore-Long Island Jewish Health System, who said green-lighting the surgery was "an absolute no-brainer."

"Here's a guy who put his life on the line and his family's life on the line to help U.S. troops," Dowling said. "There are times when you do what's right, and this is one of them."

Montanti, her sister and a friend raised about $1,700 to cover Uday's travel costs and other expenses. Uday arrived in the United States on Sept. 17 and is living at Mount Manresa, a Jesuit retreat on Staten Island.

On Oct. 27, Davenport and Dr. Kaveh Alizadeh, partners at Long Island Plastic Surgical Group in Garden City, implanted a "tissue expander," essentially a balloon that puffs up the right side of Uday's face, causing the overlying skin to grow. Subsequent surgeries next month and in January will involve stretching the new skin to rebuild Uday's face, Alizadeh said.

Uday's prognosis is good, Alizadeh said. "Once you lose the tissue on your face, it can never be perfect," he said. "When he [Uday] sits there with you, he's self-conscious. We want him to not feel self-conscious."

The doctors are not charging Uday a fee. The surgeries normally cost $100,000, Alizadeh said.

'Better than before'

On a recent visit to Alizadeh's office, Uday was unfailingly polite, perpetually cheerful -- and studiously apolitical. He was circumspect when asked if Hussein's Nov. 5 conviction for crimes against humanity would help or hurt Iraq.

"I don't know about that," he said. "Maybe it will help. Maybe it don't."

His assessment of Iraq's future seems contradictory. His wife and children endure daily hardship in Baghdad -- "They're afraid," he said, "their lives are not normal" -- yet he exudes the optimism of people who survived a dictatorship and can find reasons for hope.

"It's better than before," he said.

He wants to remain in the United States and hopes to be joined by his family. Between medical appointments, Uday said he visits fellow Iraqis he's met since arriving in New York. It's a long way from Baghdad, where his injuries prevented him from going outside.

"When I was there ... I'm feeling that it's very difficult. Difficult every day. Difficult life, yes," Uday said. "Now here I'm feeling peace."

Leaving Iraq, Honorably (WP)

By Chuck Hagel

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098302

There will be no victory or defeat for the United States in Iraq. These terms do not reflect the reality of what is going to happen there. The future of Iraq was always going to be determined by the Iraqis -- not the Americans.

Iraq is not a prize to be won or lost. It is part of the ongoing global struggle against instability, brutality, intolerance, extremism and terrorism. There will be no military victory or military solution for Iraq. Former secretary of state Henry Kissinger made this point last weekend.

The time for more U.S. troops in Iraq has passed. We do not have more troops to send and, even if we did, they would not bring a resolution to Iraq. Militaries are built to fight and win wars, not bind together failing nations. We are once again learning a very hard lesson in foreign affairs: America cannot impose a democracy on any nation -- regardless of our noble purpose.

We have misunderstood, misread, misplanned and mismanaged our honorable intentions in Iraq with an arrogant self-delusion reminiscent of Vietnam. Honorable intentions are not policies and plans. Iraq belongs to the 25 million Iraqis who live there. They will decide their fate and form of government.

It may take many years before there is a cohesive political center in Iraq. America's options on this point have always been limited. There will be a new center of gravity in the Middle East that will include Iraq. That process began over the past few days with the Syrians and Iraqis restoring diplomatic relations after 20 years of having no formal communication.

What does this tell us? It tells us that regional powers will fill regional vacuums, and they will move to work in their own self-interest -- without the United States. This is the most encouraging set of actions for the Middle East in years. The Middle East is more combustible today than ever before, and until we are able to lead a renewal of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, mindless destruction and slaughter will continue in Lebanon, Israel and across the Middle East.

We are a long way from a sustained peaceful resolution to the anarchy in Iraq. But this latest set of events is moving the Middle East in the only direction it can go with any hope of lasting progress and peace. The movement will be imperfect, stuttering and difficult.

America finds itself in a dangerous and isolated position in the world. We are perceived as a nation at war with Muslims. Unfortunately, that perception is gaining credibility in the Muslim world and for many years will complicate America's global credibility, purpose and leadership. This debilitating and dangerous perception must be reversed as the world seeks a new geopolitical, trade and economic center that will accommodate the interests of billions of people over the next 25 years. The world will continue to require realistic, clear-headed American leadership -- not an American divine mission.

The United States must begin planning for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq. The cost of combat in Iraq in terms of American lives, dollars and world standing has been devastating. We've already spent more than $300 billion there to prosecute an almost four-year-old war and are still spending $8 billion per month. The United States has spent more than $500 billion on our wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. And our effort in Afghanistan continues to deteriorate, partly because we took our focus off the real terrorist threat, which was there, and not in Iraq.

We are destroying our force structure, which took 30 years to build. We've been funding this war dishonestly, mainly through supplemental appropriations, which minimizes responsible congressional oversight and allows the administration to duck tough questions in defending its policies. Congress has abdicated its oversight responsibility in the past four years.

It is not too late. The United States can still extricate itself honorably from an impending disaster in Iraq. The Baker-Hamilton commission gives the president a new opportunity to form a bipartisan consensus to get out of Iraq. If the president fails to build a bipartisan foundation for an exit strategy, America will pay a high price for this blunder -- one that we will have difficulty recovering from in the years ahead.

To squander this moment would be to squander future possibilities for the Middle East and the world. That is what is at stake over the next few months.

The writer is a Republican senator from Nebraska.

Bring Back Saddam Hussein (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

THE DEBATE about Iraq has moved past the question of whether it was a mistake (everybody knows it was) to the more depressing question of whether it is possible to avert total disaster. Every self-respecting foreign policy analyst has his own plan for Iraq. The trouble is that these tracts are inevitably unconvincing, except when they argue why all the other plans would fail. It's all terribly grim.

So allow me to propose the unthinkable: Maybe, just maybe, our best option is to restore Saddam Hussein to power.

Yes, I know. Hussein is a psychotic mass murderer. Under his rule, Iraqis were shot, tortured and lived in constant fear. Bringing the dictator back would sound cruel if it weren't for the fact that all those things are also happening now, probably on a wider scale.

DOJ_NMG_0098303

At the outset of the war, I had no high hopes for Iraqi democracy, but I paid no attention to the possibility that the Iraqis would end up with a worse government than the one they had. It turns out, however, that there is something more awful than totalitarianism, and that is endless chaos and civil war.

Nobody seems to foresee the possibility of restoring order to Iraq. Here is the basic dilemma: The government is run by Shiites, and the security agencies have been overrun by militias and death squads. The government is strong enough to terrorize the Sunnis into rebellion but not strong enough to crush this rebellion.

Meanwhile, we have admirably directed our efforts into training a professional and nonsectarian Iraqi police force and encouraging reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites. But we haven't succeeded. We may be strong enough to stop large-scale warfare or genocide, but we're not strong enough to stop pervasive chaos.

Hussein, however, has a proven record in that department. It may well be possible to reconstitute the Iraqi army and state bureaucracy we disbanded, and if so, that may be the only force capable of imposing order in Iraq.

Chaos and order each have a powerful self-sustaining logic. When people perceive a lack of order, they act in ways that further the disorder. If a Sunni believes that he is in danger of being killed by Shiites, he will throw his support to Sunni insurgents who he sees as the only force that can protect him. The Sunni insurgents, in turn, will scare Shiites into supporting their own anti-Sunni militias.

And it's not just Iraqis who act this way. You could find a smaller-scale version of this dynamic in an urban riot here in the United States. But when there's an expectation of social order, people will act in a civilized fashion.

Restoring the expectation of order in Iraq will take some kind of large-scale psychological shock. The Iraqi elections were expected to offer that shock, but they didn't. The return of Saddam Hussein — a man every Iraqi knows, and whom many of them fear — would do the trick.

The disadvantages of reinstalling Hussein are obvious, but consider some of the upside. He would not allow the country to be dominated by Iran, which is the United States' major regional enemy, a sponsor of terrorism and an instigator of warfare between Lebanon and Israel. Hussein was extremely difficult to deal with before the war, in large part because he apparently believed that he could defeat any U.S. invasion if it came to that. Now he knows he can't. And he'd probably be amenable because his alternative is death by hanging.

I know why restoring a brutal tyrant to power is a bad idea. Somebody explain to me why it's worse than all the others.

A Tale Of Two Bushes (WP)

By Warren Bass
The Washington Post, November 26, 2006
CIRCLE IN THE SAND
Why We Went Back to Iraq
By Christian Alfonsi
Doubleday. 466 pp. $26.95

This isn't the first time Robert Gates has worried about an American occupation of Iraq. In December 1991, with the first Bush administration on the brink of war to expel Iraq from Kuwait, then-Deputy National Security Adviser Gates led the high-ranking committee that unanimously urged President George H.W. Bush not to make regime change one of Operation Desert Storm's war objectives. Toppling the Baathist regime could lead to "the Vietnam scenario," warned the man now nominated to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary. "Our concern was that if we had been in occupation, having bombed bridges and everything else, we would be expected to fix it all, and we didn't want any part of that."

But the unseen cataclysm looming in September 2001 would unleash a wave of conservative scorn for that decision. In 1990-91, Bush and National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft -- Gates's boss and the president's foreign policy alter ego -- thought that humbling an aggressive Iraq without marching on Baghdad would help create a stable balance of power in the Middle East. But in 2001-03, the president's son and his quite different national security team would conclude that their gimlet-eyed, unsentimental predecessors should have tried not to stabilize the region but to remake it.

That long pivot in Republican foreign policy thinking -- from a power-balancing Bush administration to a power-flexing Bush administration -- is the subject of Christian Alfonsi's Circle in the Sand. The book works best as a retelling of the 1990-91 Gulf crisis with the benefit of new documents and on-the-record interviews with senior officials then and now. Unfortunately, Alfonsi skitters around in the period between Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait and America's 2003 invasion of Iraq. And his take on the early 1990s is shot through with what historians call "presentism" -- seeing the past through contemporary lenses, with the inevitable distorting effects of reading the history of Operation Desert Storm in the light of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

Alfonsi, who formerly worked at Young & Rubicam Brands, cherrypicks his data here, harvesting snippets of meetings that help explain the earlier thinking or actions of officials who served in both administrations. That means that Circle in the Sand is in no danger of displacing more methodologically sober classics on the Gulf War, such as Michael R. Gordon and Bernard E. Trainor's The Generals' War, Rick Atkinson's Crusade or Michael Kelly's dazzling Martyrs' Day. But it does have plenty of juicy tidbits about the once and future Bushies; Senate staffers will no doubt scour its pages before Gates's confirmation hearings.

DOJ_NMG_0098304

It's delicious to learn, for instance, that President Bush asked his staff for talking points on Aug. 1, 1990, for "the next world leader on his call list: Saddam Hussein," who would conquer Kuwait on Aug. 2. (Somehow, Alfonsi gets the invasion's date wrong.) That day, at the first National Security Council meeting of the crisis, the biggest hawks came from the State Department, despite its reputation for preferring jaw-jaw over war-war. "You must kick Saddam out of Kuwait and wreck him in the process," Deputy Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger urged the president. But Paul Wolfowitz, then undersecretary of defense for policy, sat in stunned silence as the principals argued. He recalls leaving the meeting "deeply disturbed" by the Bush team's early indecision about whether to let Iraq's aggression stand. Surprisingly, it was Scowcroft -- now the neoconservatives' favorite bÃªte noire -- who rode to the hawkish Wolfowitz's rescue. At the next NSC meeting, the national security adviser slammed the door on the idea of leaving Iraq in control of Kuwait, having coordinated his "eruption" with Wolfowitz's boss, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney.

The detail gets even better when it comes to questions of regime change -- which in 1990-91 meant not U.S. nation-building but hammering Baghdad until another mustachioed Baathist strongman took over. "Iraq could fall apart," Scowcroft warned Gen. Colin Powell, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Fascinatingly, Gates and his fellow postwar planners worried both about another Vietnam and another Panama -- a replay of the embarrassingly protracted 1989 hunt for Manuel Noriega. Realism prevailed and, after Iraq surrendered, the battered dictatorship crushed rebellions by its much-abused Kurdish and Shiite subjects, eliciting calls for America to get off the sidelines. "I am not going to involve any American troops in a civil war in Iraq," the president lectured in April 1991. Wolfowitz seethed.

Substance and echoes aside, it's also something of an eye-opener to see the elder Bush's foreign policy team back in action. During the Gulf crisis, the policy apparatus moves decisively, snapping down loose ends with hospital corners. The Scowcroft-led interagency policymaking process hums along; the secretary of state and the secretary of defense work amicably together; and the vice president's staff is almost entirely irrelevant, minus the occasional episode where Vice President Dan Quayle or his chief of staff, William Kristol, wanders off the reservation and needs to be herded back on message. Senior U.S. officials even trust the French. The decisions weren't always right, but the process was impeccably professional.

All of which underscores how dissimilar these two Bush administrations have proven, in both style and strategy. But the seeds of conservative dissatisfaction were already evident under the first President Bush. "I do not think the United States wants to have U.S. military forces accept casualties and accept the responsibility of trying to govern Iraq," Cheney said on "This Week with David Brinkley" on April 7, 1991. "I think it makes no sense at all." That's a nice "gotcha" moment for Alfonsi. But later in the show, the defense secretary added: "If you don't have a clear-cut military objective, if you're not prepared to use overwhelming force to achieve it, then we don't have any business committing U.S. military forces into that civil war." Thanks to Alfonsi's presentism, it's not hard to hear Cheney's hint that he might have seen a massive U.S. invasion of Iraq aimed forthrightly at regime change as a viable option even back in 1991. Cheney's first comment now sounds like a display of loyalty to a realist president; his second now sounds like foreshadowing.

Warren Bass, a senior editor at Book World, was a contributor to "Triumph Without Victory: The History of the Persian Gulf War," by the staff of U.S. News & World Report.

NATO Soldier Among Dead In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, November 26, 2006

One NATO soldier and about 57 insurgents were killed in four separate attacks in southern Afghanistan, officials said Sunday.

Insurgents attacked NATO-led forces Saturday near Tirin Kot district in Uruzgan province. NATO returned fire and requested air support, killing approximately 50 insurgents, said the International Security Assistance Force of Afghanistan. One NATO soldier was also killed in the incident.

Also on Sunday, a suicide bomber attacked a restaurant in southeastern Afghanistan, leaving seven Afghans dead and 20 injured, the provincial governor said.

The restaurant, located in Paktika province, was completely destroyed, said provincial governor Mohammad Akram Akhpelwak.

Akhpelwak told The Associated Press that the attacker was believed to be targeting an Afghan special forces commander and a district chief who were at the restaurant Sunday morning and were among the injured.

Paktika, which borders Pakistan, has been plagued by Taliban violence.

NATO said that as of mid-November, 97 suicide attacks this year in Afghanistan have killed 217 people.

DOJ_NMG_0098305

In the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province, insurgents fired upon Afghan National Army and NATO soldiers Saturday. A retaliatory air strike killed approximately five insurgents, said the ISAF statement. Three NATO soldiers were injured.

In neighboring Zabul province, about 50 Taliban fighters attacked the Arghandab district chief compound on Saturday and clashed with police for about an hour, leaving one Taliban dead and three wounded, said district chief Fazal Bari.

On the Kabul-Kandahar highway in Zabul, Taliban fighters ambushed a police convoy Saturday night and exchanged gunfire with police for about 20 minutes, said Zabul highway police commander Jainani Khan. One Taliban was killed.

Attacks and clashes occur almost daily in the lawless southern provinces — the Taliban stronghold where the Afghan government wields little power.

Taliban, Convicts May Be Afghan Recruits (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Taliban militants and common criminals may have infiltrated an Afghan program that trains thousands of men affiliated with local militias to fight the country's growing insurgency.

The formation of the Afghanistan National Auxiliary Police reflects the growing questions about the ability of the existing security force's to beat resurgent Taliban rebels and other militants challenging government authority in parts of the country.

But though the training of the local militia members could give Afghanistan up to 11,000 on-call policemen to increase the ranks of security forces during times of need, some question the quality of the recruits and their effectiveness.

"There are criminals and drug users among them," said Col. Mohammed Hussain Andiwall, a senior police official in Kandahar province who coordinates between the Ministry of Interior and foreign experts training the auxiliary police force.

"Our constitution does not really provide "for these sort of people in our security forces," Andiwall said earlier this week. "The fact that they wear the same uniform as a regular police is very problematic."

Fighting between insurgents and NATO-led and Afghan government troops have halted development and reconstruction and endangered the efforts to normalize a country that once provided shelter for Osama bin Laden and his al-Qaida network.

Afghanistan, with its weak central government whose authority does not extend to some regions, has throughout years of war and conflict relied on its militias and warlords to serve as de facto regional security forces. That changed when the Taliban rose to power in 1996 and promised to rid the country of warlords.

Ross Davies, a Canadian police officer involved in the training of the auxiliary force in Kandahar province, said that despite a vetting process conducted by Afghan authorities, police trainers still "do not know really who these people are."

"We know that we are probably training some of the bad guys," he said, using an expression reserved mainly for the insurgents.

When Kandahar province held its first training session for the auxiliary police last month, some 200 men — most with long beards and turbans — showed up. But by the end of the 10-day course, only 77 remained.

Some were kicked out after they were found with hashish and heroin. Others had marks on their hands from injecting the drugs. Others refused orders to clean toilets, make their beds or take care of common areas. Dozens went back home for a religious holiday and never returned.

The 77 who did complete the training committed to a one-year contract with the auxiliary force. They can join the regular police force after a year if they choose.

The 10-day training course includes lessons on the Afghan constitution, human rights, the use of weapons and basic police tactics. At the end of the course the recruits are given an automatic gun and sent to their home districts, largely in provinces most affected by the insurgency, in the country's south and east.

Village elders and local strongmen eager to protect their own interests in the face of the growing insurgency are providing the men for the new force, which will wear regular police uniforms and is meant to have 11,000 members by next year.

The auxiliary officers will receive $70 a month, the same amount the regular police receives, Zarifi said.

Gen. Nasrullah Zarifi, the commander of southern Afghanistan's police training center, asked cadets at the end of their training in Kandahar to swear on Islam's holy book that they will serve their country and not harass its people. The fear of God is Zarifi's only leverage.

"They swear on the holy Quran that they will behave when they go to their home districts," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

First Time As Tragedy, Second As A Musical (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0098306

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

First came the books, then the television docudramas and feature-length films. And now "Enron: The Musical." Opening on Friday on a stage way, way off Broadway — at Lambert Hall in Houston — the revue is a send-up of the rise and fall of the infamous energy company.

In two acts, six local actors each play up to 10 roles, including those of the former chief executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, and the former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow. The songs are show-tune parodies — "Thank Heaven for Off The Books Deals," for example, instead of "Thank Heaven for Little Girls." The writer-director-producer is Mark Fraser, whose day job is selling janitorial supplies.

"I did a lot of research because even though it's satire I wanted it to be factually correct," said Mr. Fraser, adding that his sources included the memo in which an Enron vice president, Sherron S. Watkins, warned Mr. Lay about its accounting.

"A lot of the stuff in the play people will think I made up because it's so ludicrous," Mr. Fraser said. "But it's actually all true." KATE MURPHY

WHAT'S IN HIS WALLET It's great to be honored by one's peers, but even better to be paid top dollar. Richard D. Fairbank, the founder, chairman and chief executive of Capital One Financial, is enjoying both. He will be given the 2006 Banker of the Year Award on Thursday.

American Banker, the daily financial industry newspaper and sponsor of the award, says it is recognizing Mr. Fairbank for making credit more accessible, transforming lending practices and diversifying his bank's balance sheet.

Not that Mr. Fairbank need worry about his personal balance sheet. Last year, he was paid an eye-catching $249 million, making him the second-highest-paid executive in America, after only the home-shopping-channel magnate Barry Diller, according to the Corporate Library, a firm that examines executive compensation. ELIZABETH OLSON

BOARDROOM MULLIGAN Why should corporate directors be expected to monitor how executives handle stock options if they can't keep track of their own?

At Bally Total Fitness, five directors failed to notice that a deadline loomed last year for them to exercise all of their options on Bally stock. Then in December, Bally "erroneously permitted" two directors, James F. McAnally and J. Kenneth Looloian, to exercise options, according to a proxy statement filed last week. Dr. McAnally received $8,246 and Mr. Looloian $7,554.

After that misstep, the board blamed the directors' collective oversight on an "administrative error" and, in March, handed out $63,000 more in cash for then-worthless options held by the five directors — all of them members of the board's compensation committee.

John W. Rogers Jr. received $26,100; Eric Langshur, the only one of the five still on Bally's board, $16,500; Barry Deutsch, $14,300; Mr. Looloian, an additional $3,396; and Dr. McAnally, an additional $2,704. PATRICK McGEEHAN

STOCKS AND BOND Just how evil are short-sellers? Ask James Bond.

In the new Bond movie, "Casino Royale," an odious villain — Le Chiffre, portrayed by the Danish actor Mads Mikkelsen — tries to make $100 million by short-selling a stock, then forcing the company into bankruptcy by blowing up its prototype product. Bond, played by Daniel Craig, foils the plot.

Along the way, the movie indicates that short-selling was somehow related to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, an idea raised at the time but never substantiated.

A generation ago, Bond villains plotted to start nuclear wars or to obtain world domination. Now they kill just to make a killing in the stock market. FLOYD NORRIS

NOT ON THE BLOCK Age may have slowed A. Alfred Taubman, the shopping mall tycoon and patron of the arts, but it has not dimmed his passion for business. The auction business, in particular.

Mr. Taubman, 82, pooh-poohed rumors that his recent sale of a controlling stake in Sotheby's means that he might quit the company entirely. (In 2001, a New York jury convicted Mr. Taubman of conspiring with a competitor, Christie's, to fix art-sale commissions. He spent 101/2 months in jail.)

"We have no plans for that," he said recently, dismissing talk of a sale. "We love the company. I went to prison for them." C. J. SATTERWHITE

AND THEY'RE OFF When the Museum of Modern Art announced the opening of its new education and research building in Midtown Manhattan last week, its patron, the retired investor Lewis B. Cullman, used the opportunity to speak up for his favorite cause — and his favorite candidates.

"I worry education has been put on the back burner," he said. "Every middle-class person I speak to has the same concern: 'I want to give my kids a good education, but I can't afford it.' "

To address the issue, Mr. Cullman said he would support Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa for president in 2008 and Gen. Wesley K. Clark, the retired NATO commander, for vice president.

DOJ_NMG_0098307

The Museum of Modern Art celebrates the opening of the Lewis B. and Dorothy Cullman Education and Research Building on Tuesday. JANE L. LEVERE

Peer Pressure: Inflating Executive Pay (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

LIKE Lake Wobegon, Garrison Keillor's fictitious Minnesota town where all the children are above average, executive compensation practices often assume that corporate managers are equally superlative. When shareholders question lush pay, they are invariably met with a laundry list of reasons that businesses use to justify such packages. Among that data, no item is more crucial than the "peer group," a collection of companies that corporations measure themselves against when calculating compensation.

But according to a handful of pay experts who are privy to the design of pay practices at the nation's largest corporations, many of these peer groups are populated with companies that are anything but comparable. They also say corporate managers themselves — who have an interest in higher pay — are selecting which companies make it into a peer group. And because these companies are often inappropriate for comparison purposes, their use has helped inflate executive pay in recent years.

"The peer group is the bedrock of the compensation philosophy at a company," said James F. Reda, an independent compensation consultant in New York. "But a lot of people do it by the seat of their pants, and that is part of the reason why executive pay has really skyrocketed."

The use of peer groups to calculate executive pay has become ubiquitous in recent years. This is partly in response to the Securities and Exchange Commission's requirement that companies compare their stock performance with a peer group in tables in the section of their proxy filings devoted to shareholder returns. Theoretically, these tables allow investors to compare their company's performance against objective benchmarks.

But as is true with much about executive pay, details about exactly how peer groups are compiled have been kept under wraps. The worry among investors, of course, is that executives, consultants and directors simply cherry-pick peer-group members, thereby pumping up pay packages.

Current disclosure rules require neither the identification of companies in a compensation-related peer group nor the rationale behind their selection. Usually, the most a shareholder learns about companies in a compensation peer group is that they are in the same industry or of a similar size.

This ambiguity will change when new Securities and Exchange Commission disclosure rules go into effect on Dec. 15. The rules will require a corporation to reveal which companies it uses in its peer group and to provide an extensive description of its compensation philosophy.

Under the new rules, company officials will also have to certify the accuracy of their pay disclosures. As a result, peer groups are likely to attract increased scrutiny, said Mark Van Clieaf, managing director of MVC Associates International, a consulting firm that specializes in organization design and pay-for-performance standards.

"Is benchmarking pay across companies truly comparing apples to apples?" Mr. Van Clieaf asked. "Failure to have a legally defensible process" can lead to "materially false" disclosures, he said.

POSSIBLE problems with the use of peer groups burst onto the scene in 2003, when the New York Stock Exchange disclosed that it had paid its chairman, Richard A. Grasso, about $140 million in total compensation. Amid a firestorm over the pay, Mr. Grasso resigned.

One reason for the outcry was the makeup of the peer group that the exchange's compensation committee used to determine Mr. Grasso's pay. The group included highly profitable investment banks and financial institutions that were far larger and more complex than the Big Board, which, at that time, was a nonprofit organization.

Brian J. Hall, a Harvard Business School professor and an expert on management incentive systems, conducted an analysis of Mr. Grasso's compensation and provided it to the judge overseeing the case that the New York attorney general's office filed against Mr. Grasso.

Mr. Hall, hired by the attorney general as an expert witness, found that the companies the New York Stock Exchange board used in its peer group had median revenue of $26 billion, more than 25 times that of the exchange. Median assets of companies in the group were 125 times the Big Board's assets, and the median number of employees in the peer-group companies was 50,000, or roughly 30 times that of the exchange.

The peer group was flawed, Mr. Hall contended, resulting in unreasonably high compensation for Mr. Grasso. Experts hired by Mr. Grasso concluded that his pay was, in fact, reasonable. But the judge presiding over the case ruled last month that Mr. Grasso must return as much as $100 million to the exchange. Mr. Grasso has continued to defend his pay as appropriate; earlier this month, he asked a state appeals court to block the judge from requiring him to return the money. A hearing on the matter is set for Wednesday .

DOJ_NMG_0098308

Some state pension officials have become concerned that certain companies in their portfolios may be relying on peer groups that are flawed. “Peer-group comparisons assume that job responsibilities and job skills of the peer groups are similar and they may not be,” said Denise L. Nappier, the treasurer of Connecticut and fiduciary of the state’s $23 billion Retirement Plans and Trust Funds. “The thing about looking at C.E.O. pay of competitive companies, often companies will want a C.E.O. to be paid in the top quartile of his peers. But not everyone can be above average and this tends to ratchet pay up.”

Peer groups typically appear twice in proxies: first, in portions of the reports disclosing the annual comparison of total stockholder returns at a company versus its peers, and, second, in a section devoted to the calculation of executive pay. In the pay section, shareholders are sometimes told the peer-group percentile in which their top executives’ compensation falls. Typically, the filings state that corporate executives’ pay was in the 50th or 75th percentile of the benchmark group. If an executive is in the 50th percentile, he or she is in the middle of the pack; the 75th percentile means that only one-quarter of the group is paid more.

Compensation experts note that when a majority of companies in any given industry are in the 75th compensation percentile, pay packages may be subject to the Lake Wobegon effect: that all chief executives are suddenly above average. Corporate directors argue that comparing pay practices with those of competitors is only fitting, given that those are the companies they usually look to when recruiting employees and executives. But pay critics contend that an unquestioning reliance on the use of such peer groups is too simplistic and contributes to a one-size-fits-all mentality in pay.

“Sometimes it doesn’t matter what the other guy is doing,” said Brian Foley, an independent pay consultant in White Plains. “First and foremost is what makes sense for this company. If you’re in a turnaround and you are comparing yourself to guys who never had a dip and are quite successful, it’s a question not just of comparison based on size but also based on circumstances. I think these questions are asked sometimes, but sometimes they seem to be glossed over.”

Ms. Nappier said her office was looking at how Eli Lilly used a peer group in its executive compensation practices. According to Lilly’s 2006 proxy statement, the company judges itself against a group of eight companies: Abbott Laboratories; Bristol-Myers Squibb; GlaxoSmithKline; Johnson & Johnson; Merck; Pfizer; Schering-Plough and Wyeth. Lilly’s stock underperformed the peer-group average in 2004 and 2005.

Comparing Eli Lilly with Johnson & Johnson, Ms. Nappier said, shows a stark difference, particularly when you look at the number of profit centers at J. & J. and the complexity of its business.

An official at Lilly did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Sometimes, compensation peer groups include companies that are not even in the same industry or are not of a similar size. An example is the peer group used by the Company">Ford Motor Company, which described its selection this way in its 2006 proxy: “The consultant develops compensation data using a survey of several leading companies picked by the consultant and Ford. General Motors and DaimlerChrysler were included in the survey. Twenty leading companies in other industries also were included.” Ford, however, did not identify those companies.

Ford’s proxy also stated that the peer group it used in the compensation section of its filing was larger than the peer group it used in the stock performance portion of the same filing because “the job market for executives goes beyond the auto industry.” Ford said it chose the companies based on “size, reputation and business complexity” and said that over time, its goal was to peg its pay roughly at the median of the peer group, adjusted for company size and performance.

A Ford spokeswoman, Marcey Evans, declined to comment.

Mr. Reda, the compensation consultant, has a different perspective on how Ford uses peer groups. “That is just not appropriate,” he said. “A peer group should be based on size, profit margin — financial success, perhaps — but you can’t pick a company that has 15 percent profit margins when Ford is doing 8” percent.

Ford is by no means alone in extending its peer group well beyond its industry, Mr. Reda said. He noted that about 10 years ago, big brand-name companies began measuring themselves against other household-name companies, even though they were not in the same industry. Companies that made it onto Fortune magazine’s list of “most admired companies,” for instance, began to compare their pay to others on the roster.

Never mind that the connection was irrelevant, Mr. Reda said. “The result was a lot of pay got jacked up,” he said, “because companies in low-margin industries that didn’t do too well got pay hikes because they were in the ‘most admired’ candy store.”

EVEN companies that have won kudos for corporate governance can fall prey to peer-group traps. Consider the proxy filed last month by Campbell Soup, which provides continuing education programs for its directors. The filing, made after the S.E.C.’s 2007 proxy rules were issued but before they took effect, noted that its compensation committee compared total pay levels at 29 companies "in the food and consumer products industries with which Campbell competes for attraction and retention of talent." Campbell's compensation committee approved the companies in the peer group but did not identify them.

DOJ_NMG_0098309

In computing Campbell's total shareholder return, however, the company did not use the 29-company pay peer group as a benchmark. Instead, it used the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and the S.& P. 500 Packaged Foods Index, a subset of the S.& P. 500 that consists of only 11 companies, including Campbell. The company outperformed both benchmarks last year.

The use of dueling peer groups — one to measure stockholder return, another to calibrate executive pay — is common in corporate America. But Paul Hodgson, author of "Building Value Through Compensation," questions the practice. "Best practice would dictate that, if a compensation committee report is to include a graph showing the company's relative performance to peers, those peers should be the same as the group actually used to test performance," he wrote in his book.

Anthony J. Sanzio, a Campbell Soup spokesman, said: "In terms of recruitment, we believe the landscape needs to be broader to attract and retain the best talent. For talent, we compete with a much broader group of companies that are much larger." Mr. Sanzio declined to identify the 29 companies in the peer group but said Coca-Cola, Anheuser-Busch, Procter & Gamble and Johnson & Johnson were among them.

Mr. Van Clieaf, the compensation consultant, said the composition of peer groups is usually more heavily weighted to larger companies, even though corporations typically look to companies smaller than themselves when they are recruiting top executives. This reality calls into question the oft-heard argument that outsized pay is based on market forces and that because companies have to jockey for the very best, enormous compensation deals are reasonable.

"Where would you really go to look for talent," Mr. Van Clieaf asked. "Either at the second or third layer down at bigger companies or the No. 1 role at smaller companies. Do you really think the C.E.O. of Johnson & Johnson is going to go to work at Eli Lilly?"

Even so, the pay handed out to executives at smaller companies — or to lower-level managers at larger concerns — are rarely included in peer groups, compensation experts and analysts say. Consider the pay awarded to the former Hewlett-Packard chief executive, Carleton S. Fiorina, which was based on a peer-group analysis. Although Hewlett hired Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive of the data processing giant NCR to succeed Ms. Fiorina as chief executive in 2005, Hewlett never included NCR in its peer group when calculating Ms. Fiorina's compensation, according to Mr. Van Clieaf.

In fact, Mr. Van Clieaf said, Mr. Hurd's pay while at NCR pay was 40 percent of Ms. Fiorina's compensation at Hewlett. If Hewlett had included NCR in its peer group — thus adding Mr. Hurd's lower compensation into the mix — Ms. Fiorina's compensation would have wound up in a far higher percentile of the peer group than the median percentile that Hewlett reported, Mr. Van Clieaf said.

THIS year, Hewlett-Packard changed its peer group from a so-called blended one that included technology concerns as well as those from other industries, to a group that is limited to technology companies alone. They are I.B.M., Dell, Apple Computer, Cisco Systems, Electronic Data Systems, EMC, Intel, Lexmark International, Microsoft, Motorola, Oracle, Sun Microsystems and Xerox.

"This ensures that the cost structures that we create will enable us to remain competitive in our markets," Hewlett's 2006 filing said of its switch.

While Hewlett also noted in the filing that it believed that the design of its compensation plan was appropriate, it — like Campbell and Ford — used a different set of companies to compare its stock performance for shareholders. This shareholder peer group does not contain Intel, Oracle or Cisco. The company declined to comment further.

In the meantime, analysts say, compensation practices continue to be built on the same cheery performance assumptions found at Lake Wobegon.

"I think it is safe to say that in various situations the peer-group analysis has been soft," said Mr. Foley, the compensation consultant. "And because it's been soft, the determinations made about pay have been somewhat soft as well."

The High Cost Of Too Good To Be True (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

AS the red-hot California real estate market sizzled in recent years, National Consumer Mortgage looked like just another residential mortgage company successfully riding the boom. It had lush offices in downtown Orange; the former baseball great Steve Garvey promoted its products in radio spots; and its founder, Salvatore Favata, a former local baseball hero himself, lived in a $1.7 million mansion in tony Yorba Linda and zipped around in a Mercedes roadster. An annual "Favata Fest" at the founder's home featured live music and photo ops with Mr. Garvey.

The little mortgage company was also ambitious. N.C.M. ran an investment arm that offered high-yielding notes to preferred clients, promising to use customers' funds to make short-term, high-interest loans to individuals and companies that needed money quickly. For customers like Bryan F. Downey, a 41-year-old father of three, it was a tantalizing pitch. Mr. Downey had a $125,000 inheritance that he wanted to put to work, and his younger brother had already invested his inheritance with N.C.M.

DOJ_NMG_0098310

In April 2005, Mr. Downey invested the entire $125,000 in N.C.M. notes guaranteeing annual interest payments of 12.5 percent for two years. After the contracts were signed, Mr. Downey recalls, Mr. Favata, 46, tan and trim, glided into the conference room, which had a view of Angel Stadium, nearby in Anaheim. Mr. Favata greeted him like an old friend and shook his hand, saying, "Welcome to the family." It's a relationship Mr. Downey now wishes he could disown.

Earlier this spring, Mr. Downey, along with more than 200 others living mostly in California and Colorado, found out they were victims of a long-running Ponzi scheme that pulled in about $30 million before N.C.M. sought bankruptcy this spring, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission civil complaint and filings in a federal criminal case, both filed in United States District Court for the Central District of California in Santa Ana. Rather than using the money to make loans, authorities say, Mr. Favata wagered away about $10 million of it in Las Vegas and plowed through much of the rest in his business dealings and lavish lifestyle.

The N.C.M. scheme, of course, is hardly novel. It is not even all that big by recent standards. But it bears all the hallmarks that have made financial scams possible for generations: naïve trust, a speculative market offering seemingly easy riches, and gilded lures hitched to people's unending desire to keep up with the Joneses. So why is it that year after year, century after century, certain people fall for financial dodges, regardless of their provenance?

"You would think living in an information age it would be easier for people to sort out the fact that these schemes exist," says James H. Burrus, assistant director with the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Washington. "But so much information is available and coming at people at different ways that the fraudsters are much better at adapting to the environment to defraud the victims out their money.

"People believe their next-door neighbor is investing in property, flipping it and getting rich quick," Mr. Burrus added. "Everybody seems to be doing it. Fraudsters take advantage of those types of cycles."

But con artists don't use greed alone. Analysts say a variety of factors come into play when scams are afoot, many of which revolve around a fear of financial and emotional vulnerability — concerns about not having saved enough to send your children to college; the isolation and loneliness of the elderly; the stress that accompanies career changes; or the loss of a loved one.

MONEY, especially fast money, offers a buffer of sorts in an uncertain world. And con artists are only too happy to wear the guise of the market sage or guardian angel.

"The best scams start with a kernel of truth that are ripped right out of the headlines," explained Joseph P. Borg, director of the Alabama Securities Commission and president of the North American Securities Administrators Association. "Oil prices are up. There's a war in Afghanistan and Iraq. Tainted spinach. All of these can spawn frauds."

Faced with the opportunity to invest on the ground floor of something completely plausible and, better yet, exclusive, some jump in with both feet. "It's a combination of greed and a feeling of, 'If somebody is going to make money, why not me?' " Mr. Borg said.

The inner workings of the N.C.M. scheme, which snared wealthy professionals as well as retirees on fixed incomes, suggest that the common perception that only the elderly, less sophisticated or less well-off investors can be duped may be flawed — that a large cross-section of society can be swindled out of large sums.

Mr. Favata used existing investors, to whom he was faithfully making interest payments, to recruit their friends and family members. The promised returns were not so outsize as to raise the suspicions of more sophisticated investors. Payments, which came monthly or quarterly, lulled many into believing that their investments were safe and solid — at least for a while.

"They were really slick in how they presented themselves, how they looked, even where the building was located," recalled Mr. Downey, who attended college for two years and now licenses consumer products for a private company. "They looked like they were making lots of money and that they had lots of good investors."

Mr. Favata, who struck a plea deal with prosecutors in the federal district court in Santa Ana, declined to comment. "Mr. Favata has fully accepted responsibility for his actions," said his lawyer, Nathan J. Hochman, from Beverly Hills. "He is completely cooperating with federal and state authorities and will devote the rest of his life toward paying back the people he has taken money from."

Regulators have not accused Mr. Garvey of wrongdoing, and he does not appear to have invested in the scheme. Messages left for him with his agent were not returned.

Experts say that for those caught up in financial scams, especially schemes similar to the one Mr. Favata has acknowledged engineering at N.C.M., the early stages are exhilarating and therefore magnetic. Indeed, until the moment investors finally absorb the fact that they may have been duped and their money gone forever, speculating on a "sure thing" has all of the warm and fuzzy benefits of a freewheeling joy ride.

DOJ_NMG_0098311

In its purest form, being involved in a bogus get-rich-quick scheme is like a trip to Disneyland, says Anthony Pratkanis, a psychology professor at the University of California, Santa Cruz, and co-author of "Weapons of Fraud: A Source Book for Fraud Fighters." Professor Pratkanis equates being taken in by a fraud to riding the Pirates of the Caribbean attraction.

"You're experiencing the ride, singing, 'Yo ho ho! It's a pirate's life for me,' but you never see any of the trappings of the ride itself," he said. "Criminals call it, 'putting the victim under the ether.' "

In other words, once they have taken the bait, victims typically stop asking questions. While there are various estimates of how many people are taken in by cons and how much money they lose, experts and law enforcement authorities acknowledge that their best guesses are just that. The F.B.I., for instance, believes that more than $1 billion was lost to mortgage fraud last year. While that number seems substantial, experts note that it represents a minute fraction of the $3 trillion in mortgages issued last year.

There may never be a comprehensive tally of fraud, in large part because it is one of the most underreported crimes, authorities say. Some victims deny, even to themselves, that they have been defrauded, while others are simply too embarrassed to tell anyone. No demographic group is immune to fraud, and sophisticated con artists tailor their pitches to their audience.

A younger victim may be motivated by a rich payday, while the elderly appear to fall for schemes that claim to involve the government or a charity, said Sid Kirchheimer, author of "Scam-Proof Your Life," a book published by AARP.

"None of them say they wanted to get rich," Mr. Kirchheimer said of the elderly he counsels through his work at AARP. "They tell me that their grandson wants to go to college and they wanted to help him — at least that's what they tell me."

Fraud operators are also deft at using middlemen to become associated with a community group or religious organization. The authorities label these schemes "affinity frauds," because they take in people who have a common interest.

"Whether in a religious group or any other community-based organization, all you may need to do is scam one person very aggressively, in hope that this 'centerpoint' will start peddling the scheme to other members," said John Reed Stark, chief of the office of Internet enforcement at the S.E.C. "The centerpoint may not even profit or be at all complicit in the scheme, but he or she nonetheless becomes an important part of the overall con."

ONE investment pitch under investigation occurred in Indianapolis and involved Robert Penn, who owned several property management and real estate businesses and cut a charming figure in the community. Mr. Penn has been accused in a lawsuit — filed in Marion County Circuit Court in Indianapolis by the mortgage giant Countrywide Financial and other lenders — of orchestrating a scheme to use straw buyers to file hundreds of fraudulent mortgages worth upwards of $40 million.

In a response filed in court, Mr. Penn denied the allegations; he and his lawyers did not return phone calls seeking comment. Countrywide is contending that Mr. Penn and his associates sold it overpriced mortgages they took out in the names of his investors. Federal prosecutors are looking into the allegations.

Mr. Penn came across as savvy and self-assured, yet always concerned for the well-being of those around him, recall people who worked and invested with him. One of those people was Cynthia K. Hancock, who met Mr. Penn through her former colleagues in 2003.

Ms. Hancock, then an aide at an animal research lab at the Indiana University School of Medicine, describes herself as unsophisticated about finance and real estate. "I don't carry a Coach handbag; I have never had a manicure," she said. "I have just worked all my life and paid my bills. That's why I had such a great credit score. I thought for once my credit score could help me get a little ahead."

Ms. Hancock said Mr. Penn told her — as well as many individuals in rural Virginia, where his sister lived and his mother served as a lay minister to a small congregation — that their credit scores could help them make money the way rich people do: in real estate.

To Ms. Hancock and the others who heard the stories of easy money in real estate or read them in newspapers, it was a credible pitch. All they had to do was put their names on multiple mortgage applications, thereby "investing" their credit scores, they said Mr. Penn told them. The borrowers saw little downside; they were not asked to put any money down. They said Mr. Penn told them that he and his business associates would do that on each borrower's behalf.

When some received a check for several thousand dollars, it seemed that the investment was paying off as it was billed. Then, they said, they discovered that they were on the hook for hundreds of thousands of dollars in inflated mortgages taken out on homes in Indiana, some of them in rundown neighborhoods. Ms. Hancock, who worked at Mr. Penn's property management company for a year and a half, owned five homes. Her daughter — a law student — was named as the buyer for four homes. All of the homes have been foreclosed on, and Ms. Hancock and her daughter are considering filing for bankruptcy protection.

DOJ_NMG_0098312

IN hindsight, it is easy to see where Mr. Penn's investors made their mistakes: they were hurried through paperwork and did not read what they were signing. No one asked to see the properties they were buying or pressed for confirmation that rents were being collected and mortgages were being paid. And the investors said Mr. Penn also tapped into key vulnerabilities, particularly those among the largely African-American, working-class investor group in Virginia. By investing in real estate, they said he told them, they could start to close the financial gap between them and white middle-class investors.

Many investors also dropped their guards because Mr. Penn's family, and his mother in particular, were viewed as religious leaders in the area. Spirituality and predatory practices never intermingle, investors believed.

"The whole basis of church affiliation is a sense of morality," Mr. Kirchheimer said. "Your natural resistance, your armor will probably be a little less because you are assuming people there are more moral."

Establishing — and ultimately violating — a bond of trust is at the heart of many frauds, whether it comes through a religious affiliation or a longstanding business relationship.

If there was one person whom Melissa A. Miller of Parker, Colo., thought she could trust, it was Robert O. Bryant, a friend and her insurance agent for 10 years. When Ms. Miller sold her dental practice in 2005, she said, she was not sure what to do with her money.

A fairly conservative investor, she said she was skeptical when Mr. Bryant first told her about Mr. Favata's private notes. She talked with her friends in the real estate business as well as her father, who owned rental property and had experience with similar instruments, eventually concluding that the notes were a safe bet because the properties served as collateral.

Ms. Miller, 39, and her husband, Sam, an airline pilot, who have three daughters and a son, invested $575,000 in N.C.M. notes. She recruited her father, Dennly R. Becker, and he invested $250,000. Aside from the few interest payments they received, the father and daughter believe that most of that money is lost.

"Yes, I am embarrassed," Ms. Miller said. "I am ashamed that I got my family involved in this. But it could absolutely happen to everybody.

"They seemed so trustworthy," Ms. Miller said of Mr. Favata and Mr. Bryant, "which is what got everybody.

"They were knowledgeable," she added. "They had every answer to every question you could ask about this scheme."

OR almost every answer. John P. Brincko, a management consultant advising the creditors committee in N.C.M.'s bankruptcy, said that none of the investors, to his knowledge, asked to see the deeds of trust that ostensibly backed their investments. Ms. Miller said that she asked to see them several times, but that Mr. Bryant rebuffed her with excuses: the deeds would be available after the loans had been made; he would pick up the deeds when he visited Mr. Favata next; and, just before the scheme collapsed, he said he had forgotten to bring them back from California.

Mr. Bryant has not been charged with any crime. He did not respond to an interview request and is listed in N.C.M.'s bankruptcy filing as having lost close to $1 million of his own money.

In October, Mr. Favata agreed to plead guilty to one count of mail fraud in exchange for a five-year sentence, a $250,000 fine and repayment of more than $20 million to the victims, all of which is still to be approved by a judge. But it is unclear whether the victims will receive much beyond pennies on the dollar. His mansion in Yorba Linda will be sold to pay victims, but he appears to have few other hard assets, the authorities say. The Mercedes roadster and a Lincoln Town Car that he drove, for instance, were leased by N.C.M.

Brent G. Tabacchi, an assistant United States attorney based in Santa Ana, said the investigation was continuing but that the prosecutors had decided to settle with Mr. Favata because, among other reasons, he turned himself in, gave up his assets and agreed to a restitution plan.

But for the victims of fraud, there are some losses that can never be repaid.

"I lost a lot of faith in human beings — I will really not trust someone with my money now," said Mr. Downey, who regrets losing his father's money. "He worked hard to become middle class, he left us a nice home that we sold, and we all got taken in by a clown in Orange County.

"I foolishly fell for this because I went into their beautiful building that was overlooking Angel Stadium," he added. "They even promised me box seats."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DeFazio Macing A Relic Of Old Style Of Pa. Corruption (PTR)

By Mike Wereschagin And Justin Vellucci, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098313

Former Allegheny County Sheriff Pete DeFazio's guilty plea to a misdemeanor macing charge is one of the last gasps of old machine-style politics that ruled Pennsylvania for a century, political experts say.

Macing -- the once-common practice of forcing public employees to contribute to political campaigns -- nearly vanished during the last 30 years or so. Macing was forced out by the rise of civil-service rules, unions and a public no longer willing to subsidize political paybacks, say experts.

The practices that snared DeFazio and three others in the Sheriff's Office are the same as those that powered the careers of people such as Gov. George Howard Earle III, who was indicted for macing in the 1930s, and Westmoreland County political boss Egidio Cerilli, who went to prison in 1980 for extortion and conspiracy.

"Human nature is such that corrupt individuals are always going to find a way to work the system. I think people can take some comfort in the fact that nowadays, people don't get away with it as much as they did in the old days," said former Pennsylvania Gov. and U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh.

DeFazio's plea Tuesday marked the end of a five-year investigation of the Sheriff's Office by U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan. Two high ranking officials -- including DeFazio's chief deputy, Dennis Skosnik -- are serving time in federal prisons and another is on a year's probation. DeFazio will be sentenced Feb. 23, though he is not expected to get jail time.

The investigation centered on officials who pressured workers to buy tickets to DeFazio's fund-raisers. Those who didn't were punished with undesirable assignments or denied vacation requests.

"Really, the sad part about the sheriff is he probably didn't think he was doing anything wrong," said former county Chief Executive Jim Roddey, who clashed repeatedly with DeFazio over budget and management issues when the two shared the County Courthouse.

Were DeFazio sheriff 40 years ago, he probably would have gotten away with it, said G. Terry Madonna, political science professor at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster County.

"That was a real common practice in courthouses around the state," Madonna said. "Courthouse gangs" of county officials ran Pennsylvania's local governments from around the end of the Civil War until the 1960s, he said.

Those who wanted a government job needed a local ward chairman's approval. Then they had to give as much as 6 percent of their salaries to the ruling party's campaign coffers, Madonna said.

Party chairmen who were successful macers in county governments sometimes were given a chance to ply their trade at the state level.

Then-Gov. Milton Shapp appointed Cerilli to run PennDOT, which was "a cesspool of corruption," said Thornburgh, who as U.S. attorney in Pittsburgh prosecuted Cerilli on extortion and conspiracy charges in the late 1970s. Thornburgh won the governor's office in 1979.

"The reason I was elected was I had a track record dealing effectively with public corruption. People were concerned about it," said Thornburgh, who became the first governor in decades to avoid a major corruption scandal in his administration.

Several high-ranking officials in the state Legislature and elected state row officers were indicted for corruption during his tenure. The most famous was R.Budd Dwyer, a state treasurer who was found guilty of accepting a bribe and shot himself in the head during a televised news conference the day before he was to be sentenced.

"The tide kind of turned when it was clear that these kinds of activities weren't going to be tolerated," Thornburgh said. Prosecutors were emboldened to go after crooked politicians by a series of federal laws enacted in 1967, including one that allowed public-corruption cases to be prosecuted like racketeering cases.

"Parties became weaker. Unions got a toe-hold in municipal government," and civil-service rules became more widely used, Madonna said.

Many current politicians came of age while watching high-profile officials, such as former state Auditor General Al Benedict, go to jail, Roddey said. Benedict was sentenced to six years in prison in 1988 for tax evasion and racketeering.

"People that have gotten elected in the last few years are not part of that old machine," Roddey said.

In the 1970s, the Justice Department called Pennsylvania the most corrupt state. The department doesn't rank state corruption anymore, but a newsletter called "Corporate Crime Reporter" ranked Pennsylvania as the 14th most corrupt in 2004, based on the number of public-corruption convictions per 100,000 people.

Most corruption today involves politicians enriching themselves, rather than a political machine, said Nils Frederickson, spokesman for state Attorney General Tom Corbett. Instead of employees paying for a job, it's contractors and lobbyists.

"The glory days of Tammany Hall and other things like that -- maybe they have, indeed, gone the way of the dinosaur," Frederickson said. "That doesn't mean there aren't a few dinosaurs still wandering around."

The number of corruption cases nationwide rose sharply in the last six years, as the FBI increased the number of agents in its public-corruption task force from 358 in 2002 to 618 this year. Convictions rose from 584 in 2002 to 759 in 2005, according to the FBI. Of the number of public-corruption convictions this year, roughly 258 -- or 34 percent -- involved local-level government officials.

DOJ_NMG_0098314

Pennsylvania Common Cause Executive Director Barry Kauffman won't say whether he believes macing is becoming less common.

"To what degree something is common or not common -- you're kind of playing with fire there," Kauffman said. "What's 'common?' Is it 10 percent? Is it 80 percent?

"One case of corruption's too much."

Getting About The Business Of Fighting Crime (MCA)

By Michael Kelley Contact

Memphis Commercial Appeal, November 26, 2006

The Memphis business community is "looking for a good old-fashioned business plan" that sets priorities on how to deploy resources and "move the needle on crime, violent crime in particular," says Blair Taylor, executive director of the business group Memphis Tomorrow.

To that end, an invited group of stakeholders on the crime-fighting front will conduct a summit Wednesday at the University of Memphis Holiday Inn to plot the implementation of a wide-ranging strategic plan.

It's not that Memphis and Shelby County haven't already been employing strategies to battle crime that go beyond routine law enforcement and prosecutorial tasks.

There's Project Safe Neighborhoods, a coordinated effort by federal and state officials to crack down on the possession of guns by convicted felons. There's the Crime Stoppers cash award program for tipsters. There's Blue Crush, a data-based, crime-mapping program that tells police where to deploy.

The district attorney general has a no-deals policy. There are various juvenile court programs involving volunteer probation officers and the like, a drug treatment court for nonviolent cases, public nuisance laws, anti-gang units, a multi-jurisdictional drug task force -- the list goes on.

Presumably, all those elements and others will find their way into Operation: Safe Community's strategic crime-fighting plan, which as of its most recent revision, included 15 strategies:

Expand data-driven police deployment, an extension of the Blue Crush program developed by Memphis police and University of Memphis professor Richard Janikowski that sends extra police officers to crime hot spots.

Expand effective law enforcement partnerships using as a model Project Safe Neighborhood.

Toughen Tennessee laws dealing with illegal possession of firearms and gang-related violence.

Expand vertical prosecution of serious offenders -- assigning a single attorney to handle every step of a case as it makes its way through the system rather than using the current assembly-line approach.

Strengthen and expand the Shelby County Drug Court, now operating at about half capacity.

Design and implement a comprehensive gang intervention strategy that builds on the U.S. Justice Department's gang initiative.

Improve school safety, one part of a larger plan to design and implement a comprehensive youth violence intervention initiative.

Reduce truancy, another youth violence initiative that would start with a district attorney general's office pilot program under way at three Memphis middle schools.

Youth violence intervention, a comprehensive and coordinated approach to working with at-risk youth using various community resources.

A juvenile offender re-entry program aimed at reducing repeat offenses that would build on programs already in place at Juvenile Court.

Expand and coordinate adult offender re-entry programs to reduce repeat offenses of violent crime.

Establish a proactive, coordinated "problem properties" system to reduce crime by addressing neighborhood blight.

Develop a communication campaign that reinforces the message that there are tough consequences for committing crimes.

Implement a new domestic violence initiative.

Implement a local version of the Fugitive Safe Surrender program, developed in Cleveland, which allows suspects accused of committing nonviolent crimes to turn themselves in at a church.

The Commercial Appeal plans to examine each element of the plan in a series of articles to be published over the next several months. The list may change as the plan continues to develop. But the overarching goal will be the same: to reduce the crime rate and ease fears about crime that have contributed to middle-class flight and the city's image problems on the national stage.

DOJ_NMG_0098315

These are trends that can't be turned around on a moment's notice. But organizers hope that the "business plan" on the table this Wednesday will be the catalyst to set positive change in motion.

Federal Crime Survey To Include SB County (SBCS)

By Jeff Horwitz, Staff Writer

San Bernardino County (CA) Sun, November 26, 2006

San Bernardino County is one of 18 areas chosen last week to be part of a federal program seeking to stem a nationwide rise in violent crime.

The Initiative for Safer Communities, sponsored by the Department of Justice, intends to "seek honest answers about what works, what doesn't, and why," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a speech last month before announcing the 18 target jurisdictions.

According to state crime data, the San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department documented increases in homicide, rape, and aggravated assault between January and June compared with the same period last year. Violent crime rose by 5.9 percent in that six-month stretch.

During that same time period, sheriff's departments in Los Angeles, Riverside and San Diego counties reported overall decreases in violent crime.

But San Bernardino County was not included based solely on its increasing crime. Other jurisdictions in California, such as Sacramento County, saw far greater increases in violent crime but were not included. Rather, the jurisdictions were chosen because they "represent a cross-section of the country in terms of size, geographic location and rate of violent crime," according to a statement from the Justice Department.

Sheriff's spokeswoman Cindy Beavers said it was likely that the diversity of her department's operations drew federal attention.

"We have so many different areas to deal with, from cities like Rancho Cucamonga to the Colorado River," Beavers said. "The Sheriff's Department has so many resources, we are able to support other resources that are much smaller within our county."

The program is slated to begin immediately. In a series of surveys and meetings with local law-enforcement departments, officials say, the Department of Justice will review problems such as the spread of gangs and the distribution of methamphetamine. The Department of Justice will then document successful approaches to tackling them, with the goal of developing better practices.

The program's launch follows a slight increase in violent crime nationwide after a decade of gradual decline. Between 2004 and 2005, the last full year Department of Justice data is available, violent crime rose 1.3 percent.

"Even a small up-tick in violent crime cannot be ignored, especially when we have made such great progress," Gonzales said in the speech announcing the program.

Hampton Roads One Of 18 Metro Areas In U.S. Crime Study (VP)

Virginian-Pilot, November 26, 2006

Hampton Roads is one of 18 metropolitan areas the government has selected to study for clues on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally.

The Justice Department study comes after FBI data in September showed violent criminal activity - including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault - rose by 2.2 percent from last year. That marked the first increase since 2001.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the study last month in Boston at a meeting of police chiefs and other law enforcement officials.

It will be rolled out in three phases: looking at crime increases in cities, analyzing those results for any trends and identifying federal programs that can help.

It was not clear whether more federal money will be available for cities, but federal officials said new initiatives could be created if necessary.

Locally, homicides were up in four of the five South Hampton Roads cities - Chesapeake being the exception - and aggravated assaults were up in all five between 2004 and 2005.

The trends with other violent crimes were mixed.

Amanda Howie, spokeswoman for Norfolk Commonwealth's Attorney Jack Doyle, said Friday that if the Justice Department contacts Doyle's office about the study, he will contribute what he can.

DOJ_NMG_0098316

"It appears the idea here is to understand what has happened in order to prevent repeat performances," she said. "That's a concept we could support."

In addition to Hampton Roads, the cities and regions participating in the study are: Atlanta; Boston; Charlotte, N.C.; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Columbus, Ohio; Hartford, Conn.; Houston; Jersey City, N.J.; Kansas City, Mo.; Miami; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Nashville, Tenn.; Oklahoma City; Omaha, Neb.; Portland, Ore.; San Bernardino County, Calif.; and San Diego.

The Associated Press and staff writers Matthew Jones and Michelle Washington contributed to this report.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NAACP Wants FBI Probe Of Shooting (MOULTO)

By Kevin Hall

Moultrie (GA) Observer, November 26, 2006

MOULTRIE — A state leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on Saturday came to Moultrie and questioned accounts of the fatal shooting of Moultrian Willie James Banks.

Banks, who was shot by police Nov. 16, was buried Saturday afternoon, and the president of the NAACP's Georgia State Conference held a press conference prior to the funeral service.

Edward Dubose said the NAACP is beginning its own investigation into the events that surrounded Banks' death, and the organization calls for action on the parts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Justice Department, the District Attorney's Office and the City of Moultrie police chief.

Banks, 43, who was mentally deficient, was working at a convenience store on First Avenue at Fifth Street Southeast when three Moultrie police officers arrived to arrest him in connection with a bench warrant. The officers said Banks resisted arrest, pulled a knife and ran toward one of them. One or more of the officers fired at Banks; he was hit three times in the chest.

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation is still investigating the incident, but Dubose expressed doubts Saturday about the officers' version of events.

"We are not convinced by the alleged statement of police officers that Willie J. Banks brandished a knife and ran towards police officers," Dubose said. "We are also not convinced that police officers felt that their lives were in danger prompting them to shoot and kill Willie J. Banks."

Dubose said Banks had no reputation for violence, and he said he would even be unlikely to disobey an officer.

"This was not ever a violent man," Dubose said.

Dubose said the NAACP is calling on the FBI and Justice Department to investigate the shooting as an excessive and unnecessary use of deadly force. It also wants the district attorney's office to convene a grand jury inquiry into the incident.

In addition, Dubose said, Moultrie Police Chief Frank Lang has avenues open to him that he has not explored, including an independent investigation to see if the officers' actions followed department policy and procedures.

"He doesn't have to take a complete hands-off [approach]," he said.

Pointing to the recent shooting of a 92-year-old woman by police in Atlanta, Dubose urged black people to stand up to police brutality.

"Today as Willie J. Banks is laid to rest our message is clear," he said. "We will not allow the continued shooting of innocent blacks by law enforcement officers for no other reason than being black."

Experts Concerned As Ballot Problems Persist (NYT)

By Ian Urbina, Christopher Drew

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

After six years of technological research, more than $4 billion spent by Washington on new machinery and a widespread overhaul of the nation's voting system, this month's midterm election revealed that the country is still far from able to ensure that every vote counts.

Tens of thousands of voters, scattered across more than 25 states, encountered serious problems at the polls, including failures in sophisticated new voting machines and confusion over new identification rules, according to interviews with election experts and officials.

In many places, the difficulties led to shortages of substitute paper ballots and long lines that caused many voters to leave without casting ballots. Still, an association of top state election officials concluded that for the most part, voting went as smoothly as expected.

DOJ_NMG_0098317

Over the last three weeks, attention has been focused on a few close races affected by voting problems, including those in Florida and Ohio where counting dragged on for days. But because most of this year's races were not close, election experts say voting problems may actually have been wider than initially estimated, with many malfunctions simply overlooked.

That oversight may not be possible in the presidential election of 2008, when turnout will be higher and every vote will matter in what experts say will probably be a close race.

Voting experts say it is impossible to say how many votes were not counted that should have been. But in Florida alone, the discrepancies reported across Sarasota County and three others amount to more than 60,000 votes. In Colorado, as many as 20,000 people gave up trying to vote, election officials say, as new online systems for verifying voter registrations crashed repeatedly. And in Arkansas, election officials tallied votes three times in one county, and each time the number of ballots cast changed by more than 30,000.

"If the success of an election is to be measured according to whether each voter's voice is heard, then we would have to conclude that this past election was not entirely a success," said Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, a nonpartisan election group that plans to release a report Wednesday with a state-by-state assessment of voting. "In places where the margin of victory was bigger than the margin of error, we looked away from the problems, but in 2008 we might not have that luxury."

Accusations of missing ballots and vote stuffing were not uncommon with mechanical voting machines. But election experts say that with electronic voting machines, the potential consequences of misdeeds or errors are of a greater magnitude. A single software error can affect thousands of votes, especially with machines that keep no paper record.

There were a few signs of progress this month. Several states that faced computer difficulties in the primaries fixed the kinks by Election Day and were better stocked with backup paper ballots. Fears that more stringent identification laws in Indiana and Arizona would create confusion at the polls did not pan out.

And though recent test runs of new computerized voter registration rolls in Indiana and Missouri revealed large numbers of errors, on Election Day reports of problems with the databases were few and isolated. The National Association of Secretaries of States, which represents top election officials from across the country, has said Nov. 7 was generally "a good day."

But some of the biggest states have not been able to overcome problems with new technology or rules and the lightly trained poll workers who must oversee them. In Ohio, thousands of voters were turned away or forced to file provisional ballots by poll workers puzzled by voter-identification rules. In Pennsylvania, the machines crashed or refused to start, producing many reports of vote-flipping, which means that voters press the button for one candidate but a different candidate's name appears on the screen.

Perhaps most notoriously, officials in Sarasota County say nearly 18,000 votes may never have been recorded by electronic machines in a Congressional race, even though many voters said they tried to vote.

The recent problems will probably help propel legislation that has stalled for months in Congress mandating that electronic voting machines have a paper trail to better enable recounts. Less clear, experts say, is whether anything will be done to address concerns about the lack of technicians to troubleshoot machines, polling places with too few machines and poorly trained workers, and a system run by partisan election officials who may decide conflicts based on politics rather than policy.

"These types of low-tech problems threaten to disenfranchise just as many people, if not more, but they tend to get less attention," said Tova Wang, an elections expert with the Century Foundation, a nonpartisan research group in New York. "We still have a long way to go toward fixing the biggest problems with our election system."

Election workers and experts say the advances in technology have simply overwhelmed many of the people trying to run things on the ground. At a hearing in Denver last week, one focus was on how hard it has become for the poll workers, often retirees getting paid $100 for a 14-hour day, and what it would take to attract younger people who are perhaps more savvy about computers.

"It used to be that you would come in, set up the machines, make a cup of coffee and say hello to your neighbors," said Sigrid Freese, who has worked at Denver polling places for more than 20 years. Now, she said, the job is complicated and stressful, and "I know a lot of people who said, 'Never again.' "

After widespread confusion and controversy caused by the hanging chads of the 2000 presidential election, Congress passed the Help America Vote Act in 2002 to help states phase out old-fashioned lever and punch-card machines and to introduce electronic voting equipment. But with malfunctions reported from a handful of states in the primaries earlier this year, many voting experts and state officials feared that the new technology might have only swapped old problems for newer, more complicated ones.

On Election Day, two voting-rights groups, Common Cause and the Election Protection Coalition, fielded nearly 40,000 telephone calls on two national hot lines from voters' reporting of problems or seeking information, and both groups are due to release their findings within the next two weeks. An initial review of their data, along with interviews with officials and experts, reveals that Florida, Maryland, Ohio and Pennsylvania were among the states with the most calls reporting trouble, including long lines, names missing from voter registration rolls, poll worker confusion and computer failures.

DOJ_NMG_0098318

In a few places, the difficulties started as soon as voters walked up to the sign-in tables.

In Ohio, even a congressman, Steve Chabot, a Republican, was turned away from his polling place because the address listed on his driver's license was different than his home address. Mr. Chabot was able to vote only after he returned with a utility bill. The state's top election official had to fax a midday notice to all precincts that such minor discrepancies were acceptable.

In Denver, the culprit was a new electronic poll book, which workers had to consult through laptop computers. The system was supposed to verify each voter's name in less than a minute. But it started slowing at 7 a.m. and eventually had to be turned off and rebooted, after taking up to 20 minutes to find each name.

As a result, voters waited in line for two to three hours. Liz Prescott, a computer industry executive, said she twice tried to vote but was deterred by the lines. "I'm just flabbergasted that this system at all levels failed," Ms. Prescott said.

John Gaydeski, Denver's election director, acknowledged that the system had not been tested properly before the election.

In Arkansas, Florida and Pennsylvania, the questions were about the voting machines themselves. In addition to the Sarasota issue, which may have been caused by a software problem, there were similar problems in the Florida counties of Charlotte, Lee and Sumter. In those counties, said Barbara Burt, vice president and director for election reform at Common Cause, more than 40,000 voters who used touch-screen machines seemed not to have chosen a candidate in the attorney general's race. But since one candidate won by 250,000 votes, the anomaly has been generally overlooked.

On election night in Arkansas, officials discovered that erroneous results had been tallied in Benton County. After retabulating the votes, they announced that the total number of ballots cast had jumped to 79,331 from 47,134, which meant a turnout of more than 100 percent in some precincts. After a third tallying, the total dropped to 48,681.

In Pennsylvania, computer problems forced polling places in Lancaster and Lebanon Counties to stay open late. In Westmoreland County, a programming error in at least 800 machines caused long lines.

Mary Beth Kuznik, a poll worker in that county, said she had to reset every machine after each voter, or more than 500 times, because the machines kept trying to shut down.

Howard Shaub, the elections board chairman in Lancaster County, counseled patience. "We used those old lever machines for 20, 30 years," Mr. Shaub said. "We just have to have better quality control and the new machines will work fine."

But Ms. Kuznik said one man refused to vote on the electronic machines and demanded a provisional ballot. "At least my vote will be on a piece of paper," Ms. Kuznik recalled his saying.

Déjà Vu In Florida (NYT)

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

One of the great hazards of the way electronic voting has been introduced in the United States is that it could end up undermining democracy by producing unreliable election results that cannot be truly audited or corrected. This month, that nightmare became a reality. Voting machines in a Congressional race in Florida — where else? — may have swallowed about 18,000 votes, far more than the nominal winner's razor-thin margin of victory. Because those votes were in the loser's strongest county, if there was a computer glitch it probably changed the outcome of the race.

Vern Buchanan, the Republican candidate in Florida's 13th Congressional District, was certified the winner, with 369 more votes than the Democrat, Christine Jennings. But voting machines in Sarasota County produced about 18,000 "undervotes," ballots on which the voter made other choices, but did not vote in the Congressional race. There have been reports of voters saying that their votes did not register when they chose Ms. Jennings, or that the race did not appear on their machines.

If the machines are to be believed — a big if — an extraordinary 14.9 percent of Sarasota County voters using the machines decided to skip the Congressional race, a highly publicized contest that voters knew could help decide which party controlled the House of Representatives. Among the absentee ballots, which were cast on paper, the undervotes were a more plausible 2.5 percent. The undervote rates in the district's other counties were far less than in Sarasota County.

There is a good chance that if something went wrong it changed the result. Sarasota was Ms. Jennings's strongest county, and The Orlando Sentinel's analysis of the ballots that did not register a choice in the Congressional race found that the votes cast in other races were more Democratic than Republican — and by a margin of more than the 369 votes separating Mr. Buchanan and Ms. Jennings.

The Jennings campaign has filed a lawsuit challenging the results. There are, unfortunately, no voter-verified paper ballots, so all that can be done is to try to figure out what went on inside the "black boxes," as critics call electronic voting machines that do not produce a paper record for each vote.

The campaign wants its experts to review the machines' secret computer source code, the programming that runs the computer inside the machine, to look for problems. Election Systems and Software, the company that made the machines, is not saying whether it will allow this. If it resists, the courts should order the company to hand over the code — a requirement that should, in fact, be routine in all places where electronic voting machines are used.

DOJ_NMG_0098319

As Ms. Jennings's suit proceeds, we should learn more about what, if anything, went wrong, and what the options are if any remedies are needed. But one verdict is already in: electronic voting without the full array of protections, including a voter-verified paper trail, is unacceptable.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Dept. Probe Eyes CME Clearing Operation (CRAINCB)

Crain's Chicago Business, November 26, 2006

Antitrust investigators target pricing power of merged CME/CBOT

Justice Department investigators probing the Chicago Mercantile Exchange's $8-billion acquisition of the Chicago Board of Trade are looking at the exchanges' clearing operation, a key profit center that some traders — and apparently regulators — fear could wield monopolistic pricing power.

Three people interviewed by lawyers from the DOJ's antitrust division in recent weeks said that interview questions focused on whether the Merc's clearinghouse, which guarantees $4.2 trillion in trades per day, functions as a limit on competition in futures trading. Investigators also asked whether the Merc could use its self-regulatory power to make rules that deter traders from using rival exchanges, according to the same sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the interviews were confidential.

Last year the CME clearinghouse guaranteed 90% of all futures contracts traded in the U.S., according to company filings. Clearing and transaction fees accounted for 76% of its $920.5 million in revenue.

The sources also identified the lead federal investigator on the case as George Baranko, the same Justice Department lawyer who six years ago put together a settlement that forced competition among the four U.S. options exchanges.

ENFORCING EXCLUSIVITY

In the options case, the exchanges agreed to list and trade each other's contracts. Futures exchanges still have the right to trade their own contracts exclusively. So, unlike stocks or options, futures contracts can't be bought at one exchange and sold at another, making it difficult for new entrants to break into the market.

The Merc's clearinghouse enforces its exclusivity by refusing to honor contracts from any other exchange except the Board of Trade.

"There is some analogy" between the former lack of competition among options exchanges and the exclusivity at futures exchanges, says Sandy Frucher, chief executive of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange, a signatory to the options settlement.

Philadelphia also runs a small futures market that has tried, unsuccessfully, to compete with the Merc's interest rate products.

"The clearing issue should be looked at, and the question of a regulatory monopoly," Mr. Frucher says. "If you deal with those issues, it's a good merger."

A DOJ spokeswoman confirmed the investigation but otherwise refused to comment. Mr. Baranko declined to comment.

The Justice Department routinely reviews big corporate mergers and can sue to block the deals if it believes they'll be anti-competitive.

'CONCERN' AMONG BROKERAGES

The Merc already clears Board of Trade contracts under a 2003 agreement. The merger, though, would make that relationship permanent. A Merc spokesman says, "We're excited about this transaction and we don't think there are any obstacles that we wouldn't be able to overcome."

But the specter of a Chicago futures monopoly appears to have spooked some exchange customers.

Advertisement

Today's Headlines | Related Article Topics | Related Industry News "There is a concern in the broker community that the merger will result in pricing power returning to the exchanges," says Russell Andersson, a vice-president for HedgeStreet Inc., an electronic futures exchange based in San Mateo, Calif.

Column: Biggest Year Ever For Deals (SFC)

By Kathleen Pender

San Francisco Chronicle, November 26, 2006

Shoppers went a little crazy last week, and I'm not talking about consumers camping out in the dark for doorbuster deals.

DOJ_NMG_0098320

I'm talking about companies and private equity firms gobbling up corporations, in whole or part, in a pre-Thanksgiving buyout binge. Last week alone, there were 379 deals valued at $118.6 billion announced worldwide, according to Dealogic. This includes $78.5 billion in deals for U.S. firms.

Among them: The Blackstone Group agreed to buy Equity Office Properties Trust for $20 billion, Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold offered $26 billion for copper miner Phelps Dodge, Bank of America said it would buy U.S. Trust from Charles Schwab for $3.3 billion, Russian steelmaker Evraz Group agreed to pay $2.5 billion for Oregon Steel Mills, and Nasdaq made a $5.1 billion hostile offer for the London Stock Exchange, which was rejected.

Last week's deals brought this year's total to $3.51 trillion worldwide, eclipsing the previous record of $3.3 trillion in 2000.

Although strategic mergers -- where one company buys another to expand or complement its business -- are strong, the real growth is merger activity in financial deals, where an investment firm buys a public company and takes it private, usually with loads of debt.

In 2006, takeovers by financial companies accounted for 17 percent of all global mergers, compared with only 4 percent in 2000, according to Dealogic.

What's fueling this merger mania, and why is it not generating the kind of backlash that the leveraged buyout craze did in the early 1980s, when takeover artists were called raiders or barbarians?

Here's a look at some factors:

-- Booming economies. "On a very basic level, it's the economic growth we're seeing both at home and abroad" that's driving merger activity, says John Orrico, manager of the Arbitrage Fund, which invests in companies involved in mergers.

As the U.S. economy recovered from its latest slump, many companies cut costs and refrained from making major investments, building up piles of cash. Now that demand is strong, companies are using their cash to expand by buying, not building.

"It's usually cheaper to buy a product line than taking time to build it," says Roy Behren, who helps manage the Merger Fund, which also invests in companies in the midst of takeovers.

"When you combine companies, there are synergies. The cost savings are very often real. The top-line synergies (such as increasing revenues by selling to the target company's customers) are harder to achieve."

Demand for energy and other commodities is especially strong, thanks to booming growth in countries like China and India. Companies that provide these products are making record profits and many are using it to buy competitors with the hope of cutting costs. In the commodity business, price is everything.

Also, Orrico points out, investment firms such as Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs and Lehman trade commodities. To augment this business, many are buying pipelines, barges and storage facilities.

"It gives them an edge if they control or have a hand in the distribution, supply and storage of energy (and other) products," says Orrico.

-- Low interest rates. Interest rates are still low by historical standards and relatively stable.

In addition, the difference in yield between safe U.S. Treasury bonds and risky corporate junk bonds is unusually small. That makes it easier to swallow a large company by putting a little money down and borrowing the rest (a leveraged buyout).

"The credit markets have been pretty friendly to these kinds of deals," says Matthew Toole, an analyst with Thomson Financial.

This month, Freescale Semiconductor sold almost $6 billion in junk bonds, and hospital firm HCA sold $5.7 billion worth to finance their takeovers by private-equity firms. Those were the two biggest high-yield bond sales ever after the $8.5 billion sold to finance the takeover of RJR Nabisco by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts in 1989.

-- Reasonable stock prices. Stock valuations are high enough that acquiring companies can use their shares to buy other companies, but they're not so high that target companies seem overpriced.

"The stock market has returned to levels at which target companies are not reluctant to sell themselves," says Behren. "When the market first cratered as a result of the tech bubble bursting, companies that would have been targets didn't want to sell at those depressed levels. Likewise, companies didn't want to use their low-priced stock to make acquisitions (because they would have had to issue more shares to reach a certain dollar price). Now that the market has rebounded, companies have more valuable currency to use to make acquisitions."

-- Private equity. Although private equity firms have been around for decades, their recent growth is helping fuel the merger boom.

Private equity firms -- such as Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, the Blackstone Group and the Carlyle Group -- raise money from pension funds, other institutional investors and wealthy individuals. They often use this money to buy out the shareholders of public companies, thus taking them private.

DOJ_NMG_0098321

Typically, the buyers might put down 25 to 30 percent of the purchase price in cash and borrow the rest, often by selling high-yield bonds backed by the acquired company's assets. The private equity firm oversees the acquired firm, sometimes with the help of its old management.

The new owners try to improve the acquired company by cutting costs, shedding unprofitable operations and perhaps merging it with other companies they have purchased. It uses the acquired firm's cash flow to repay the bonds. The firm might pay dividends to investors but the real money is made when the acquired company is sold to another firm or back to the public in an initial public offering.

This process used to take years, but nowadays it can be done in months. PanAmSat, FTD Group and Celanese were all sold to the public within a year of going private via leveraged buyouts.

In recent years, private equity firms have been making outsize returns on their investments. Naturally, this has attracted billions of dollars into private equity and much of it is being used to buy out public companies.

"You have a ton, I mean a ton of private equity money on the sidelines waiting to be deployed. If you have $3 billion in private equity, that's going to buy $10 billion worth of companies," says Behren.

At some point the returns from private equity will fall, but nobody knows when or why. It could happen if private equity firms, so eager to put their money to work, pay too much for acquisitions.

When Sam Zell, founder and chairman of Equity Office Properties Trust and one of the smartest real estate guys on the planet, agreed to sell his company to Blackstone last week, some analysts took it as a sign that private equity firms were overpaying for assets, at least in real estate.

On the other hand, the premiums being paid for public companies do not seem out of control, especially given the surge in takeover deals.

This year, private equity firms paid 28.6 percent on average over the public company's market price, compared with 35.3 percent in 2003 and 43.6 percent in 2000, according to Thomson Financial.

That could be because "private equity players need to deliver a certain percentage return to their general partners, so they are probably much more aware of 'overpaying' and will walk away if the purchase price gets too high," says Thomson's Toole.

Or could it be that private equity firms are keeping prices in check by forming clubs to buy companies with each other rather than bidding against each other?

The U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division has launched an informal investigation to determine whether private equity clubs are anti-competitive.

-- Why no backlash? Other than the DOJ investigation, private equity firms and buyouts in general are not generating the kind of negative publicity they got in the 1980s.

Back then, stocks in general were undervalued and selling for less than the sum of their parts in many cases. So-called corporate raiders could gain control of companies and sell them off in pieces, resulting in large layoffs and the disappearance of many venerable corporate names.

Sometimes all the raiders had to was buy a piece of the company, threaten to take it over, then sit back and wait until management paid them a higher price to go away. This tactic, known as greenmail, has since been outlawed.

Today, "public shareholders aren't complaining because they feel they are getting closer to full valuation," Orrico says.

Employees, by and large, aren't complaining because the big deals so far have not resulted in mass layoffs. That could change, especially if the economy turns down.

"If you're an HCA employee, you're not concerned, especially if you owned stock in HCA," Orrico says. But if HCA falters "and you get laid off in a year, you're going to get politicians pissed off, you're going to get unions angry."

Patient care could also suffer. "What are they going to do first? Pay interest or buy new equipment?" Orrico says.

"I think this can have some serious negative consequences for the economy down the road," he adds. "We haven't heard a lot of complaints yet because we don't know what the final outcome is going to be."

Net Worth runs Tuesdays, Thursdays and Sundays. E-mail Kathleen Pender at kpender@sfchronicle.com.

Page F - 1

As Cable, Broadcast Snit Boils, FCC Calls A Meeting (DMR)

Des Moines Register, November 26, 2006

Unless the situation is resolved, this is the last week for KDSM's Fox programs on Mediacom.

Treasure your football, Fox 17 viewers, because today could bring your last viewable NFL game on central Iowa cable for a long while.

DOJ_NMG_0098322

A 12-state, Iowa-based game of broadcasting chicken between Mediacom Communications Corp. and Sinclair Broadcasting Group is scheduled to come to a head Thursday night. And so far, a last-minute meeting called by a federal communications official seems to be the only hope of stopping a crash.

According to Barry Faber, corporate attorney and vice president of Maryland-based Sinclair, Mediacom and Sinclair officials have been summoned to a Monday meeting in the Washington, D.C., office of Robert McDowell, a member of the Federal Communications Commission, to discuss the year-long battle between the companies that threatens to leave 250,000 Iowa households with no immediate access to some popular television programs.

The still-unresolved squabble means Mediacom, which operates cable television systems in 23 states, will lose the right to rebroadcast signals of 22 of Sinclair's television stations, including two in Iowa, beginning Friday morning.

For cable customers in Des Moines, that would mean an end to some NFL football games, no more "The Simpsons" and no more "American Idol" on KDSM, the local Fox TV affiliate.

Likewise, no more "Survivor" or "CSI" for cable customers who watch KGAN-TV, the CBS affiliate in Cedar Rapids.

Mediacom officials say the company provides television to roughly 450,000 households across Iowa, although roughly 200,000 of those homes - in areas outside the Des Moines and Cedar Rapids markets - receive multiple Fox or CBS channels and would not lose any network programming if Sinclair stations go dark.

The long-standing financial dispute, which also has grown to become a legal battle and a public relations war, involves a gap of roughly $1 million, according to the last numbers disclosed by either side.

"I would say it's extremely unlikely that we're going to be able to work anything out," Faber said. "There have not been any substantive conversations at all."

A Mediacom executive echoed that sentiment but sounded optimistic that his company would succeed on a series of complaints filed with the FCC, including charges that Sinclair has refused to negotiate with the cable company in good faith.

Ed Pardini, Mediacom's senior vice president for its Des Moines offices, said he was hopeful the Federal Communications Commission would be able to force some sort of resolution, even if only temporarily. "Both parties are regulated by the FCC, and both parties have a lot to gain by creating a win-win scenario," Pardini said.

McDowell, the FCC commissioner, could not be reached for comment.

Failed negotiations

Mediacom has accused Sinclair in federal court papers of breaking U.S. antitrust laws by linking fee negotiations for 13 television stations that Mediacom wants to carry over its cable systems with nine other stations that it does not.

Sinclair, meanwhile, insists the cable company simply is unwilling to pay broadcasters on the same scale that it pays cable networks for signals such as the History Channel.

The two companies, which agree that Sinclair deserves some sort of payment, negotiated for roughly a year before Sinclair announced in September that it planned to take its stations off Mediacom.

Mediacom's lawsuit was filed in October, followed by repeated public statements from each company blaming the other for the deadlock.

In recent weeks, a Mediacom newspaper ad has accused Sinclair of "strong-arm tactics," while a Sinclair news release referred to Mediacom as a "near monopolist."

Drew McLellan, chief executive officer of McLellan Marketing Group of Des Moines, says much of the campaign has amounted to "sniping at each other," while not offering enough information for any observer to decide who's right or who's wrong.

Company executives say the ferocity of the licensing dispute is being driven largely by Sinclair's determination to raise the price that cable companies everywhere must pay to carry its signals.

Meanwhile, Sinclair's Des Moines and Cedar Rapids stations reportedly are ranked in the middle or bottom of their local markets.

"We're willing to pay a market rate of compensation," Pardini of Mediacom said. "But Sinclair is discriminating against Iowa consumers because it believes that the Des Moines market and the Cedar Rapids market are insignificant to its bottom line."

Said Faber, the Sinclair lawyer: "This is a long-term project to get paid appropriate compensation. So we have to be, and we are, willing to come off" of cable.

Satellite invitation

Faber's company has spent much of the last month urging Mediacom customers to jump ship with them. Throughout November, Sinclair has offered cable customers $150 to dump Mediacom in favor of a DirecTV satellite system.

Company officials plan to announce early this week that the $150 rebate offer, originally scheduled to expire on Wednesday, now will be extended to Dec. 31.

Pardini said earlier this month that he had seen no increase in cable disconnections attributed to the dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0098323

A DirecTV spokeswoman last week said that "a nice number" of Iowans had taken advantage of the rebate. She declined to disclose a number.

DirecTV did provide the names of several customers who recently had switched from cable, but the only one who could be reached on Friday said the Fox 17 issue had no impact on his decision.

"I did not change because of this issue on TV programming," said Matt Anderson of West Des Moines. "I changed because my Internet service was not working, and I could not get anybody from Mediacom to answer the phone."

Josh Garrett of Des Moines, however, is pleased with Mediacom cable and has no intention of switching.

"I don't want a satellite dish," he said. "I just don't want it on my house."

Regardless of what happens Thursday at midnight, all Sinclair-owned stations will continue to be available for free in Iowa for viewers who own a broadcast antenna.

As for cable customers, Mediacom officials say federal law would keep them from offering replacement network programming in Des Moines or Cedar Rapids if Sinclair removes its channels from cable.

However, the company already has found an alternative for at least one key offering on Fox 17 - University of Iowa basketball games.

Pardini said the cable company recently cut a deal with ESPN to rebroadcast any basketball games that are slated to air on KDSM. The tape-delayed games will air on Mediacom's Channel 22 roughly 30 minutes after their conclusion on KDSM and will be replayed the following day.

Reporter Jeff Eckhoff can be reached at (515) 284-8271 or jeckhoff@dmreg.com

Industry Denies Manipulation To Boost Profits (AP)

By Jeff Donn

AP, November 26, 2006

Oil companies face questions about creating tight supplies

BAKERSFIELD -- You'd think it was Texas. Dusty roads course the scrubland toward oil tanks and warehouses. Beefy men talk oil over burritos at lunch. Like grazing herds, oil wells dip nonstop amid the tumbleweed -- or even into the asphalt of a parking lot.

That's why the rumor sounded so wrong here in California's lower San Joaquin Valley, where petroleum has gushed up more riches than the whole gold rush. Why would Shell Oil Co. simply close its Bakersfield refinery? Why scrap a profit maker?

The rumor seemed to make no sense. Yet it was true.

The company says it could make more money on other projects. It denies it intended to squeeze the market, as its critics would claim, to drive up gasoline profits at its other refineries in the region.

Whatever the truth in Bakersfield, an Associated Press analysis suggests that big oil companies have been crimping supplies in subtler ways across the country for years. And tighter supplies tend to drive up prices.

The analysis, based on data from the U.S. Energy Information Administration, indicates that the industry slacked off supplying oil and gasoline during the prolonged price boom between early 1999 and last summer, when prices began to fall.

The industry counters that it's been working hard to meet untiring demand. It faults output quotas set by Mideast oil powers, global competition for oil from booming economies like China's, and domestic challenges like depleting wells, clean-air rules, and hurricanes. They do make things harder.

Yet the AP analysis found evidence of at least an underwhelming industry performance in supplying the domestic market, when profits should have made investment capital plentiful:

During the 1999-2006 price boom, the industry drilled an average of 7 percent fewer new wells monthly than in the seven preceding years of low, stable prices.

The national supply of unrefined oil, including imports, grew an average of only 6 percent during the high-priced years, down from 14 percent during the previous span.

The gasoline supply expanded by only 10 percent from 1999 to 2006, down from 15 percent in the earlier period.

The findings support a conclusion already reached by many motorists. Fifty-five percent of Americans think gas prices are high because oil companies manipulate them, a Pew Research Center poll found in October.

Even in Bakersfield, which lives off oil, many suspect that the industry goes easy on supply for its own reasons. "They ain't trying; that's more money for them," snorted JaRayle Madden, a construction worker filling up his little sedan recently at a local Shell station.

Shutting down

This fast-growing city of 300,000 shuddered in November 2003, when Shell confirmed it would soon close its local refinery. Plant workers, consumer activists and public officials rose up in resistance, firing off letters and demanding meetings.

DOJ_NMG_0098324

The 70-year-old refinery only produced 2 percent of California's gasoline and 6 percent of its diesel fuel. Yet opponents feared its demise would push up prices in the tight markets all along the West Coast.

In these circumstances, surely the plant was worth something to someone, if not to Shell. After losing $57 million mostly in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the refinery was making money again, Shell acknowledged.

Though set back temporarily by the attacks, the oil business has profited handsomely since then. For example, the biggest six refiners -- Shell is only No. 12 nationally but powerful in California -- rang up $400 billion in profits since 2001, according to the consumer group Public Citizen and corporate reports. Even compliance with complex clean-air rules hasn't spoiled business.

The industry also protected profits by not building any new refineries, instead expanding existing ones when it could.

Shell portrayed its Bakersfield refinery as old and unfit. One executive said there was "simply no longer an adequate supply of crude oil" nearby.

Growing demand

Drillers across the country complain of maturing wells that are slowly running low. Gas or liquid is sometimes injected into reservoirs at higher cost to keep up the flow.

However, oil reserves are expected to last for decades around Bakersfield and elsewhere, according to industry and government estimates. Fresh national reserves are found each year. To make up for older wells, oil companies regularly drill new ones -- about 9,800 last year. Underground discoveries and technological strides have kept domestic reserves at the same level as in 1999.

With demand growing, though, the United States has imported an expanding share of its oil from abroad -- and quotas kept by Mideast nations do lift its price.

It's also true there's a new big buyer of oil: China, with its flourishing economy. Yet even China hasn't outstripped the world's capacity to deliver more oil, at least so far. Since 1999, world supplies grew four times more than China's imports, federal data show.

Imports were impractical at inland Bakersfield, Shell explained. Lynn Laverty Elsenhans, the head of Shell Oil Products US, said the refinery here just wasn't viable anymore.

Shell's blunt tone began to trouble opponents of the plan. Union officer Ed Huhn, a former refinery worker who was trying to keep the place open, began to wonder if it was folly. "They were trying to discourage anybody from buying it," he says.

Skeptics like U.S. Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., got more vocal. They began to suspect that Shell wanted to shut the refinery to sell pricier gas from its bigger refineries elsewhere in the region. By taking a hit at Bakersfield, maybe Shell could come out ahead.

"They were trying to squeeze the market in every possible way," Wyden insists.

Shell spokesman Stan Mays denies that. He says it's "impossible to speculate" on whether Shell would have profited from closing the plant.

But he indirectly acknowledges that Shell didn't intend to make the refinery attractive for a competitor: "Who's going to want to buy it? We're not going to give crude supply with it."

Market manipulation

It turns out that the industry exerts quite a bit of control over supply.

For one thing, it decides to invest in new wells and refining equipment -- or not to. Though reserves have kept pretty steady, the oil industry taps those resources to varying degrees from year to year. The long price run-up first took off as the number of new wells abruptly dropped by a total of 59 percent in 1998-1999, federal records show.

One consumer advocate, Mark Cooper, refers to industry-induced supply bottlenecks as "strategic underinvestment." He views references to "discipline" in annual corporate reports as a code word for going easy on supplies.

"Anytime someone talks about 'discipline,' this suggests to me that they have market power. They're choosing what investments to make," said Cooper, research director for Consumer Federation of America.

There's evidence he may be right. A 2001 study by the Federal Trade Commission reported that some firms were deciding to "maximize their profits" by crimping supply during a Midwestern gasoline price spike. One executive told regulators "he would rather sell less gasoline and earn a higher margin on each gallon sold."

This year, the FTC reported that some oil companies were storing oil, instead of selling it right away, to await higher prices anticipated in the future.

The industry has shelved an average of 21 percent more unrefined oil from the start of 2004 through last June, the AP analysis indicates. Last spring, stocks of shelved crude reached their highest level in eight years, despite the fabulous riches at hand in high prices then.

DOJ_NMG_0098325

Such a strategy could conceivably extend to drilling, too. "If you think prices 10 years from now are going to be $100 a barrel, you might not be that enthused about producing as much as you can now," suggests energy economist Allan Pulsipher at Louisiana State University.

However upsetting to drivers, such tactics are usually viewed as legal. "A decision to limit supply does not violate the antitrust laws, absent some agreement among firms," regulators wrote in one FTC report.

Mergers Mean Quick Gains For Funds (WP/AP)

By Tim Paradis, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

The Trick Is Figuring Out Which Companies Will Be Sold Next

NEW YORK -- Investors observing the seemingly uninterrupted parade of corporate buyout announcements might wonder how much the deals and the attendant rise in stock prices will boost returns in their mutual funds. The answer depends on the type of funds they own.

Acquisition announcements often inspire investor confidence because the deals generally reflect a sense that the stock market offers bargains on desirable businesses. That notion can send stocks up in general, which benefits many mutual funds. And while the many merger announcements have prompted questions about whether the market is overvaluing some properties, mutual funds returns for the year are likely to get a boost from all the dealmaking.

One way investors can benefit from an acquisition is if a fund they own holds shares in a company being acquired. The fund's return can grow from the jump in a stock that often accompanies a buyout announcement. Shares of the company doing the acquiring typically fall, though generally only temporarily, as investors tend to frown upon the risk those companies are taking.

For Barry R. James, a portfolio manager at James Investment Research and president of the James Advantage Funds, the benefits of the buyouts are apparent, though he is quick to note potential pitfalls. The James Small Cap Fund, which has assets of $266 million and is up 13.5 percent this year, has advanced as five of the companies whose stock the fund holds were acquired in the past couple of months.

"Companies are awash in cash and they're just scratching their heads as to what do," James said of the recent flurry of deals. But he noted that even funds with narrow investment parameters can stray from a disciplined investing strategy and put returns at risk if they focus too much on anticipating the next acquisition target.

"We hope all our companies are bought out," he said. "We don't mind that at all but we're not trying to target ones that are going to be purchased."

The inherent diversity of a mutual fund, however, can limit the degree to which a jump in the price of a single stock can help the fund's return. The James funds' shares in companies that are being acquired generally rise 25 percent to 33 percent, but with positions of generally 2 percent to 4 percent, the overall effect on a fund's return is limited, James said.

Other funds seek to profit by buying shares of a company being acquired and, in a tactic known as shorting, bet that the stock price of the acquiring company will fall. Such arbitrage merger funds generally show little correlation to the overall direction of the stock market and instead benefit from an increase in acquisitions simply because that means there are more deals from which to choose.

John S. Orrico, who runs the Arbitrage Fund, said that as the world's economies grow, the possibilities increase for funds that capitalize on the spreads between stock prices and acquisition prices.

"We can cherry-pick through deals from across the globe," Orrico said. "Globalization is going to continue to be the fuel that feeds consolidation."

The Arbitrage Fund has assets of $173 million and a return this year of 5.4 percent. While the returns haven't matched those of other funds that have benefited from surging stock prices, he noted that the fund has gained during down years in the stock market.

Orrico's fund focuses on finding deals that are most likely to close and have the least shareholder opposition, financing difficulties and antitrust concerns. In doing so, the funds are less likely to bet on a deal that ultimately falls apart.

"Our approach is capital preservation while generating a return that exceeds the fixed income markets," Orrico said.

While many types of mutual funds can benefit from increased acquisition activity, the recently announced mergers haven't been concentrated in one sector, making it difficult to pinpoint what the next takeover target might be, said Todd Trubey, an analyst at Morningstar, which tracks funds.

In any case, funds that buy stock in a company shortly before it is acquired can incur short-term capital gains taxes. Still, if the stock price rises enough, the deal could ultimately still prove beneficial for a fund's returns, Trubey said.

DOJ_NMG_0098326

While mutual fund holders might welcome an increase in merger activity, there is a risk that buyout prices could become inflated and cause other stock prices to move too high.

"There's a lot of speculation driving share prices higher and people are looking at [buyout] valuations and applying those to companies that are not in deals," Trubey said. "That's a risky business."

Airline Mating Dances Pick Up (HC)

By Bill Hensel Jr., Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, November 26, 2006

Continental prepares in case it must choose

If you could take two big airlines and put them together to make one really big airline, which ones would you pick?

This has become a serious question since US Airways made a hostile bid for Delta Air Lines.

If it succeeds — and that's far from certain — it could trigger further industry consolidation.

If Houston-based Continental Airlines were left behind, it could find itself at a competitive disadvantage to far bigger competitors.

Consolidation in the airline industry has long been a topic on Wall Street.

"This has been waiting to happen for long time, everyone has been expecting consolidation," said Alan Sbarra, an industry consultant with Roach & Sbarra. "Nobody considered US Airways a player, but this clearly is a signal that everybody is in play."

Last year's merger of US Airways and America West — which has had promising results so far, but there is still difficult work to be done — revitalized the view that there are huge profits to be made through mergers and acquisitions, De- Paul University professor Joe Schwieterman said.

"The possibilities now are enormous, and every airline will be feverishly studying their options," Schwieterman said.

A quick study shows some pairings make more sense than others, and all of them present challenges.

Take a marriage between Continental and United Airlines. It's a matchup that analysts have increasingly discussed as a possibility ever since US Airways made its Delta bid.

A Continental-United pairing could raise fewer regulatory concerns than some others, JP- Morgan analyst Jamie Baker wrote in a recent report. That's because it offers a high concentration of competing service in only a handful of cities.

To pull it off, Continental would have to finance a deal and sell the unions on the benefits of combining the bigger carrier and its culture with Continental's team.

Continental won't talk specifically about what it is doing in the wake of the US Airways offer for Delta.

Larry Kellner, Continental's chairman and chief executive, indicated the carrier would consider a merger to stay competitive.

"If the landscape of the U.S. airline industry does indeed change, we'll do what we need to do to act in the best interests of you, our customers, our shareholders and the communities we serve," Kellner said in a recent recorded message to employees.

Other possibilitiesOther possible pairings that have been discussed include Continental and Northwest Airlines, American and Northwest, Delta and United or Delta and Northwest.

Discussions about what it would take to put these carriers together lead into their often-complicated histories and the nitty-gritty of their operations.

Northwest has two strikes against it: It is operating in bankruptcy, and it is fighting with its flight attendants union. No airline is keen on inheriting labor strife.

But it could play a big role in Continental's future because it holds a so-called golden share of Continental, meaning it could stop another airline from taking over the Houston carrier. That means any pairing involving Continental would likely require that Continental be the buyer, which would mean Northwest would not have a say.

While Wall Street sounds high on the combination of US Airways and Delta, the carriers have some operational problems to solve, according to aviation consultant Mike Boyd of the Boyd Group.

"The fleets are the economic equivalent of the Hatfields and McCoys," Boyd wrote in a recent report he posted on his Web site. "777s and A330s. 737s and A320s. And a hodgepodge of other aircraft."

When the realities of maintenance programs, training curriculums and parts inventories are considered, combining two carriers with a complex mix of jets could be a big deal, he said.

Where they overlapOne of the most quantifiable factors in this discussion is the overlap — the number of cities where the two carriers compete aggressively. When federal regulators review these deals, they take a hard look at specific routes where a merger could eliminate competition, leading to higher fares.

JPMorgan determined that a merger between Delta and Continental — a deal that was considered several years ago — has a higher overlap than any other pairing, at 32 percent.

The overlap between Delta and US Airways is 18 percent, according to JPMorgan.

But the Department of Justice has been increasingly willing of late to allow mergers that once would have been thought to be anticompetitive, Judy Gechman, an antitrust specialist at Houston-based Jenkens & Gilchrist law firm, said last week.

Gechman cited the joining this year of Whirlpool and Maytag, in which the merged company wound up with 70 percent of the market, she said.

However, that trend might not continue when it comes to the airline industry.

"I think they are going to have to be very careful when they look at this because the airline industry is so critical to our country," Gechman said. "Not that clean clothes aren't."

But Schwieterman says the US Airways offer to buy Delta looks like a long shot.

"It is a bold, daring move that probably faces long odds," he said. "But it also was a wake-up call about the inevitability of consolidation."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

On The Move To Outrun Climate Change (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

SEATTLE -- As the Bush administration debates much of the world about what to do about global warming, butterflies and ski-lift operators, polar bears and hydroelectric planners are on the move.

In their separate ways, wild creatures, business executives and regional planners are responding to climate changes that are rapidly recalibrating their chances for survival, for profit and for effective delivery of public services.

Butterflies are voting with their wings, abandoning southern Europe and flying north to the more amenable climes of Finland. Ski-lift operators in the West are lobbying for leases on federal land higher up in the Rockies, trying to outclimb snowlines that creep steadily upward.

Polar bears along Hudson Bay are losing weight and declining in number as the ice shelf melts and their feeding season shrinks. Power planners in the Pacific Northwest, which gets three-quarters of its electricity from hydroelectric dams, are meeting in brainstorming sessions and making contingency plans for early snow melts, increased wintertime rainfall, lower summertime river flows and electricity shortfalls during hotter, drier summers.

With the issue of a warming planet shifting rapidly from scientific projection to on-the-ground reality, animals and plants are being compelled, along with businesses and bureaucracies, to take action aimed at self-preservation. They are doing so even as the Bush administration eschews regulations, laws or international treaties that would require limits on carbon dioxide emissions, which scientists say are the main cause of global warming.

A newly published synthesis of 866 peer-reviewed studies of the effect of climate change on wild plants and animals has found what its author, Camille Parmesan, an assistant professor of integrative biology at the University of Texas at Austin, describes as a "clear, globally coherent conclusion."

Flora and fauna are migrating north or climbing to higher ground if they can, said Parmesan, whose paper appears in the December issue of the Annual Review of Ecology, Evolution, and Systematics. If they cannot move, she said, their numbers are often declining, their health is getting worse, and some are disappearing altogether.

"Wild species don't care who is in the White House," Parmesan said. "It is very obvious they are desperately trying to move to respond to the changing climate. Some are succeeding. But for the ones that are already at the mountaintop or at the poles, there is no place for them to go. They are the ones that are going extinct."

Among the most affected species, Parmesan said, are highland amphibians in the tropics. She said more than two-thirds of 110 species of harlequin frogs, which occupy mountain cloud forests in Central America, have become extinct in the past 35 years.

Meanwhile, many pest species -- including roaches, fleas, ticks and tree-killing beetles -- are surviving warming winters in increasing numbers. "We are seeing throughout the Northern Hemisphere that pests are able to have more generations per year, which allows them to increase their numbers without being killed off by cold winter temperatures," said Parmesan.

Federal scientists say that the first six months of this year were the warmest on record in the United States and that the five warmest years over the past century have occurred since 1998. In her review of studies measuring the impact of climate change on wild plants and animals, Parmesan said this "sudden increase" in temperatures appears to have been a tipping point, triggering substantial responses from a broad range of species.

DOJ_NMG_0098328

"The magnitude of impacts is so overwhelming that many biologists are now calling this the single most important problem they need to work on," said Parmesan. "You can save all the habitat you want, but if it is not any good climatically, what is the point?"

Though President Bush has said that human activity has contributed to climate change, he has consistently rejected the idea of imposing mandatory curbs on carbon dioxide emissions.

In an interview shortly after this month's congressional elections, James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said the country would be better off setting a voluntary goal -- such as increasing the use of renewable fuels -- than dictating industrial greenhouse-gas emission levels.

"Setting a reasonably ambitious target and then exceeding it is a good way to make reasonable progress," Connaughton said.

The Bush administration has outlined a strategic plan that calls for developing technology that would reduce carbon dioxide pollution. It now spends $3 billion a year on energy research and development. But when adjusted for inflation, this money is a fraction of what the federal government spent in the past. Researchers such as Reuel Shinnar and Francesco Citro, two chemical engineers at the Clean Fuels Institute at the City College of New York, estimate the country would have to spend hundreds of billions of dollars a year to make the transition to a carbon-free society.

From the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific Northwest, the effects of global warming -- along with the responses of animals, people, businesses and bureaucracies -- are being woven into the fabric of everyday life.

On Cape Sable, on the far southwestern edge of Florida, boaters, sportsmen and scientists have watched as a rising sea level has transformed a freshwater marsh into a portion of the sea.

Where there had been saw grass, the distinctive vegetation of the Everglades, there are now mangrove trees, which thrive in salt water and open water. Redfish inhabit areas that once had been wetland. The endangered bird named after the area, the Cape Sable seaside sparrow, has fled northward.

Using historic photos and tidal gauge records, University of Miami professor Harold Wanless, chairman of the geology department, has studied the changes. Between the sinking of the land and the rise of the seas since the 1930s, the relative water level has risen nine inches, he said.

"Freshwater marshes on Cape Sable are now evolving into more or less open marine waters," he said. "We're not talking about global warming as something that will happen in the future. Its happening right now. All the king's horses and all the king's men won't be able to put Cape Sable together again."

In the high country of western Montana, ski resort manager Tom Maclay is trying to outrun climate change by persuading the U.S. Forest Service to lease 12,000 acres across Carlton Ridge and Lolo Peak. The land, which lies above property he owns, would allow his resort to reach a top elevation of 9,100 feet.

Maclay is well aware how climate change is transforming his business and how nearby resorts have suffered from a lack of snow in recent years. At nearby Glacier National Park, the U.S. Geological Survey quantifies the change, noting that there has been a 73 percent decline since 1850 in the area of the park covered by glaciers. Many smaller glaciers are now gone, it says, and larger ones have shrunk by about two-thirds.

Maclay and his resort's chief executive, Jim Gill, are negotiating with snowmaking manufacturers who are asking for tens of millions of dollars for their services.

"Now with the snowline creeping up the hill, it's tougher and tougher for the areas that are struggling at the margins to keep their base areas full of snow," Gill said. "If you don't have a good snowmaking operation, you're not going to be able to compete."

In the Pacific Northwest, which depends far more on hydroelectricity than any region of the country, research findings on global warming from the University of Washington's Climate Impacts Group have prompted utilities, federal agencies and regional planning groups to convene brainstorming sessions in the past year.

They are looking at possible ways of mitigating power shortages as the summer flows of the region's rivers decline -- a result of less snow in the mountains and early melt.

For decades, the Pacific Northwest has had a surplus of power to send south to California during hot summer months. But if Northwest rivers run low as summers get hotter, the region could end up competing with California for power, said John Fazio, a senior power systems analyst for the Northwest Power and Conservation Council, a regional planning group.

"More and more, global warming is becoming a serious part of the planning process," said Fazio.

Climate In The Court (WP)

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

ON WEDNESDAY, the Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in what could prove to be one of the most fateful environmental cases in a generation -- or not, depending on what the justices do with it. Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency is a challenge by states and environmental groups to the Bush administration's refusal to regulate greenhouse gases as pollution.

DOJ_NMG_0098329

The question of how to handle global warming is the chief environmental issue of our era. Yet the Environmental Protection Agency has refused to assume regulatory authority over greenhouse emissions. It claims that the Clean Air Act gives it no power to do so. The law, however, gives the EPA power over "any air pollutant from any class or classes of new motor vehicle . . . [that] may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." What's more, it specifically identifies effects on "climate" as an aspect of that public welfare.

The EPA goes on to argue that even if it has the power to regulate carbon emissions, it doesn't have to -- and it doesn't want to. The government cites "scientific uncertainty as to the mechanisms of global climate change." But the law on this point is clear as well: The EPA, it says, "shall" regulate any pollutant from new motor vehicles that it expects to do harm. And while all the mechanisms of climate change are not understood, greenhouse gases certainly can be expected to do harm.

The tricky legal question is whether the states and environmental groups -- or anyone else, for that matter -- have standing to bring the case. To establish standing, one has to show both that an actual injury has occurred and that winning the case would redress that injury. The problem of climate change is so huge that it creates a paradoxical barrier to litigation: Regulating one relatively small component of the problem -- emissions by new vehicles in the United States -- probably wouldn't do much overall to stop global warming. Depending on how the justices treat this question, the case could peter out.

That would be frustrating and unfortunate. Nowhere is this administration's resistance to action on global climate change more aggravating than in its persistent refusal to use the legal powers already at hand. What an irony it would be if its lawless inaction survived judicial review because the problem is too big.

Clean Up The Navajos' Poisoned Land (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

DURING WORLD WAR II, the federal government made a deal with Navajos: If the tribe allowed uranium mining on its 27,000-square-mile reservation, the land eventually would be returned "in as good condition as received."

Instead, when the diggers left by the mid-1960s, the land was scarred by open shafts, contaminated well water and radioactive piles — often without fences or warning signs. As a Times series (latimes.com/navajo) reported last week, federal inspectors knew about the damage but did little to prevent or fix it.

What followed was unconscionable. Navajos drank from contaminated pools, slept on radioactive floors and fed their herds on land irrigated with death. Children suffered mysterious, painful illnesses and died young. One couple, Helen and Leonard Nez, lost six of their children; Helen had drunk poisoned water while pregnant.

Blame can be laid at the feet of the mining companies and even the tribal government. But it is the job of the Environmental Protection Agency and the Bureau of Indian Affairs to prevent environmental wreckage and safeguard the tribe's interests. Both fell down on the job spectacularly.

Cleanup of toxic sites has happened only in fits and starts. One obstacle is that the federal government, unaccountably, has failed to conduct the comprehensive health and environmental studies necessary to determine the extent of the harm done. After several unsuccessful efforts to obtain funding, the tribe solicited the EPA's Superfund program, to help squeeze money out of mining companies or draw from the fund's $1.6-billion cleanup money. But the low population density of the area has prevented Navajos from qualifying.

Now the tribe is once again making the case to have its radioactive land placed on the Superfund list. This should be an EPA priority; if it takes an act of Congress, then fine. The country has a historical, ethical and contractual obligation to remove the toxic health hazard it created on Navajo lands.

Mining companies, excited about cleaner new technologies and an exponentially growing demand for uranium, are once again knocking on Navajo doors, offering jobs and swearing environmental responsibility. The tribe has said no, and no it should remain — at least for now. The government should not buy from any tribal mines until the country proves that its promises and contracts aren't as flimsy as the onion-skin paper on which they were once typed.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Crackdown Sends Meth Labs South Of Border (LAT)

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098330

GUADALAJARA — The methamphetamine laboratories that once plagued California's hinterlands and powered a national explosion of drug abuse have been replaced by an increasing supply from Mexico, U.S. law enforcement officials say.

Methamphetamine production has surged south of the border, from Baja California ranches to the highlands of Michoacan to the industrial parks here in Mexico's second largest city, where authorities in January busted the largest laboratory ever discovered in the Americas.

The fortress-like compound ringed by high brick walls housed 11 custom-designed pressure cookers that could produce 400 pounds of the drug per day. It dwarfed anything ever found in California, where the standard cooking tool is a 23-quart beaker and a 20-pound batch is considered a good production day.

"It was the mother lode of mother lodes," a U.S. law enforcement official said.

The boom in Mexican methamphetamine production stems from successful efforts in the U.S. to control the sale of chemicals used to produce the drug, including the cold medicine pseudoephedrine.

Drug traffickers, some of them ex-convicts and fugitives from the United States, including a former chemistry professor from Idaho arrested last month, authorities say, have resettled in Mexico because of the easy access to pseudoephedrine and other chemicals.

The largest share of the chemicals is believed to be shipped to Mexico from factories in China and India and routed through Hong Kong. China has emerged as the top concern for U.S. authorities.

Like traffic in heroin and cocaine, the methamphetamine economy has become a global phenomenon. So too is the battle to control what most U.S. law enforcement authorities consider the country's greatest drug threat.

'A new ice age'

"The cliche is coming true: We've entered a new ice age," said Misha Piastro, an agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration who has worked on the U.S.-Mexico border, referring to the smokable form of the drug called ice.

The trend began surfacing about two years ago as a crackdown on the bulk distribution of ingredients cut off producers from supplies in the U.S. and, later, Canada.

The rural fringes of California metropolitan areas, including the Inland Empire, which once were centers of methamphetamine production, remain important distribution hubs. But the number of "superlab" discoveries in California has dropped from 125 in 2003 to 12 through mid-October this year, according to the DEA. Nationwide, the numbers have dropped from 130 to 19 during the same period. Superlabs are operations that can produce more than 10 pounds of methamphetamine per cooking cycle.

Authorities now estimate that 80% of the methamphetamine on U.S. streets is controlled by Mexican drug traffickers, with most of the supply smuggled in from Mexico. Methamphetamine seizures at the U.S.-Mexico border jumped 50% from 2003 through 2005, from 4,030 to 6,063 pounds.

Mapping the methamphetamine production network is difficult in a country of remote ranchlands and under-patrolled metropolitan areas. Few law enforcement authorities are trained to recognize the signs of a drug lab, including the fumes and pollutants that pose significant environmental hazards.

Nonetheless, the number of labs discovered by Mexican authorities nearly tripled from 2002 to 2005, from 13 to 37, and methamphetamine seizures more than doubled, to 2,169 pounds, during the same period. U.S. authorities believe the numbers are a fraction of actual activity, as signs of an extensive production infrastructure have surfaced in the last year or so.

Among those signs: Mexico's importation of cold medicines jumped suddenly in recent years, from 92,000 tons in 2002 to 150,000 tons in 2005. Though recently imposed restrictions have cut legal imports by about half this year, U.S. authorities believe significant amounts are still being smuggled through corruption-ridden Mexican ports.

Last December, Mexican authorities at the Pacific Coast port of Manzanillo found 5.1 million pseudoephedrine tablets hidden in a cargo of ceiling fans from China. The cache would have been enough to produce about 3 tons of finished product, authorities said.

Last November, China toughened its reporting and licensing requirements for those manufacturing, shipping, trading and exporting bulk chemicals such as pseudoephedrine, a step welcomed by international drug enforcement officials.

But Beijing did not impose limits or reporting requirements on end users. Smugglers are still free to buy millions of cold tablets, hide these in Chinese export products and ship them to Mexico or other destinations, as seen with the ceiling-fan discovery.

China also faces problems similar to those in Mexico — budget constraints, corruption, turf battles and inadequate detection and monitoring equipment.

Public health problem

In Mexico, meanwhile, drug lab discoveries have spanned the country. In Mexicali, several labs have erupted in flames. In Michoacan, authorities have discovered large production operations and believe lab activity is rife in the state's rural areas.

DOJ_NMG_0098331

Producers also have flooded the Mexican domestic market with the drug, creating an epidemic of methamphetamine addiction and drug-related crime in many cities.

"It's a grave public health problem of enormous dimensions," said Victor Clark Alfaro, a border expert and director of the Binational Center for Human Rights in Tijuana.

Guadalajara, capital of the western state of Jalisco, has emerged as a production hub for methamphetamine, authorities say. Lab activity is easily camouflaged in the metropolitan area of 4 million people, which encompasses isolated ranchlands, industrial areas and densely packed urban neighborhoods where exhaust and sewer smells mask the fumes of superlabs.

The ease of operating in Guadalajara was vividly illustrated in October, officials say, when authorities acting on an anonymous tip arrested Frederick Wells, a former Idaho State University professor who was allegedly running a superlab in his pink stucco home half a mile from the U.S. Consulate.

Wells, 57, who fled the United States in 1998 after being charged with operating a drug lab in his university office, had only to walk down the street to purchase industrial chemicals at a storefront business in Guadalajara. Authorities say Wells told them that neighbors in the quiet area of neat homes never noticed the smells during the nearly two years he operated the lab.

The enormous lab discovered in January was in a gritty area of chemical plants, small ranches and cornfields outside the city.

"We smelled things but didn't know what it was. There are lots of factories around here; you never know what you smell," said Armando Murillo, who lives behind the former lab on a small ranch where he raises goats and sheep.

Murillo's property was transformed into a campground for about 150 soldiers who guarded the lab for weeks. The suspects, a trio of chemists and former classmates at the University of Guadalajara, left behind more than 1,000 pounds of powdered methamphetamine in three barrels, and enough precursor chemicals to produce another 1,000 pounds, authorities said.

After the arrest of one suspect, authorities found four more superlabs they said were tied to the group. Another suspect is believed to have been killed by a local paramilitary-style gang, which is charged with burying alive five men at a ranch, one of them an ex-convict from Riverside County who had moved to Jalisco to get into the methamphetamine trade, a U.S. law enforcement source said.

Two other ex-convicts — one from Riverside County, the other from Phoenix — were arrested in August on suspicion of operating a lab at a ranch where Mexican authorities discovered 220 pounds of methamphetamine.

The migration south of fugitives and ex-convicts worries authorities who say it coincides with the release from U.S. prisons of many drug traffickers who have finished serving sentences dating from the early era of the methamphetamine trade.

Scarce resources

With narcotics-related violence flaring across the country, experts say Mexico is ill-prepared to open another front against methamphetamine production. The DEA has donated equipment and begun to teach their Mexican counterparts how to find drug labs, but resources for a wide-ranging enforcement effort are scarce.

Authorities in Guadalajara, for instance, delayed dismantling the lab in January because the nearest lab truck, filled with protective suits and equipment to safely dispose of chemicals, was five hours away, in Mexico City.

"The problem is too new," said Marcos Pablo Moloeznick Gruer, a political science professor at the University of Guadalajara. He said Mexican law enforcement was not "aware or concerned enough" about the rise in methamphetamine production.

Heroin Use Rising In Indy (INDYSTAR)

By Will Higgins

The Indianapolis Star, November 26, 2006

Popularity of addictive drug could lead to increased thefts

Heroin, the scourge of the '70s, is back.

While the drug still makes up a minority of the cases at Indianapolis' drug court, heroin is increasingly easy to find on the city's streets, according to police, as it is elsewhere in Indiana and the nation.

"I'm seeing a lot, lot more heroin," said Jamie Guilfoy, an IPD narcotics detective since 2001. "I never saw any up until the last year."

Guilfoy and other Indianapolis Police Department narcotics investigators have confiscated nearly 1,000 grams -- about 2.2 pounds -- of heroin this year, more than 10 times what they seized in 2005.

Indiana State Police project they will investigate close to 700 heroin cases this year, twice as many as last year and three times as many as in 2004.

Another possible indicator: A 2006 Indiana University survey found that 2.2 percent of Indiana high school seniors have tried intravenous drugs -- a 25 percent jump from the previous year. The needle is the preferred method of heroin users.

DOJ_NMG_0098332

The emerging trend is nationwide, with cities such as Minneapolis; Dallas; Covington, Ky.; and Salt Lake City also reporting heroin upswings. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has confiscated heroin in slightly declining amounts the past two years, but from 2001 to 2005, seizures were up more than 50 percent compared with the previous five years.

The trend is alarming, noted a U.S. Justice Department study released last week, because heroin, more than other abused drugs, is a multifaceted plague.

"Although overall abuse levels for heroin are lower than levels for other drugs, including cocaine and marijuana, the consequences of heroin abuse are far-reaching in terms of heroin-related deaths, treatment admissions and emergency department mentions," said the National Drug Threat Assessment 2007.

Nonviolent crimes such as burglary and theft, which are already on the rise in Marion County, are likely to increase with heroin use as addicts seek ways to finance their habit, police say.

Why the surge?

Robin Parsons, director of adult services at Fairbanks Indianapolis drug and alcohol treatment center, says the heroin surge is a result of a police crackdown on OxyContin, a commonly abused prescription painkiller.

"There was an OxyContin crisis in 2000 to 2004," she said, "then law enforcement got an inkling of what was happening, and OxyContin became harder to get."

And heroin became easier.

Heroin production has expanded in Afghanistan and Mexico, according to the DEA. The Afghans mostly ship their heroin to Asia and Europe; the Mexican-produced heroin comes to the U.S. So does heroin from Thailand.

The prices of OxyContin and heroin vary, but these days, heroin's street price is higher, according to police and others. In Indianapolis, OxyContin costs about $10 a pill, compared with $20 for a comparable amount of heroin, about a tenth of a gram.

Both drugs are opiates, but OxyContin's high pales next to heroin's, said K., a 27-year-old Indianapolis woman who has tried both. "Oxy tides me over, but it's nothing, really. It's not much. Nothing like the boy."

Agreeing to an interview only if her name was not used, K., who is serving a five-month sentence for drug possession and is in the custody of the Marion County Jail, said that when she started using heroin four years ago, she had one source. Today, she said, she knows eight heroin dealers -- and all of them deliver.

The drug has cost her custody of her three children; it has driven her to prostitution. Still, K. rhapsodizes about it: "The best feeling. No worries."

A deadly habit

The typical heroin user takes three or four hits a day, said DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney, costing $60 to $80. But veteran junkies build up a tolerance to the drug, so $200-plus-a-day habits aren't unheard of.

Most of Indianapolis' heroin comes through Chicago, plagued recently by a rash of overdoses due to a deadly mixture of heroin and fentanyl, an extremely potent painkiller.

About 500 deaths have been reported this year throughout the country, though the fentanyl scare has not reached Indianapolis.

Heroin overdoses, instead of having a chilling effect, actually whet users' appetites. "When users see an OD death, they seek out that heroin, thinking it must be some really good stuff," Courtney said.

Joanna Zoltay, of the DEA's office in Chicago, said the Chicago Police Department began distributing fliers last summer aimed at alerting heroin users to the locations where the deaths had occurred. The plan was to warn them away from the area.

"Unfortunately," Zoltay said, "that seemed to . . . make people want to buy it more. They literally had traffic problems in those areas."

Heroin is different from cocaine and methamphetamine, which are stimulants that send their users on wired, manic runs. Heroin, an opiate, relaxes a person, makes him mellow, sluggish. The strong drive for another hit, experts say, comes from the sick feeling that comes from withdrawal.

"When you're on heroin, you have to do it or else you'll be sick," said Nate Rush, an Indianapolis social worker and former heroin addict who has been clean since 1991. "And it's the worst kind of sick -- body cramping, throwing up. It's like the worst case of the flu ever. The pain goes all the way to the bones."

Impact of addiction

"People on heroin aren't the most productive people," said Eric Lawrence, director of forensic analysis at the Indiana State Police Crime Lab System. "They are unable to maintain employment. They have no money, and they have to have (the drug)."

The upshot: "If there's a continued rise in the use of heroin, you can expect a proportionate rise in burglaries, thefts and robberies," Lawrence said.

For the first eight months of this year, 508 burglaries were reported in Indianapolis, nearly twice as many as in the same period last year, though police can't say for sure that heroin is to blame.

DOJ_NMG_0098333

K. has funded her habit through prostitution. Men, some of them "real nice guys," call her up; she invites them over. Her boyfriend is uncomfortable with the arrangement, she said, "but he spends the money and gets high with me after."

Like many of today's heroin users, K. didn't start off injecting the drug with a needle. She started the more palatable, less violent way: She snorted it in powder form.

Snorting gained popularity in the 1990s, according to a study by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, as heroin became more pure, more potent. Free from the needle's stigma, heroin found new converts, drug experts say.

"I told myself I'd never inject," K. said. "I was scared to death to inject it."

But the high through injection is more intense, and in just two months, K. -- like seven of 10 heroin users -- was injecting.

By then, heroin had consumed her. She gave up her children and her hobbies, which included swimming and bowling.

In jail, where she has been since September, she frequently dreams about the drug. She sees it, loads it into a syringe, and just as she sticks the needle into her arm, she wakes up, disappointed.

She has been clean since August but has twice before flunked out of rehab.

She is due to be released from prison Dec. 3. She wonders -- and fears -- what she'll do then.

Call Star reporter Will Higgins at (317) 444-6043.

IMMIGRATION:

Border Group's Finances Scrutinized (HC)

By Susan Carroll, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, November 26, 2006

Minuteman founder reveals figures, but some still wonder where the money went

For the first time, the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps has revealed a smattering of intriguing details on its finances, but some former Texas members say they're still not sure how the group has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in contributors' money.

Chris Simcox, founder of the nonprofit border watch group, posted IRS forms and an audit on his Internet site Nov. 15 in response to media reports raising concerns about how the organization was handling its contributions.

The new documents offer a glimpse into the group's finances, former Minuteman loyalists say, but leave unanswered questions. Among them: How is the group spending thousands of dollars in membership fees they've collected in the past 19 months? And what companies or other nonprofits received $277,000 — amounting to more than half the group's contributions in 2005 — for unspecified "personnel services?"

Already, questions about the group's finances and other concerns have prompted some leaders to quit. Bill Parmley, the former head of the Texas chapter of MCDC, was one of the first leaders to leave in July 2005.

"There were just too many irregularities," Parmley said in an interview. "I just didn't want to be involved in something like that."

Simcox and his spokeswoman, Connie Hair, did not respond to repeated phone calls or messages.

In barnstorming stops across the country last year, Simcox told crowds of new recruits that the organization charged a mandatory $50 membership fee for background checks. He made exceptions for anyone who already had a concealed weapons permit, which requires an extensive background check, and for former law enforcement officers.

But the group's recently posted IRS Form 990 — a public record required for all nonprofits — shows that the group spent only $1,074 on background checks for volunteers in 2005 while charging new recruits $50 each and collecting more than $54,000 in registration fees.

Kenneth Buelter and his wife, Daphne, former Minuteman loyalists, recalled meetings where MCDC leaders explained the $50 registration fee.

"They told us it was for background checks," said Daphne Buelter.

Kenneth Buelter, a concealed-weapons permit holder, went ahead and paid the $50, considering it a donation. "I thought it was the right thing to do," he said.

'Unanswered questions'But months later, the couple decided to distance themselves from the movement, even though they still believe in the cause. "There were a great deal of unanswered questions," Daphne said.

The records Simcox posted on the Web site seem to answer some of the more serious questions raised by former MCDC members in media reports published this summer. The Washington Times reported in July that some former leaders had resigned because of financial questions, and pressed in editorials for Simcox to account for the group's donations.

DOJ_NMG_0098334

The audit Simcox made public shows that an accredited firm signed off on the group's finances for the 2005 tax year, supporting his assertion that the money was handled properly.

The IRS documents filed by the fledgling organization showed that it received more than $418,000 in contributions during 2005 and owed about $31,000 at the end of the tax year. Independent accountants who reviewed the report at the Houston Chronicle's request said MCDC's finances appear to be in line with many not-for-profits that are just starting out.

Simcox defended the spending on the group's Web site. According to the IRS documents, MCDC dedicated 62.5 percent of contributions to programs, 5.2 percent to management and administration and 32.3 percent to fundraising. In his Web posting, Simcox wrote that the breakdown was "much better than most first-year start-up national organizations."

He also lashed out at the press for stories questioning the group's financing, accusing the media of "egregiously false or erroneous reporting as well as some outright malicious lies."

The Minuteman Project, the original name for the civilian patrol group, kicked off in April 2005 in Arizona amid a media frenzy. More than 100 reporters turned up for the first patrol, documenting volunteers watching the border from lawn chairs and tailgates.

Report cites resignationsThis summer, the Washington Times reported that some former top Minuteman leaders, including the former national coordinator, had quit because of their concerns over finances.

Parmley, who joined the movement out of frustration over the relentless flow of illegal immigrants across his ranch land in South Texas, said he resigned mainly because he was concerned about suspicions of racist attitudes in one Minuteman branch. He said he was also troubled because he couldn't get straight answers on money management, including what happened to the registration fees.

Kim Fromme, the former director of operations for the Minuteman chapter in Texas, had similar concerns and quit in February.

He said he could never figure out where the money for programs was going.

"It didn't go down to the border, that's for sure," Fromme said.

He said he and other members approached Simcox with questions, but came away disappointed.

During the early days of the Arizona-based movement, no one addressed the finances publicly "because the mission was so important," said Shannon McGauley, who formed a splinter group called the Texas Minutemen around the same time that MCDC launched in Arizona.

"Now all these people are quitting because of questions about the money," he said. "When a couple people quit and start bad-mouthing, you can believe MCDC. But when you talk to them and every single one of them says the same thing, that warrants some investigating."

But MCDC still has plenty of supporters and they rallied behind Simcox in the group's Internet forum.

Chronicle reporters Terri Langford and Chase Davis contributed to this report.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Hail To The Chief (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, November 26, 2006

ANN ARBOR, MICH. -- In July 1987, then-Representative Dick Cheney, the top Republican on the committee investigating the Iran-contra scandal, turned on his hearing room microphone and delivered, in his characteristically measured tone, a revolutionary claim.

President Reagan and his top aides, he asserted, were free to ignore a 1982 law at the center of the scandal. Known as the Boland Amendment, it banned US assistance to anti-Marxist militants in Nicaragua.

"I personally do not believe the Boland Amendment applied to the president, nor to his immediate staff," Cheney said.

Most of Cheney's colleagues did not share his vision of a presidency empowered to bypass US laws governing foreign policy. The committee issued a scathing, bipartisan report accusing White House officials of "disdain for the law."

Cheney refused to sign it. Instead, he commissioned his own report declaring that the real lawbreakers were his fellow lawmakers, because the Constitution "does not permit Congress to pass a law usurping Presidential power."

The Iran-contra scandal was not the first time the future vice president articulated a philosophy of unfettered executive power -- nor would it be the last. The Constitution empowers Congress to pass laws regulating the executive branch, but over the course of his career, Cheney came to believe that the modern world is too dangerous and complex for a president's hands to be tied. He embraced a belief that presidents have vast "inherent" powers, not spelled out in the Constitution, that allow them to defy Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0098335

Cheney bypassed acts of Congress as defense secretary in the first Bush administration. And his office has been the driving force behind the current administration's hoarding of secrets, its efforts to impose greater political control over career officials, and its defiance of a law requiring the government to obtain warrants when wiretapping Americans. Cheney's staff has also been behind President Bush's record number of signing statements asserting his right to disregard laws.

A close look at key moments in Cheney's career -- from his political apprenticeship in the Nixon and Ford administrations to his decade in Congress and his tenure as secretary of defense under the first President Bush -- suggests that the newly empowered Democrats in Congress should not expect the White House to cooperate when they demand classified information or attempt to exert oversight in areas such as domestic surveillance or the treatment of terrorism suspects.

Peter Shane, an Ohio State University law professor, predicted that Cheney's long career of consistently pushing against restrictions on presidential power is likely to culminate in a series of uncompromising battles with Congress.

"Cheney has made this a matter of principle," Shane said. "For that reason, you are likely to hear the words 'executive privilege' over and over again during the next two years."

Cheney declined to comment for this article. But he has repeatedly said his agenda includes restoring the presidency to its fullest powers by rolling back "unwise" limits imposed by Congress after the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal.

"In 34 years, I have repeatedly seen an erosion of the powers and the ability of the president of the United States to do his job," Cheney said on ABC in January 2002. "I feel an obligation...to pass on our offices in better shape than we found them to our successors."

Cheney's ideal of presidential power is the level of power the office briefly achieved in the late 1960s, the era of what historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr. called the "imperial presidency."

Early in the Cold War, presidents began invoking national security to seize greater power from Congress. This concentration of authority peaked under President Richard Nixon, who famously asserted that "when the president does it, that means it's not illegal." But Watergate reawakened Congress, which passed new laws to regulate presidential power.

Cheney was a close observer of that era. He landed his first job in the federal government in 1969, when Donald Rumsfeld hired him as an assistant at the Office of Economic Opportunity. The antipoverty agency, set up by Congress during the Johnson administration, was unpopular among conservatives, and Rumsfeld's and Cheney's job was to help Nixon impose greater political control over the office.

A chief target was the agency's legal aid program, headed by Terry Lenzner. Now a private investigator, Lenzner said in a recent interview that the White House pressured him to fire lawyers who filed class-action lawsuits on behalf of the poor. But Lenzner said he could not fire them because of the way Congress had written the agency's statute.

"I was being told, 'You have to put a stop to this, you have to control these lawyers,'" Lenzner recalled. "But I said that 'If I do what you want me to do, it will violate the law.'"

The orders to fire lawyers, Lenzner said, came from other White House aides, not Rumsfeld or Cheney personally. Still, in November 1970, Rumsfeld summoned Lenzner to his office, and, with Cheney at his side, fired Lenzner because he was unwilling to follow orders.

In August 1974, Nixon resigned rather than face impeachment by Congress. The new president, Gerald Ford, asked Rumsfeld to be his White House chief of staff, and Rumsfeld again made Cheney his deputy. A year later, Rumsfeld became secretary of defense, and Cheney replaced him as Ford's top aide.

In his new role, Cheney was exposed to national security issues from the perspective of a White House that wanted to preserve secrets in the face of congressional demands for more openness. Soon after Rumsfeld and Cheney took on their new posts, Congress passed a bill to strengthen the Freedom of Information Act. The bill allowed judges to review classified documents to determine if they were being shielded for political purposes.

In October 1974, Ford vetoed the legislation, telling Congress that the bill "would violate constitutional principles." Congress, however, overrode his veto, and lawmakers soon threatened to impose further limits on presidential power.

In December 1974, The New York Times reported that the CIA had engaged in an illegal domestic spying program for two decades, tapping phones, opening mail, and breaking into homes of antiwar protesters. The article, by investigative reporter Seymour Hersh, prompted a congressional uproar.

In a memo to Ford, obtained at the Ford Presidential Library in Ann Arbor, Mich., Cheney urged the swift creation of a presidential commission to investigate the CIA. Cheney wrote that doing so was "the best prospect for heading off congressional efforts to further encroach on the executive branch."

DOJ_NMG_0098336

Ford created the commission, but Congress moved in anyway. A Senate committee chaired by Idaho Democrat Frank Church began demanding access to secret documents. But Cheney soon saw a chance to convince the public that investigating intelligence operations was dangerous and unwise.

In May 1975, Hersh wrote an article discussing how US submarines eavesdropped on the Soviet Union's undersea cables. Fearing that the article had damaged national security, Cheney pushed the idea of indicting the reporter using the 1917 Espionage Act.

Making an example out of Hersh, Cheney wrote, would "create an environment" that might intimidate both the press and Congress. "Can we take advantage of it to bolster our position on the Church Committee investigation? To point out the need for limits on the scope of the investigations?" Cheney wrote. The idea, however, was scrapped to avoid attracting the Soviets' attention to Hersh's article.

The next spring, after revelations that the National Security Agency had monitored the phone calls of American civil rights and antiwar activists, Congress drafted legislation to require warrants for domestic surveillance. Cheney's allies, including Defense Secretary Rumsfeld and then-CIA director George H.W. Bush, opposed such a bill as a derogation of presidential power. But Ford decided not to fight it.

Congress passed the warrant requirement as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 -- the same law that the Bush-Cheney administration later bypassed with its warrantless wiretapping program.

After Ford lost the 1976 presidential election to Jimmy Carter, Cheney returned to Wyoming and in 1978 won a seat in Congress, where he specialized in intelligence matters. During the Iran-contra hearings, Cheney failed to convince a majority of his colleagues that the Reagan administration was justified in ignoring the Boland Amendment, but he moved quickly to block new congressional encroachments on what he saw as a president's exclusive turf.

When the Senate passed a bill forcing presidents to notify Congress of all covert operations within 48 hours, Cheney led a successful fight to defeat the bill in the House. He argued that Congress was prone to leaks and had no authority to force the commander-in-chief to share information about covert operations.

"The 48-hour bill would 'get back' at President Reagan by tying the hands of all future presidents," Cheney wrote in a May 1988 Wall Street Journal column. "That approach will achieve nothing useful."

The next year, Cheney became defense secretary under President George H.W. Bush. In his new position, Cheney again pushed for an expansive view of presidential power -- most dramatically in late 1990, when Cheney urged Bush to launch the Gulf War without asking Congress for authorization.

For all major overseas wars from 1789 to 1950, presidents obeyed the constitutional provision giving Congress alone the power to declare war. But in Korea and Vietnam, Presidents Truman, Johnson, and Nixon defied this constraint. They asserted that the commander-in-chief had "inherent" power to take the country to war on his own.

Seeking to restore its constitutional role, Congress passed the War Powers Resolution in 1973, requiring presidents to consult Congress when sending troops into battle.

After Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait in August 1990, Bush sent 500,000 US troops to Saudi Arabia. As they prepared to attack the Iraqi forces, Cheney told Bush that it was unnecessary and too risky to seek a vote in Congress.

"I was not enthusiastic about going to Congress for an additional grant of authority," Cheney recalled in a 1996 PBS "Frontline" documentary. "I was concerned that they might well vote 'no' and that would make life more difficult for us."

But Bush rejected Cheney's advice and asked Congress for a vote in support of the war. The resolution passed -- barely. Had Congress voted no, Cheney later said, he would have urged Bush to launch the Gulf War regardless.

"From a constitutional standpoint, we had all the authority we needed," Cheney said in the 1996 documentary. "If we'd lost the vote in Congress, I would certainly have recommended to the president that we go forward anyway."

As the Gulf War proceeded, Cheney fought with Congress on other fronts. After civilian Pentagon lawyers clashed with military attorneys over the handling of any bodies contaminated by biological weapons, Cheney asked Congress to change the law to place all military attorneys under the control of civilian political appointees. Congress rejected Cheney's proposal. But in March 1992, Cheney's deputy issued an administrative order defying the expressed will of Congress.

At the same time, Cheney was thwarting Congress by refusing to issue contracts for the V-22 Osprey, a plane that was plagued with technical problems. Cheney opposed the V-22 program, but Congress appropriated funds for it.

By refusing to issue contracts, Cheney revived a Nixon-era tactic of "impounding" funds -- refusing to spend money for programs that he didn't like. Congress had passed a law in 1974 to ban impoundment. Cheney, who later said he believes the anti-impoundment law unconstitutionally infringes on executive power, ignored it.

But Congress forced Cheney to back down in July 1992, when his top assistant, David Addington, was nominated to be the Pentagon's general counsel and came before a Senate confirmation hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0098337

"How many ways are there around evading the will of Congress? How many different legal theories do you have?" Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, thundered at Cheney's aide.

"I do not have any, senator," said Addington. He was confirmed only after promising that the Pentagon would restore the military lawyers' independence and issue V-22 contracts as quickly as possible.

Cheney left government after Bill Clinton was elected president in 1992, but he returned as a deeply influential vice president eight years later. His aide Addington became a dominant member of the administration's legal team, and together, Cheney and Addington made the assertion of sweeping executive powers a hallmark of George W. Bush's presidency.

One of Cheney's first acts as vice president was to convene an energy policy task force, inviting energy company lobbyists to suggest a package of tax breaks and other incentives for their companies.

When Congress and watchdog groups requested his task force's records, Cheney successfully fought a court battle to keep them secret, arguing that presidents needed greater power to solicit candid advice. The decision gutted the Federal Advisory Committee Act, a 1972 law in which Congress tried to require such policymaking to be subject to public scrutiny.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, military lawyers objected to the administration's assertion that a president has the power to detain and interrogate terrorism suspects outside the restrictions of the Geneva Conventions. In response, the administration renewed Cheney's attempt to put military lawyers under the control of civilian appointees.

Citing a need for secrecy, the administration also erected new roadblocks to Freedom of Information Act requests, restricted access to historic presidential records, and threatened to prosecute journalists who published classified information using the 1917 anti-spying law -- the same idea Cheney toyed with in 1975.

In signing statements and legal memos, the administration, with Cheney and Addington as its driving force, has repeatedly used the war on terrorism to advance the idea that the president has vast "inherent" authority to bypass laws enacted by Congress. Even when Congress voted, a week after the 9/11 attacks, to authorize the use of military force against Al Qaeda, the administration quickly seized the moment to lay down its marker.

"[Congress cannot] place any limits on the president's determinations as to any terrorist threat, the amount of military force to be used in response, or the method, timing, and nature of the response," the Justice Department asserted in a September 2001 memo solicited by the White House. "These decisions, under our Constitution, are for the president alone to make."

The following year, the administration drew up secret legal opinions informing military and CIA interrogators that the president has the power to authorize them to violate laws banning torture.

"In order to respect the president's inherent constitutional authority to manage a military campaign against Al Qaeda and its allies, [the anti-torture law] must be construed as not applying to interrogations undertaken pursuant to his commander-in-chief authority," said an August 2002 memo, which was leaked to the media only after the abuse of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib came to light.

Then, in December 2005, The New York Times revealed that the administration was wiretapping Americans' international phone calls and e-mails without warrants, violating the 1978 surveillance law.

Three days later, Cheney sat down with reporters and laid out his belief "in a strong, robust executive authority." Bypassing the warrant law, he asserted, was "consistent with the constitutional authority of the president."

Cheney also indicated that he hopes to establish further precedents for the expansion of presidential authority. Listing other statutory constraints on presidential power, he said they "will be tested at some point." When Cheney was asked whether he believed that the pendulum of executive power had swung back far enough in the direction he desired, or whether it needed to swing back further, he demurred.

"I do think that to some extent now, we've been able to restore the legitimate authority of the presidency," he replied.

Charlie Savage is a reporter in the Globe's Washington bureau. E-mail csavage@globe.com.

As Power Shifts In New Congress, Pork May Linger (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 — Senators Ted Stevens of Alaska and Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii are the best of friends in the Senate, so close they call each other brother. Both are decorated veterans of World War II. They have worked together for nearly four decades as senators from the two youngest and farthest-flung states. And they share an almost unrivaled appetite for what some call political pork.

Mr. Stevens, an 83-year-old Republican, and Mr. Inouye, an 82-year-old Democrat, routinely deliver to their states more money per capita in earmarks — the pet projects lawmakers insert into major spending bills — than any other state gets. This year, Alaska received $1.05 billion in earmarks, or $1,677.27 per resident, while Hawaii got $903.9 million, or $746.05 per resident, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan group that tracks such figures.

DOJ_NMG_0098338

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader, and many Democratic candidates have railed for months against wasteful "special interest earmarks" inserted into bills "in the dark of night." Now their party's electoral victories mean that Mr. Stevens will hand Mr. Inouye the gavel of the Senate defense appropriations subcommittee, which presides over the largest pool of discretionary spending and earmarks. But if the Democratic leaders are talking about "earmark reform," that may be news to Mr. Inouye.

"I don't see any monumental changes," Mr. Inouye said in a recent interview. He plans to continue his subcommittee's approach to earmarks, he said. "If something is wrong we should clean house," he said, "but if they can explain it and justify it, I will look at it."

Meet the new cardinals, as the chairmen of the House and Senate appropriations subcommittees are known on Capitol Hill. Many have a lot in common with the Republicans they will succeed.

All have worked for years to climb to their posts, where the authority to grant earmarks puts them among the most powerful lawmakers in Congress. Like Mr. Inouye and Mr. Stevens, many have developed unusual bipartisan camaraderie while divvying up projects. By longstanding, informal agreement, the majority typically doles out about 60 percent of the money for earmarks and lets the minority pass out the rest. And they form a united front against limitations on the earmark process.

"What is good for the goose is good for the gander," Senator Patty Murray, the Washington Democrat who is set to become chairwoman of the transportation subcommittee, said last fall in a speech defending an Alaska Republican's allocation of more than $200 million in federal money for a bridge to remote Gravina, Alaska, with a population of 50. It became notorious as the "Bridge to Nowhere."

"I tell my colleagues, if we start cutting funding for individual projects, your project may be next," Ms. Murray warned. To anyone who might vote against the bridge, Ms. Murray threatened that her subcommittee would be "taking a long, serious look at their projects." Every Democrat on the Appropriations Committee voted against an amendment to strike the bridge, and after threats from Ms. Murray and Mr. Stevens, only 15 senators voted for the amendment. The bridge's future is unclear.

Earmarks became associated with corruption in Congress because of their role in bribery scandals involving the lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Representative Randy Cunningham of California. But the number and cost of such projects has soared for years. The Congressional Research Service found that over the last 12 years, the number of earmarks had tripled to 16,000, worth $64 billion a year. Critics argue that the system fosters waste and cronyism by allowing individual lawmakers to direct federal money to pet projects with little vetting or oversight, often anonymously.

Democratic Congressional leaders have pledged to end the anonymity by requiring disclosure of the lawmakers who sponsor earmarks, and some have proposed ending the practice of "airdropping" items into a bill just before final passage. But the appropriators and their allies often complain that such measures single them out unfairly, and Democratic draft proposals introduced this year left loopholes for many projects.

Some critics argue that the Democrats' proposal to disclose authorship may not do much to curb earmarks. "Transparency would be enough if we had any shame, if you were embarrassed to get an earmark for the National Wild Turkey Federation," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, referring to a $234,000 earmark in a recent agricultural bill. "But Republicans and Democrats have shown that is no longer any embarrassment." Mr. Flake recently recommended to Ms. Pelosi a rule change that would make it easier to strip members' projects out of spending bills, but no one expects either party to take that up anytime soon.

Like their Republican counterparts, many Democratic appropriators consider earmarks a venerable tradition dating to the Constitution, which gives Congress the power of the purse. They argue that lawmakers know their constituents' needs better than bureaucrats do.

"I happen to be a supporter of earmarks, unabashedly," said Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa, the Democrat set to become chairman of the appropriations subcommittee for labor, health and human services. "But I don't call them earmarks. It is 'Congressional directed funding.' "

Fourteen years ago, Mr. Harkin recalled, he started the practice of directing millions of dollars in defense spending each year toward breast cancer research. "Now, was that bad?" Mr. Harkin asked. "If you left it to the Defense Department, they never would have done it."

Many of the new Democratic chairmen are among the most experienced purveyors of political bacon. The next chairman of the full Senate Appropriations Committee is Senator Robert C. Byrd, 89, the West Virginia Democrat who may be the foremost master of the art. Dozens of West Virginia bridges, roads and public buildings bear his name. Among his recent appropriations feats was putting the Coast Guard's Operations System Center, its National Vessel Movement Center and, next summer, its National Maritime Center in his landlocked state, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense.

The elevation of Mr. Inouye, who will oversee $400 billion a year in military spending, is good news for the Hawaiian health care system. He has directed billions in military money to such services, including a $22-million earmark for the Hawaiian Federal

DOJ_NMG_0098339

Health Care Network in the fiscal 2006 defense bill. And his rise may spell bad news for the brown tree snake, a nonnative predator that stalks birds. Mr. Inouye has directed several million dollars a year in spending bills to eradicate the snake from the islands, including $1.7 million in military spending in 2006.

Representative David R. Obey, the Wisconsin Democrat set to become chairman of the full House Appropriations Committee as well as the subcommittee for labor, health and human services, boasts on his Web site of securing for his district a $300,000 grant to a single dairy in Arpin, $6 million in military money to develop an airless tire in Medford and $8 million to research plastic food containers for the military in Rhinelander.

Like many members of Congress, Mr. Obey and his Republican predecessor heading the full committee, Representative Jerry Lewis of California, have relatives in government relations. Mr. Lewis's brother John works for Loma Linda University, a Seventh-day Adventist school in Representative Lewis's district that tops lists of education earmarks, thanks to his influence. A spokesman for Mr. Lewis said his brother did not lobby the federal government.

Mr. Obey's son Craig earns about $117,000 a year as vice president for government affairs at the nonprofit National Parks Conservation Association, according to its tax filings. In an interview, Mr. Obey said he had been a "zealot" about expanding the national parks since before his son was born and that, unlike some Congressional relatives, his son worked for "a public interest organization."

For his part, Mr. Obey said he had previously proposed a rule requiring lawmakers to certify that they had no financial interest in their earmarks requests. "My problem with earmarks is that it has gotten incredibly out of hand" under the Republicans, he said. With such an explosion, "it is damn near impossible to track them and protect the body."

Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, who is set to take back the gavel of the defense subcommittee, has used his authority over military spending to turn the impoverished former steel town of Johnstown, Pa., into a national hub of military contracting. Mr. Murtha recently said in a news release that he had played a role in "creating at least 7,000 defense jobs in and around the 12th District."

Although Mr. Murtha recently lost a bid to become the second in command for House Democrats, the Democratic takeover will still increase his considerable clout. In addition to delivering projects to his district, he has granted military earmarks to other lawmakers to build a singular power base within the House, and, with the Democratic takeover, three of his close allies will become cardinals as well.

One is Representative Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia, who resigned as the top Democrat on the ethics committee amid questions about his earmarks to nonprofits he founded and to a real-estate partner. Mr. Mollohan is expected to become chairman of the Science, State, Justice and Commerce Committee. So far, Democratic leaders have given no indication that they might block his ascent at the subcommittee. Another is Representative Peter J. Visclosky of Indiana, who is poised to become chairman of the Energy and Water Committee. The third, Representative Norm Dicks of Washington, a member of the defense panel, is set to be chairman of the Interior and Environment subcommittee.

Several Democratic appropriators, though, sought to tamp down expectations about how much they could spend. Senator Byron L. Dorgan, the North Dakota Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the energy and water subcommittee, said Democrats were limited by the deficit, the cost of the war in Iraq and their party's pledges of fiscal restraint. "This is going to be a very rough time," Mr. Dorgan said.

Still, he said, he hoped to expand spending on renewable energy sources and, as the senator from a semi-arid state, on water projects.

Ms. Murray, the Washington Democrat, said her party would take a less political approach to earmarks than the Republicans did. She said Republicans had bribed lawmakers with earmarks to persuade them to vote for barebones domestic spending bills. "They stuffed them with earmarks to buy votes," she said. "We are not going to do that."

Still, in an interview with The Honolulu Advertiser the day after the election, Mr. Inouye said he and Mr. Stevens did not plan to rock the boat. "I had a chat with Senator Stevens before the election," Mr. Inouye said. "We pledged to each other that no matter what happens, we will continue with our tested system of bipartisanship, and we've been doing this for the past 25 years, and it's worked."

Democratic "Old Bulls" To Take Charge (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Rep. John D. Dingell was new to Congress, Buddy Holly ruled the charts, Rosa Parks refused to budge from her seat on a segregated bus and Dwight D. Eisenhower occupied the White House.

And on Capitol Hill, congressional committee chairmen ruled like feudal lords over federal policy, pursuing pet causes and waging vendettas with near impunity.

DOJ_NMG_0098340

In time, Dingell became one of the most fearsome.

Now Dingell, the longest-serving member of the House, and other veteran Democrats are poised to take charge of the most powerful committees when Congress convenes in January.

In the four decades that Democrats were the dominant party, chairmen's foibles, however egregious, did not threaten the party's grip on power. But with narrower margins of control and an electorate willing to switch allegiances, there is no such assumption these days.

The question now is whether the "old bulls" like Dingell know it, and if they know it, whether they can adjust.

"This majority is not the kind of majority that we used to have, and it remains to be seen whether they understand that," said one senior Democratic staffer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Building an empire

For 14 years, Dingell, a Michigan Democrat, presided over the Energy and Commerce Committee. Under his forceful and often uncompromising leadership, the panel expanded into an empire that famously claimed jurisdiction over "everything that moves, burns or is sold" in the United States.

It was in part because of the reputation of longtime chairmen like Dingell that former Speaker Newt Gingrich, who led the Republican insurgency that took control of Congress in 1995, imposed term limits for committee chairs, restricting them to three consecutive two-year terms.

But the Democrats have kept the tradition of assigning committee chairmanships by seniority. And that will elevate some of the most veteran — and oldest — members of Congress to committee leadership posts.

All but one of the new Senate chairmen are at least 60, and three are in their 80s. Three also have served for more than four decades.

The oldest is Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), who is 89 and is about to retake the helm of the Senate Appropriations Committee. He sometimes tires, aides say, but he still has full command of his senses and the respect of his peers.

It is in the House, however, where the phenomenon has attracted more attention. That's partly because Democrats have been shut out of power for 12 years, while their Senate colleagues have been in the minority for just four. And it's partly because of the irascible personalities of some of the incoming chairmen, known collectively as the "old bulls."

The three best-known are Dingell, Rep. John Conyers Jr. from a neighboring district in Michigan, and Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York. They are 80, 77, and 76 years old, respectively.

No green bananas

About two-thirds of the incoming House chairmen are older than 60.

"I don't buy green bananas," Rangel quipped recently, referring to his age.

Conyers, who served on the panels that considered the impeachment of Presidents Nixon and Clinton and who has mused about the possibility of impeaching the current president, is expected to take the helm of the Judiciary Committee.

Rangel, one of the most outspoken members of Congress, is set to lead the Ways and Means Committee, which sets tax policy.

On Capitol Hill, staffers trade stories about the old bulls and their infirmities, shaking their heads over Dingell's hearing problems or Conyers' "senior moments." But the same staffers insist that the incoming chairmen are not only capable of taking the reins, but of handling them better than anyone else.

"There is a lot to the concept of seniority," said Jeremy Mayer, who studies Congress at George Mason University in Virginia.

"Should the people who have been in Congress the longest have the most power? The simple answer is yes, because they have more experience and they can't be steamrolled by the administration. Dingell, for instance, knows all the intricacies of the funding of at least seven federal agencies."

Another argument in favor of seniority is that it limits intraparty fighting.

The party leadership elections this month illustrated how divisive competition for leadership posts can be. A rigid, impersonal system for naming chairmen is one way to keep the peace.

"Seniority has always been a way to prevent bloodshed," Mayer said.

The downside is that it can foster autocratic behavior. In the past, Democratic leaders found the chairmen hard to control, in part because their positions did not depend on the party, and the chairmen tended to outlast the leadership.

Steven Smith, a social sciences professor who studies government and political parties at Washington University in St. Louis, says political parties have evolved since then.

"Before the 1980s, committee chairs pretty much went their own way. But since the 1980s, chairs are expected to look out for the party's overall interest," he said. "There will be some tension between committee chairs and party leaders on this."

DOJ_NMG_0098341

One potential point of tension is that many of today's old bulls are old-fashioned liberals. Dingell introduces a proposal for nationalized healthcare in every session of Congress. Conyers has used his staff to pursue favorite concerns of left-wing bloggers, such as voting irregularities in the 2004 elections.

By contrast, the freshman class of Democrats includes a number of centrist or conservative Democrats, many of them uncomfortable with liberal positions on such issues as abortion, gun control and same-sex marriage.

Democratic leaders have already set their sights on 2008, with the goal of regaining the White House and expanding their margin of control in Congress.

"Democrats know that they won this election by appealing to the middle of the spectrum," Smith said. "And they know that the first rule is to do no harm, to not alienate the folks who gave them the election."

Doing that will require the incoming House Speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), herself a traditional liberal, to keep her chairmen focused on issues that promote the party's broader agenda, not necessarily their own favorite issues.

"For some, it will take a little relearning," said Smith. "They will have to make a choice: Do they want to start making a record for themselves and their party going into 2008? And what kind of record do they want it to be — a record of legislation, or a record of position-taking and rhetoric?"

Toeing the line

So far, the old bulls have stayed on message — mostly.

Conyers has stopped talking about impeaching President Bush.

Dingell has lauded the benefits of bipartisanship while promising tougher oversight of the administration.

And Rangel has remained coy about the fate of the tax cuts passed by Republicans in recent years, though he caused some heartburn when he brought up his desire to bring back the draft.

Democratic insiders say the old bulls won't overreach. They say they know better than most what it's like to gain and then lose a majority. And they haven't been in a deep freeze for the last 12 years; rather, they've been strategizing with their colleagues about how to return to power.

Steve Elmendorf, who served as senior advisor to former Rep. Richard Gephardt, who led the Democrats in both the majority and the minority, says there are two big reasons why no one in the party even whispers about challenging the old bulls, no matter how old or intemperate.

"One, a lot of these chairman worked hard to help win. And when you win, the people who helped are going to move up," Elmendorf said. "Two, they have a tremendous amount of institutional knowledge. They served in the majority, and they can hit the ground running."

Success Of Drug Plan Challenges Democrats (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

It sounded simple enough on the campaign trail: Free the government to negotiate lower drug prices and use the savings to plug a big gap in Medicare's new prescription-drug benefit. But as Democrats prepare to take control of Congress, they are struggling to keep that promise without wrecking a program that has proven cheaper and more popular than anyone imagined.

House Democrats have vowed to act quickly after taking power in January to lift a ban on Medicare negotiations with drugmakers, which they hope will save as much as $190 billion over a decade. But House leaders have yet to settle on a strategy and acknowledge that negotiation is, in any case, unlikely to generate sufficient savings to fill the "doughnut hole," the much-criticized gap in coverage that forces millions of seniors to pay 100 percent of drug costs for a few weeks or months each year.

Drug-company lobbyists, Bush administration officials and many congressional Republicans are preparing to block any effort to increase federal control over drug prices, saying the Medicare benefit is working well. They contend that instead of saving money, government negotiations could raise drug prices for all consumers while limiting choices for people on Medicare.

"This is going to be much more of a morass than people think," said Marilyn Moon, director of the health program at the American Institutes for Research and a former trustee of the Social Security and Medicare trust funds. Negotiating drug prices is "a feel-good kind of answer, but it's not one that is easy to imagine how you put into practice."

The Medicare drug benefit, one of the Bush administration's signature domestic programs, was created in 2003 and took effect in January. It has enrolled 22.5 million seniors, some of whom had no previous drug coverage.

Polls indicate that more than 80 percent of enrollees are satisfied, even though nearly half chose plans with no coverage in the doughnut hole, a gap that opens when a senior's drug costs reach $2,250 and closes when out-of-pocket expenses reach $3,600. By the latest estimates, 3 million to 4 million seniors will hit the doughnut hole this year and pay full price for drugs while also paying drug-plan premiums.

DOJ_NMG_0098342

The cost of the program has been lower than expected, about $26 billion in 2006, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. The cost was projected to rise to $45 billion next year, but Medicare has received new bids indicating that its average per-person subsidy could drop by 15 percent in 2007, to $79.90 a month.

Urban Institute President Robert D. Reischauer, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office, called that a remarkable record for a new federal program.

Initially, he said, people were worried no private plans would participate. "Then too many plans came forward," Reischauer said. "Then people said it's going to cost a fortune. And the price came in lower than anybody thought. Then people like me said they're low-balling the prices the first year and they'll jack up the rates down the line. And, lo and behold, the prices fell again. And the reaction was, 'We've got to have the government negotiate lower prices.' At some point you have to ask: What are we looking for here?"

Republicans contend that Democrats were looking for a campaign issue.

In the Nov. 7 elections, public anger over the doughnut hole helped many Democratic candidates, who pointed to the ban on government negotiations and accused Republicans of selling out to the pharmaceutical industry.

Republicans, by and large, did a poor job of defending the program, said Thomas A. Scully, a Republican and the former head of the federal unit that runs Medicare. He played a key role in creating the drug benefit.

"Black voters, poor voters -- people who generally vote Democratic -- they got the biggest benefit in 40 years and nobody told them that," Scully said.

According to those involved in the 2003 negotiations, even some Democratic bills to create a Medicare drug benefit included a ban on direct government negotiations. The reason: Seniors purchase half of all prescription drugs. The drug industry argued that a government program representing seniors would not negotiate prices, it would set them.

If government price controls were effective, the theory goes, they could significantly lower drug-company profits and discourage medical innovation. If price controls were not effective, they could drive prices higher. If companies were required to sell to Medicare at 15 percent off the average wholesale price, for example, they might just raise the wholesale price.

"At the extreme, if everybody gets a discount, then nobody does," said Mark B. McClellan, who took over from Scully in running Medicare and recently left the job.

Proponents say the program, as it now operates, avoids that problem by relying on dozens of private insurers, which bid to offer coverage to Medicare recipients. Some offer low premiums and lots of generic drugs, while others have high premiums but offer brand-name drugs and full doughnut-hole coverage. Medicare averages the bids and sets a per-person subsidy. Pressure falls on the insurers to negotiate the best drug prices.

Consumer advocates contend that if Medicare were permitted to negotiate prices, its purchasing power would produce drug discounts similar to those obtained by the Veterans Affairs Department, which covers 4.4 million people. As it is, Medicare prices are significantly higher than VA prices, according to Families USA, a nonprofit association of health-care consumers that analyzed 20 drugs commonly prescribed to seniors.

Even Medicaid, the federal health program for the poor, appears to employ better negotiators than the private Medicare plans. On Jan. 1, 6 million elderly and disabled people were switched from Medicaid pharmacy plans to the new Medicare program. Overnight, many drugmakers began selling the same drugs at higher prices. Pfizer, for example, reported saving $325 million in Medicaid discounts during the first six months of this year "due primarily to the impact of" the Medicare drug benefit, according to a company report to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"At some point, someone has to stand up to these industries that are doing so well in this program," said Robert M. Hayes, president of the Medicare Rights Center, a New York advocacy group. "It only makes sense that if the industries do less well, the taxpayers and the consumers will do better."

Medicare officials say it's not fair to compare their prices with those of Medicaid and Veterans Affairs, which do not reflect certain overhead costs in their drug prices and offer a limited number of drugs. Limiting choice would be unacceptable to many Medicare beneficiaries, said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. "I don't think seniors want the government in their medicine cabinets," he said.

For now, it is not clear how aggressively Democrats are willing to push price negotiation. Ideas range from simply repealing the ban on negotiations -- which would accomplish little if the Bush administration refuses to negotiate -- to creating a separate, government-run Medicare drug program with strong negotiating power.

Rep. Fortney "Pete" Stark (D-Calif.), who is in line to become chairman of a key health subcommittee, said he prefers a middle path, with Medicare setting ceilings from which private insurers could negotiate downward.

But Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the incoming Senate Finance chairman, is cool to the idea of government negotiation, and has committed only to holding hearings to "determine what the result would be of eliminating" the no-negotiation clause.

DOJ_NMG_0098343

W.J. "Billy" Tauzin, president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said the drug lobby will "aggressively defend" the current plan. But John C. Rother, policy director for AARP, the powerful lobby for elderly Americans, said he has no doubt that the next Congress will give government some role in negotiating Medicare drug prices.

"This is an idea that's favored by 90 percent of the American public," Rother said. "It's not like you have to convince the American public that this is a good idea."

On Drug Prices, Are Democrats In A Fix? (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — With millions of seniors facing premium hikes for their Medicare prescription plans, Democrats say they have a solution: Use the government's massive buying power to bargain for rock-bottom drug prices. The Department of Veterans Affairs does it for 5 million patients, they point out, so why not Medicare with its 43 million?

Medicare already sets rates for hospitals, doctors and medical equipment such as power wheelchairs — as well as drugs administered in doctors' offices. It was only the Republicans' ideological commitment to the private sector that led them to bar the government from negotiating discounts with drug companies, Democrats contend.

But the VA model may not be readily adaptable to Medicare, some independent experts say. And policy differences among Democrats, along with the Bush administration's opposition to government price-setting, may further complicate the task of reaching a goal that Democrats have set for themselves when they take over Congress in January.

In addition, newly announced discounts by drug companies could have an impact on the Democrats' effort before it gets started. At least one major manufacturer is offering help to seniors who have trouble paying for their drugs.

"From a rhetorical perspective, Democrats may feel like they gain a lot with this issue, but there are many substantive hurdles that the government faces in trying to negotiate prices," said Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm that tracks the Medicare prescription program.

"If you look historically at the government's experience in trying to regulate prices, it's poor."

VA's lower prices

Although costs for the Medicare drug program are lower than the government originally projected, there is evidence that prices could be lower still. A recent Consumers Union study of the prices charged in South Florida for six widely used drugs found that the Veterans Administration's average prices were 54% lower than Medicare's.

"Medicare is overwhelmingly the largest purchaser, and it's ridiculous for Medicare not to get the best deal of all institutional purchasers," said Ron Pollack, executive director of the advocacy group Families USA. The VA's experience shows what the potential could be, he added.

Yet applying the VA approach to Medicare may prove difficult. For one thing, Medicare is much larger and more diverse.

VA officials can negotiate major price discounts because they restrict the number of drugs on their coverage list. Instead of seven or eight drugs for a given medical problem, the VA list may contain three or four. If a drug company fails to offer a hefty discount, its product may not make the cut.

For example, VA beneficiaries can get Zocor for high cholesterol, but not Lipitor. In all, the VA covers about 1,300 medications. By comparison, the most popular Medicare plan — AARP MedicareRx — covers about 4,300.

But VA patients who want drugs that are not on the department's list must go outside the system.

In other words, the VA offers lower drug prices, but fewer choices.

American consumers have repeatedly resisted efforts to save money on medical care by restricting choice. Health maintenance organizations, for example, were once seen as the answer to rising healthcare costs, but millions of people rejected the approach, saying they wanted the freedom to choose their doctors.

One prominent advocate of government-negotiated prices has had a change of heart. Tommy G. Thompson, President Bush's first Health and Human Services secretary, once expressed regret that he hadn't been given the power to bargain.

But in a recent interview he said: "This plan is working much better than ever anticipated. When you've got a law that is working well in the federal government, why change it?"

If Medicare had the legal authority to negotiate prices, some experts predict it would do well in categories of drugs where there are lots of choices, such as blood pressure pills. But for new or cutting-edge drugs, a manufacturer could have the upper hand. A company could launch a television ad blitz to pressure Congress into raising Medicare prices.

"For categories of drugs that are not competitive, my guess is the manufacturer would not cave in on prices," said economist John E. Calfee of the business-oriented American Enterprise Institute. "Those are the drugs that have defied price controls."

Other experts say it wouldn't be that easy to push Medicare around.

DOJ_NMG_0098344

"The VA had to resort to a preferred drug list, but I don't think that Medicare would have to restrict its list very much because it is such a huge purchaser," said Dr. David Blumenthal, a professor of medicine and public health at Harvard University. "Medicare's power in the marketplace is such that I think every manufacturer would have to take its prices."

Two possible paths

House Democrats have promised action in the first 100 hours of the new Congress to give Medicare bargaining power. One poll showed that 77% of Americans supported the idea.

When the GOP-controlled Congress created the Medicare prescription plan in 2003, it expressly barred the government from negotiating prices on the theory that private insurance plans — which were assigned the job of delivering the benefit — could do a better job of getting discounts.

Critics called it a giveaway to the pharmaceutical industry.

"In the current program, there are no protections for beneficiaries that aren't exceeded ten times over by benefits to the pharmaceutical industry," said Rep. Pete Stark (D-Fremont), who is expected to lead the House subcommittee that oversees Medicare.

Democrats haven't spelled out a specific proposal, and Stark said there were at least two possibilities.

One would repeal the prohibition on negotiating and order Medicare to set a top price for each drug available under the program. Private insurers would still be free to bargain for even lower prices.

Such an approach would be similar to how Canada and European countries control prescription drug prices. Canadian prices are 30% to 60% lower than in the U.S. Some critics say Canadian price controls mean that patients there are not always able to get the latest medications.

The other possibility is to set up a Medicare-run plan to compete against the private plans. That is, Medicare would set up a plan using drug prices it negotiated with manufacturers. The plan, available nationwide, would compete with the privately operated plans — encouraging private plans to bargain harder for lower prices.

The two approaches aren't mutually exclusive, Stark said.

The proposal to let the government bargain with manufacturers could face additional hurdles in the Senate, where a prominent Democrat is among the leading skeptics.

As chairman of the finance committee, Sen. Max Baucus of Montana will have jurisdiction over Medicare. This year he was one of only two Democrats to vote against allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices.

A spokeswoman said Baucus planned to hold hearings next year but had not made up his mind on the issue.

The drug industry hopes that even if it loses the first high-profile battle in the House, it can still win the legislative war.

"We fully expect that Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi will deliver on her political promise, but after that we are equally confident that we will have an opportunity to educate both the members of Congress and beneficiaries across America about the benefits of the current program," said Ken Johnson, senior vice president of communications at the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

Corporate outreach

Reaching out to seniors in the Medicare prescription plan, one major drug company has launched a discount program that softens one of the most worrisome gaps in the current benefit, known as the doughnut hole. Under that provision — created to save money for the government — seniors must pay the full cost after their annual drug spending exceeds $2,250; coverage kicks in again once the total exceeds $5,100.

To help seniors caught in the doughnut hole, AstraZeneca has created a program called AZ Medicine & Me.

It makes brand-name medications such as the widely used breast cancer drug Arimidex available to qualifying seniors at $25 or less for a 30-day supply. Arimidex could cost ten times that at regular prices.

The plan was announced two days after the election.

The timing was purely coincidental, said AstraZeneca spokeswoman Abigail Baron. The company's plan had been in the works for months and was announced as soon as it received government approval, she explained.

Said Johnson: "I think you are going to see more and more of our companies trying to assist seniors who hit the doughnut hole."

ricardo.alonso-zaldivar@latimes.com

Here Come The Economic Populists (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

FOR years, the Clinton wing of the Democratic Party, exercising a lock on the party's economic policies, argued that the economy could achieve sustained growth only if markets were allowed to operate unfettered and globally.

DOJ_NMG_0098345

Overcoming protests from labor unions, a traditional constituency, the Clinton administration vigorously supported free trade agreements like Nafta and agreed to China's admission into the World Trade Organization. If there was damage to workers, then the Clinton camp proposed dealing with it after it occurred — through wage insurance, for example, or worker retraining and other safety-net measures.

This approach coincided with a period of economic prosperity, low unemployment and falling deficits. Over time, this combination — called Rubinomics after the Clinton administration's Treasury secretary, Robert E. Rubin — became the Democratic establishment's accepted model for the future.

Not anymore. With the Democrats now a majority in Congress, and disquiet over globalization growing, a party faction that has been powerless — the economic populists — is emerging and strongly promoting an alternative to Rubinomics.

The populists argue that the national income has flowed disproportionately into corporate coffers and the nation's wealthiest households, and that the imbalance has grown worse in recent years. They want to rethink America's role in the global economy. They would intervene in markets and regulate them much more than the Rubinites would. For a start, they would declare a moratorium on new trade agreements until clauses were included that would, for example, restrict layoffs and protect incomes.

"We are at a point where the Reagan era might finally be over, including the eight years of Bill Clinton," said Jeff Faux, a fellow at the Economic Policy Institute, a labor-oriented research group partly financed by the A.F.L.-C.I.O. "The historic juncture here is whether the Democrats can come up with policies that get to the level of the problem."

The split is not over the damage from globalization. Mr. Rubin and his followers increasingly say that globalization has not brought job security or rising incomes to millions of Americans. The "share of the pie may even be shrinking" for vast segments of the middle class, Mr. Rubin's successor as Treasury secretary under President Clinton, Lawrence H. Summers, recently wrote in an op-ed in The Financial Times. And the populists certainly agree.

But the Rubin camp argues that regulating trade, or imposing other market restrictions, would be self-defeating.

"You pay a steep economic cost when you adopt market interventions," said Peter R. Orszag, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a leader of the Rubin group. He argued, for example, that restrictions on layoffs "would impede the ability of markets to reallocate labor efficiently."

As a result, the Rubinites contend, there would be slower economic growth and less national income to distribute — equally or unequally. It was an argument that President Clinton embraced 15 years ago in pushing Congress to approve the North American Free Trade Agreement. For workers who were damaged by free trade, the administration offered a safety net, not immunity from damage.

The economic populists argue that the trade agreements themselves are the problem. They cite several studies showing that more jobs shifted to Mexico as a result of Nafta than were created in the United States to serve the Mexican market.

"I don't see Congress passing any bilateral trade agreement that does not have strong labor and environmental standards written into it," Representative Sherrod Brown of Ohio, a Democrat just elected to the Senate, said in an interview last week.

Economic populists in and out of Congress are organizing to push their proposals, coalescing around the Economic Policy Institute. The A.F.L.-C.I.O. is a very visible member of this coalition. Unions have gained political influence because of their get-out-the vote role in battleground states like Ohio, where Democrats made substantial gains in the midterm election.

"We feel we have a stronger voice now in the deliberations of the Democratic Party," said Ronald Blackwell, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s chief economist.

Just as the populists have organized, tentatively calling their group Shared Prosperity, so has the Democratic establishment. Its counterpart is "the Hamilton Project," formed last spring to elaborate policies in anticipation of a Democratic Congress and, in 2008, a Democratic victor in the presidential election. Mr. Orszag, who was a senior economist in the Clinton administration, directs the project. The financing comes from wealthy Democrats, among them Mr. Rubin.

As the two groups face off, Lawrence Mishel, president of the Economic Policy Institute, contends that the populists are pushing much harder than the Rubinites for government-subsidized universal health care. They also favor expanding Social Security to offset the decline in pension coverage in the private sector.

Apart from such differences, there are nevertheless crucial issues on which the groups agree. Both would sponsor legislation that reduced college tuition, mainly through tax credits or lower interest rates on student loans. Both would expand the earned-income tax credit to subsidize the working poor. Both would have the government negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare's prescription drug plan. And despite their relentless criticisms of President Bush's tax cuts, neither the populists nor the Rubinite regulars would try to roll them back now, risking a veto that the Democrats lack the votes to override.

"Any solution that you put up is going to get knocked down before you put it up," Mr. Rubin said in an interview last week, referring mainly to taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0098346

Noting the Democrats' slim majority in Congress, he added, "I think you need a process that involves the president of the United States, the leaders of both parties and the leaders of both houses."

The threat of a Bush veto affects another piece of the Democratic agenda — an increase in the minimum wage. Both Democratic factions support a bill, to be introduced in January, that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15. The increase would come in three steps, spread over more than two years, with the final $7.25 not reached until spring 2009 at the earliest.

That is the same $7.25 that would be effective today if Congress had given its approval when Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts first proposed the increase in 2004. Yet Mr. Kennedy is the chief sponsor of the new attempt to raise the minimum, his strategy being that the $7.25, stretched out to 2009, is mild enough to be acceptable to Mr. Bush and many Republicans.

"After we successfully pass this increase," Mr. Kennedy said last week, "I plan to introduce a new proposal right away that will ensure that minimum-wage workers never again fall so far behind in our economy."

The minimum wage debate illustrates that in the end, economic policy might be determined less by partisan goals than by the constraints of pragmatic politics.

Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, a Democrat whose New York district includes Kingston and other economically struggling cities, asserts that the federal minimum should be $10 an hour now. Going that high right away is unrealistic, he acknowledged, but in the Congressional debate over the Kennedy proposal, Mr. Hinchey will push to have the $7.25 effective no later than the spring 2008, not 2009.

"If I went out on the street in Kingston," Mr. Hinchey said, "and said to people that the minimum wage is not going up to $7.25 until 2009, they would say to me, 'That is all the Democrats are going to do? Why did I vote for you?' "

OTHER NEWS:

State Chiefs Credit Dean For Victory (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 26, 2006

Democratic state chairmen, decrying postelection bickering, say the party's gains were in large part a result of National Chairman Howard Dean's 50-state strategy, which helped make deep inroads into Republican territory.

The state chairmen, describing themselves as angered by infighting among party leaders in the House of Representatives as well as criticism of Mr. Dean by two prominent Democratic campaign consultants, credited the Dean strategy for their victories.

The efforts of Mr. Dean, the former presidential candidate and Vermont governor, put them in a stronger position for the 2008 race for the White House, the chairmen said.

"Those folks who are criticizing him do not understand this is not a two-year strategy, but a 10-year or longer strategy to reclaim voters in the Midwest, West and South," said Lawrence Gates, the Democratic chairman in Kansas.

Campaign consultants James Carville and Stan Greenberg have contended that Mr. Dean did not provide enough funding to win more seats as the Democrats reclaimed power in Congress.

But Mr. Gates said Mr. Dean's state-partnership program, which placed three to five full-time organizers in each of the 50 states, resulted in "a tremendously successful cycle for us in Kansas."

In the heavily Republican state, Democrats kept a hold on the governor's office, denied Republican Rep. Jim Ryun's bid for a sixth term and made gains in the Republican-dominated state legislature.

New Mexico's Democratic chairman, John Wertheim, said additional organizers and funds provided by Mr. Dean increased party turnout and helped Democrats make "huge gains in the state legislature and win control of all but one constitutional office in the state."

Mr. Gates, Mr. Wertheim and other chairmen said there was unanimous support in their ranks for the Dean plan.

"Carville and the other Washington insiders don't know what they're talking about," one chairman said.

In an analysis of the elections last week, Mr. Carville attacked Mr. Dean for not taking fuller advantage of the anti-Republican wave by pouring more funds into voter-turnout efforts in 14 House contests where Republicans held on to their seats by one percentage point or less.

Charging that Mr. Dean "should be held accountable" for those losses, Mr. Carville asked, "Do we want to go into '08 with a C-minus general at the DNC?"

DOJ_NMG_0098347

Other Democratic campaign officials have been critical of Mr. Dean's emphasis on his 50-state organizing strategy, including Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee fought with Mr. Dean over funding for House races. He, Mr. Carville and Mr. Greenberg were all White House political advisers to President Clinton.

The internal bickering erupted during a parallel battle within the Democrats' leadership ranks between House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and incoming Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who won his post over Mrs. Pelosi's choice, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

Party chairmen were reluctant to publicly criticize their leadership, but some made it clear they did not think the latest squabbles were good for the party's image as it prepares to take control of Congress in January.

"To fight like this in public is embarrassing for our party," an official said.

"Democrats have been doing this for 35 years. A little success causes us to start bickering again," Mr. Gates said. "The Democrats are a feisty, independent-minded bunch. We'll have our family fights, and then we'll go on together."

But pollster John Zogby said the carping and postelection leadership fights signaled deeper problems for the Democrats and their party's future.

"This election was a rare opportunity for the Democrats. The Republicans were so wounded, you've got to ask why the Democrats did not pick up 50 seats, and we're seeing the answer right now. They couldn't agree on a campaign message, they can't agree on their leadership and they don't seem to be able to agree on anything," Mr. Zogby said.

But even some of Mr. Dean's strongest defenders acknow-ledged they sometimes wondered whether more money for voter turnout might have tipped a close race into the Democrats' win column.

"There were not a shortage of resources in New Mexico," Mr. Wertheim said. But, he added, "I might have tried to put more expenditures in chasing absentee ballots. I probably could have put more money into that if I had asked for it. It might have helped on the margins."

He noted that as things turned out, a Republican incumbent, Rep. Heather A. Wilson, won re-election by a razor-thin 875 votes.

The Hill May Look Steep For Republicans In 2008 (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

As the 2006 congressional campaign fades from memory, the 2008 Republican campaign to retake the House and Senate will get underway in coming months.

This year, scandal and a strong anti-GOP tide were fortuitous forces for Democrats, who picked up seats that were squarely in Republican territory. Those seats are likely to be top prospects for Republicans to recapture in 2008.

In contrast, Democratic gains in swing districts in the Midwest and Democratic-leaning districts in the Northeast will be much tougher for Republicans to seize.

Target No. 1 for the GOP may well be Tom DeLay's old district in Texas. Former majority leader DeLay resigned earlier this year amid campaign finance charges, and courts said the GOP could not name a replacement on the ballot.

In a district where President Bush got 65 percent of the vote in 2004 some believed Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the Republican write-in candidate, could eke out a victory against Democrat Nick Lampson, but Lampson won.

Similarly, Republicans will probably target former representative Mark Foley's district in Florida. His safe seat turned into a tossup after Foley resigned in the page scandal that consumed Washington in the last part of the campaign. There was not enough time for the Republicans to name a replacement candidate on the ballot, according to Florida law, and Democrat Tim Mahoney won against Joe Negron, the Republican stand-in, in a close race.

Other scandal-plagued seats Republicans may target in 2008 include former representative Robert W. Ney's Ohio district and Rep. Don Sherwood's Pennsylvania district. Other heavily Republican seats captured by the Democrats include two in Indiana, one in Kansas and one in North Carolina.

But even if Republicans were to take back these seats, they would have to win about six others to take the House in 2008 -- and those six are not so clear. The Democrats will have roughly a 14-seat advantage in the House.

On the Senate side, the GOP faces more trouble. The Republicans need at least one seat -- and maybe two, depending on who wins the presidential race -- to take back the upper chamber. But while 12 Democrats are up for reelection in 2008, 22 Republicans are.

Only a few Democrats and Republicans, however, are considered vulnerable. Still, Republicans could be buffeted by a string of retirements that would make the field more competitive. As of now, the two most vulnerable Democratic senators appear to be Tim Johnson (S.D.) and Mary Landrieu (La.), while the most vulnerable Republicans are Wayne Allard (Colo.), Norm Coleman (Minn.) and John E. Sununu (N.H.).TV Ads Exceed Coverage

DOJ_NMG_0098348

Television viewers in crucial Midwest states got more political information in the weeks leading up to the midterm elections from campaign advertisements than from news coverage, according to a new study.

In the seven markets studied, newscasts aired almost 4 1/2 minutes of paid political ads during a 30-minute broadcast, while only offering 1 minute 43 seconds of election news coverage.

The study was done by the Midwest News Index, a project of the University of Wisconsin's NewsLab, with support by the Joyce Foundation, a nonprofit affiliated with political reform organizations. The report studied major markets in Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin.

Most news coverage, moreover, focused on political strategy, with far less examining policy differences among candidates, according to the report. More than 10 percent of news stories were about or featured political ads.

"The data here are unambiguous: Local television news provides less news on politics than many other topics and the coverage is overwhelmingly characterized by stories on strategy, horse race, and the game of politics," Ken Goldstein, a political science professor at Wisconsin, said in a statement. "Any intelligent debate needs to begin from that starting point."

News stories, on average, lasted 76 seconds, shorter than the 89 seconds recorded in a similar study in 2002. About two in five election stories aired during the final week of the campaign. While much of the attention was focused on the horse race for Congress, one in four election stories in the Midwest looked at the state's gubernatorial race.

Denver Poised To Land '08 Democratic Convention (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, November 26, 2006

DENVER -- The Mile High City is enjoying a surge of momentum in its bid for the 2008 Democratic National Convention, thanks to Colorado's electoral tilt to the left and a well-timed burst of union activity.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is expected to announce the convention site in early December, and some Denver residents already are predicting their city will trump New York as the party's pick.

"I think we're a shoo-in," said Jon Caldara, president of the Independence Institute, a conservative think tank. "The Democratic Party should be rewarding the success of Democrats here because of this year's incredible election sweep."

In a state where Democratic registration ranks third behind that of Republican and unaffiliated, the Democrats reclaimed the governor's office after an eight-year Republican run, bolstered their majorities in the state legislature and captured a previously Republican House seat.

"We believed all along that if we elected a Democratic governor, our chances would be stronger," said Denver City Council member Rosemary Rodriguez, who also sits on the Denver 2008 Host Committee.

Mrs. Rodriguez noted that Denver, which last hosted a national party convention in 1908, made unsuccessful bids to host the 2000 and 2004 Democratic conventions. "We're always a bridesmaid," she said, "but I think it's finally our time."

Those previous campaigns were pretty much doomed from the start as a result of one glaring flaw: Denver had no unionized hotels. The city's private sector has long been cool to union activity, and organized labor holds a virtual veto over the Democratic Party's convention sites.

"Denver hasn't needed it [labor organizing]. The hotel industry in general takes pretty good care of its employees," said Ilene Kamsler, president of the Colorado Hotel and Lodging Association and a convention committee member.

At the same time, she said, "it's advantageous to have a union hotel because I don't think we would get the convention without it."

In April, the Denver Area Labor Federation voted to oppose the city's convention bid, citing the lack of a unionized hotel. But in late September, employees at the year-old Hyatt Denver Convention Center Hotel announced they had unionized.

Credit Mrs. Rodriguez for encouraging labor to take another stab at organizing in Denver. She met with AFL-CIO representatives earlier this year to extol the benefits of a unionized hotel in downtown Denver.

"At the meetings, I said, 'This would be good for all of us. The Democrats won't write us off immediately. It's good for the West, and it fits in with Howard Dean's 50-state strategy,' " Mrs. Rodriguez said.

Making the process more difficult was the hotel's neutrality agreement. Built with funding from a 1999 bond election, the Hyatt is run by the city hotel authority and management is forbidden from interfering in union organizing.

As a result, the mayor and City Council were unable to assist or endorse labor efforts to unionize the hotel, Mrs. Rodriguez said. "They [union organizers] were disgruntled about that, I'll be honest," she said.

Unite Here, a hotel-workers union, ultimately gained a majority of signatures in a "card-check election," in which workers only have to sign a card to approve union representation. The process allowed organizers to move much more quickly than they would have under a secret-ballot election.

"It was serendipitous timing, certainly," said Debbie Willhite, executive director of the convention committee.

DOJ_NMG_0098349

Unless, of course, you're a Republican. "The downside is that the Democrats will have their big party, leave after a week," Mr. Caldara said, "and we'll be stuck with a union hotel."

Romney Leaving Mass. With Mixed Record (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

BOSTON -- He has been a successful venture capitalist and management consultant, and he saved the tainted 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympics from scandal. But it is his single term as Massachusetts governor that is Mitt Romney's chief credential in his bid for the Republican nomination for president.

He began his term four years ago on a high note, rescuing the state from an inherited budget deficit. But now, as he prepares to leave office and focus full time on his White House aspirations, his tenure is being viewed in a more mixed fashion.

While he can point to a major policy success in health care, his relationship with the Democratic-controlled legislature that made it possible is in tatters. His efforts to challenge the Democrats and promote Republican candidates for the legislature failed. His partner in the statehouse, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, lost a bid to succeed him. And Romney is leaving office with the state GOP weaker than when he arrived.

Massachusetts is a liberal state and was the first in the nation to permit same-sex marriage. But Romney is a staunch conservative who finds himself running against all that his state symbolizes to national Republican voters -- he opposes single-sex marriage, stem cell research and abortion. That may help him with GOP conservatives who hold sway in the party's primaries. But if he wins the nomination, Romney could find himself in the same position as Al Gore in 2000 -- losing his home state in the general election.

In fact, Romney has commented that if he had known he was going to seek the presidency, he probably would have chosen to plant his flag not in Massachusetts but in Michigan, where his father, George Romney, served as governor and where the political culture is more compatible with his conservatism.

In a recent interview reflecting on his administration, Romney said he accomplished his main goals of balancing the budget, resisting any general tax increase and launching initiatives that can spur growth. He said he has shown he can surround himself with smart advisers and set high expectations.

"I am used to debating things back and forth," he said. Credited even by critics with having an agile mind, Romney said he has learned to manage by "hiring people smarter than I am and then arguing with them," adding: "I will by nature disagree when everybody has the same view; I want to hear an alternative."

Romney has run Massachusetts's government with a handful of close aides, many of them drawn from Bain & Co., the consulting firm whose venture capital arm he ran. It is top-down management, designed to keep control firmly in Romney's hands and to deliver a single, upbeat message to voters through a relentless public relations offensive.

Even before he was sworn in, Romney ordered a reorganization of the executive branch, designed to improve the coordination of government services. Warned by a predecessor, Gov. William F. Weld (R), that the departments of transportation and environment were perpetually at war, Romney ordered them to join the housing and energy agencies in a new Office for Commonwealth Development. To the surprise of many business supporters, he named Douglas Foy, a prominent environmentalist, to head the super-agency, which has worked to concentrate business development and housing close to transit lines and reduce sprawl.

Romney ordered a similar consolidation of the business, finance and economic agencies into another super-department and picked another Democrat, Robert Pozen, to run it. Foy and Pozen, along with then-Chief of Staff Beth Myers and a handful of others, formed an inner circle of decision-makers, working more or less smoothly with Romney's political team from the 2002 campaign.

Their initial challenge, a threatened state budget deficit of almost $3 billion, was created by the dot-com collapse. Having vowed in the campaign to oppose any general tax increase, Romney quickly won approval from the legislature for a variety of spending cuts.

But when those came far short of balancing the budget, Romney turned to closing what he called "loopholes" in the corporate tax code. That, along with higher local property taxes, produced millions in new revenue -- and allowed critics to challenge Romney's claim that he held the line on taxes.

As the budget crisis eased, fights with the legislature became more frequent and bitter. Romney failed to develop the warm personal relationships with Democratic leaders that Weld had enjoyed with some of their predecessors. The Democrats had no compunction about rejecting Romney's initiatives, including his push to reduce the state's top income tax rate.

Frustrated by seeing big parts of his program roadblocked, Romney mounted a major effort to change the makeup of the legislature in his midterm election in 2004. He campaigned and financed races in dozens of districts, spending $3 million, and when the returns came in, Republicans had two fewer seats than before -- leaving the Democrats with an overwhelming, veto-proof majority in both the state House and Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0098350

The result has been a series of fights that have left the state politically polarized, and that reality has shaped -- and limited -- Romney's actions in the past two years. Where the Democrats have been motivated to act, he has had notable successes. His plan for health care treats it much like car insurance, requiring people to buy it or face a fine. It was tweaked and substantially expanded by the legislature, and in the final analysis, the negotiations that led to success were managed more by the Democratic leaders of the House and Senate than by the governor.

But Romney could claim parenthood of the plan, and he presided with pride over the bill-signing ceremony, cheered on by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D) and prominent leaders of business, labor and the health-care industry.

Romney has taken the health-care bill on the road as he has carried on his undeclared campaign for the presidential nomination. He has also emphasized his efforts to hold down taxes, restore the death penalty, block research on embryonic stem cells and oppose same-sex marriages.

His national effort to portray himself as a counterforce to the liberalism of his state has not gone down well with many at home. In the 2006 campaign, Deval Patrick, the Democrat who will succeed Romney as governor, spoke out in defense of his state and its traditions.

Patrick's victory over Healey marked a kind of repudiation of the Romney legacy in Massachusetts. The Republican Party there, never robust, is now at its weakest point in years.

Romney's campaign travels as head of the Republican Governors Association kept him on the road much of the past year. But he was on the job, and deeply immersed in the details, when the collapse of a concrete ceiling in a "Big Dig" tunnel in Boston killed a motorist this summer. He forced the legislature to give him control of the independent Turnpike Authority -- power it had previously denied him -- and he fired the administrator and moved in his own people.

"He was 100 percent engaged in all the critical decisions," said Myers, the former chief of staff.

As Romney turns his focus to the presidential race, those decisions and his record will receive greater scrutiny than ever.

Romney Reaches For Reagan Touch (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, November 25, 2006

The day after the midterm elections, Governor Mitt Romney, reflecting on the GOP's punishing losses, issued a clarion call to conservatives: "We must return to the common-sense Reagan Republican ideals."

Three days later, at a State House Veterans Day ceremony, Romney invoked the former president again, saying, "As Ronald Reagan once said, 'I have seen four wars during my lifetime and none of them began because America was too strong.' "

And then last Friday, asked by a Fox News interviewer whether he was running for president, Romney said he was giving it some serious thought, because the stakes were so high. "We're going to have to make sure that we have the kind of Reagan optimism that America's looking for," he said.

Romney's repeated references to the nation's 40th president in two weeks illustrate how the governor, as he builds toward a 2008 presidential bid, is increasingly trying to cast himself in the Reagan mold -- as a patriotic, small-government conservative from outside the Beltway who's bent on repelling taxes, moral relativism, and foreign threats.

Like many Republicans, Romney has long described Reagan as one of his heroes, but as the governor's White House hopes have gained steam, his admiration has turned to emulation: Romney seems to be channeling the former president's conservative convictions, his hopeful message, and even his witty, folksy style of connecting with voters from South Carolina to Southern California.

There are many similarities between the two: Reagan and Romney portrayed themselves as bulwarks against the perils of liberalism in their home states -- Reagan in California, Romney in Massachusetts. Both have benefited from their Hollywood looks. Both have had experience in working with Democratic legislatures.

"Reagan was able to run against Washington, including people in his own party in Washington, by talking about what he achieved as governor and saying he would take those ideas to Washington," said Republican strategist Charlie Black, who was a senior Reagan adviser. "Romney can do the same thing."

Like other potential GOP candidates, Romney is also negotiating a delicate relationship with the legacy of President Bush, who is respected by Republicans for his tough tactics in fighting terrorism but continues to be plagued by low job-approval ratings. Reagan's legacy, by contrast, is seen by Republicans as largely unassailable.

While Republican presidential hopefuls routinely try to claim the mantle of Reagan conservatism, Black said, Romney can make a good case, in large part because of his charisma and his ability to give a stirring speech. Black said he hears observers of the 2008 race describe Romney as "Reagan esque."

DOJ_NMG_0098351

Romney's message on the stump often carries echoes of Reagan, who died in 2004.

Consider the acceptance speech Reagan gave in July 1980 after he won the Republican nomination for president.

"Never before in our history have Americans been called upon to face three grave threats to our very existence," Reagan said, warning that the United States was spending beyond its means, facing unprecedented danger from Soviet communism, and maintaining an unhealthy dependence on foreign oil.

And yet, Reagan voiced optimism: "There are no words to express the extraordinary strength and character of this breed of people we call Americans."

Compare those remarks with Romney's in July of this year, at a GOP luncheon in Ames, Iowa.

"We're under attack from jihadists, we're spending way too much money -- way more money than we're taking in -- [and] we're using way too much oil," Romney said, asserting that the American people were up to the test. "We face some real challenges . . . but we will rise to the occasion, as we always do."

He added, "I love America and what it stands for. I will fight for it, as you will."

Romney's evolution on abortion mirrors Reagan's, too: Like Reagan, Romney once expressed support for abortion rights but became solidly antiabortion as the presidential campaign neared.

And Romney has had help from a California humorist, Doug Gamble, who once wrote laugh lines for Reagan.

Jared Young, a spokesman for Romney's political action committee, the Commonwealth PAC, said Reagan is a worthy model.

"The governor is a conservative much like Reagan was and agrees with the Reagan principles that the Republican Party, up until recently, has sought to follow very closely," Young said. "He is a very optimistic leader, much like President Reagan was."

Ed Rollins, a veteran Republican strategist who ran Reagan's 1984 reelection campaign, said that while he wouldn't necessarily call Romney an heir to Reagan, he did see a connection.

"He shares the same principles," Rollins said. "And Reagan was about three things when he ran . . . lower taxes, less government, and national defense."

But some critics of Romney's record as governor say his tenure does not reflect a commitment to lower taxes and less government. They argue that Romney's administration -- by raising many state fees, raising corporate taxes by closing loopholes, and implementing a new comprehensive healthcare program -- has actually done the opposite.

Romney's views on national defense are less well known, and some political observers say his lack of foreign policy experience could be a liability, especially if the war in Iraq continues to dominate the headlines.

And Romney is hardly the only candidate to invoke Reagan in looking toward 2008. US Senator John McCain of Arizona, who, along with former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani, could prove to be Romney's chief rival, gave two major speeches in Washington last week laced with references to Reagan. In fact, McCain aides said they hoped the speeches would be reminiscent of an address Reagan delivered in the political vacuum after Republicans lost the White House in 1976.

But McCain, after bucking the party's right wing on immigration, taxes, and, most recently, the treatment of terrorism suspects, has not been a favorite of conservatives. So Romney, in an effort to position himself as the McCain alternative, has spent much of the past year trying to draw those voters to him.

Do We Need Another T.R.? (LAT)

By Matt Welch

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

YOU CAN READ 1,000 profiles of GOP presidential front-runner John McCain without encountering a single paragraph examining his core ideological philosophy. His career is filled with such distracting drama — torture at the Hanoi Hilton, noisy conversion to the campaign-finance-reform faith, political suicide on the Straight Talk Express — that by the time you're done with the highlights, and perhaps a few "maverick" anecdotes, time's up.

People are forever filling in the blanks with their own political fantasies. Third party candidate! John Kerry running mate! Far-right warmonger! Republican In Name Only! But with the announcement that the popular Arizona senator has formed his presidential exploratory committee, it's time for our long national guessing game to end.

Sifting through McCain's four bestselling books and nearly three decades of work on Capitol Hill, a distinct approach toward governance begins to emerge. And it's one that the electorate ought to be particularly worried about right now. McCain, it turns out, wants to restore your faith in the U.S. government by any means necessary, even if that requires thousands of more military deaths, national service for civilians and federal micromanaging of innumerable private transactions. He'll kick down the doors of boardroom and bedroom, mixing Democrats' nanny-state regulations with the GOP's red-meat paternalism in a dangerous brew of government activism. And he's trying to accomplish this, in part, for reasons of self-realization.

DOJ_NMG_0098352

The first clue to McCain's philosophy lies in two seemingly irrelevant items of gossip: His father was a drunk, and his second wife battled addiction to pain pills. Neither would be worth mentioning except for the fact that McCain's books and speeches are shot through with the language and sentiment of 12-step recovery, especially Steps 1 (admitting the problem) and 2 (investing faith in a "Power greater than ourselves").

Like many alcoholics who haven't quite made it to Step 6 (becoming "entirely ready" to have these defects removed), McCain is disarmingly talented at admitting his narcissistic flaws. In his 2002 book "Worth the Fighting For," the senator is constantly confessing his problems of "selfishness," "immaturity," "ambition" and especially "temper," though he also makes clear that his outbreaks of anger can be justifiable and even laudable when channeled into "a cause greater than self-interest."

"A rebel without a cause is just a punk," he explains. "Whatever you're called — rebel, unorthodox, nonconformist, radical — it's all self-indulgence without a good cause to give your life meaning."

What is this higher power that ennobles McCain's crankiness? Just as it is for many soldiers, it's the belief that Americans "were meant to transform history" and that sublimating the individual in the service of that "common national cause" is the wellspring of honor and purpose. (But unlike most soldiers, McCain has been in a position to prod and even compel civilians to join his cause.)

Liberals and conservatives alike fail to truly reflect his views, McCain writes, because "neither emphasizes the obligations of a free people to the nation." His main governmental inspiration is Teddy Roosevelt, the "Eastern swell who became a man of the people," whose great accomplishment was "to summon the American people to greatness." In Roosevelt's code, McCain writes approvingly, it was "absolutely required that every loyal citizen take risks for the country's sake." This is an essentially militaristic view of citizenship, one that explains many of McCain's departures from partisan orthodoxy. Unlike traditional Republicans, he will gladly butt into the affairs of private industry if he perceives them to be undermining Americans' faith in government; unlike Democrats, he thinks the executive branch generally needs more power, not less.

"Our greatness," he wrote in "Worth the Fighting For," "depends upon our patriotism, and our patriotism is hardly encouraged when we cannot take pride in the highest public institutions." So, because steroids might be damaging the faith of young baseball fans, drug testing becomes a "transcendent issue," requiring threats of federal intervention unless pro sports leagues shape up. Hollywood's voluntary movie-rating system? A "smoke screen to provide cover for immoral and unconscionable business practices." Ultimate Fighting on Indian reservations? "Barbaric" and worthy of government pressure on cable TV companies. Negative political ads by citizen groups? They "do little to further beneficial debate and healthy political dialogue" and so must be banned for 60 days before an election if they mention a candidate by name.

If his issues line up with yours, and if you're not overly concerned by an activist federal government, McCain can be a great and sympathetic ally. But chances are he will eventually see a grave national threat in what you consider harmless, or he'll prescribe a remedy that you consider unconscionable. Nowhere is that more evident than in his ideas about the Iraq war.

McCain has been banging the drum from nearly Day One to put more boots on the ground in Iraq. "There are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this," he said on "Meet the Press" on Nov. 12, "but they all require the presence of additional troops." McCain is more inclined to start wars and increase troop levels than George W. Bush or Bill Clinton. He has supported every U.S. military intervention of the last two decades, urged both presidents to rattle their sabers louder over North Korea and Iran, lamented the Pentagon's failure to intervene in Darfur and Rwanda and supported a general policy of "rogue state rollback." He's a fan of Roosevelt's Monroe-Doctrine-on-steroids stick-wielding in Latin America. And — like Bush — he thinks too much multilateralism can screw up a perfectly good war.

The price of all this war-making, in money and manpower, would be staggering; it's hard to imagine without a draft (McCain has long been a fan of mandatory national service, at the least). But the costs to his political ambitions may even be greater. The nation is in no mood for the war we've got now, let alone a doubling-down on Iraq and ramped-up unilateralist tough talk in the Middle East. The trend lines of public opinion on these counts are not pointing in McCain's direction.

One of the many charming confessions in "Worth the Fighting For" is McCain's complaint that the man he replaced in the Senate — Republican icon Barry Goldwater — was "never as affectionate as I would have liked." Small wonder.

Goldwater, a man who seemed to emanate from Arizona's dust, was the paragon of limited government, believing to his core that the feds shouldn't tell you how to run a business or whom you can sleep with. McCain, on the other hand, is a third-generation D.C. insider who carpetbagged his way into office, believing to his core that "national pride will not survive the people's contempt for government." On Nov. 7, those conflicting worldviews collided when Arizonans voted on whether to outlaw gay marriage. McCain campaigned in favor of the ban, in the name of "preserving the sanctity" of heterosexual unions. His exhortations went down to surprising defeat. Not, one suspects, for the last time.

A Democratic Tidal Wave In New Hampshire (WP)

By David S. Broder

DOJ_NMG_0098353

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

When the pack of presidential hopefuls and the reporters who follow them descend on New Hampshire in January, as the 2008 campaign begins, a surprise awaits them. For the first time in anyone's life, New Hampshire has turned into a bright blue Democratic state.

Buried in the news of the national Democratic midterm election victory was an even more dramatic power shift in the state that has become famous as the site of the first presidential primary in each cycle.

In the words of veteran New Hampshire Republican leader Tom Rath, it was "beyond historic" when the Democrats took complete control of the handsome state capitol in Concord for the first time since 1874.

Democratic Gov. John Lynch won a second term with 74 percent of the votes, providing coattails for many others on the ticket.

The Executive Council, which has the power to confirm appointees and approve state contracts, switched from 4-1 Republican to 3-2 Democratic.

The state Senate, which Republicans controlled 16-8, is now Democratic by a 14-10 margin.

The state House of Representatives, which is dwarfed in size only by the British House of Commons and the U.S. House of Representatives, went from 242-150 Republican, with eight vacancies, to 239-161 Democratic.

In addition, Democrats defeated both incumbent Republican congressional representatives in a powerful demonstration of party-line voting.

New Hampshire was not alone. Iowa, whose presidential caucuses come even earlier than the New Hampshire primary, also elected a Democrat as governor and saw both houses of its legislature flip to the Democrats.

Democrats now control both houses in 24 states; Republicans do so in 16; and nine states have split control. (Nebraska has a nonpartisan unicameral legislature.)

These numbers become more important as we approach 2010 and another census, which will provide the raw material for the next round of line-drawing for congressional and legislative districts. If Democrats can maintain their legislative advantage along with their new 28-22 lead in governorships, they will be in the driver's seat on that redistricting.

Dante Scala, a professor of political science at St. Anselm College and authority on New Hampshire politics, said there were 80,000 straight-ticket Democratic votes -- almost twice the number of straight Republican ballots in the state.

The Democrats, who for decades were a scorned minority in New Hampshire, "had much better organization and far outclassed the Republicans this time," Scala told me. "Combined with the national trend and the popularity of Governor Lynch, the Republicans were just overwhelmed."

Rath used similar language, speaking of "an enormous surge we [Republicans] couldn't stop." It was fueled, he said, by the same anger at Washington, frustration over Iraq and disgust with the Republican Congress that prevailed nationally. But it was abetted in New Hampshire by the growing number of political independents who this year joined the Democrats in voting for change.

The force of the movement spared no one. Peter Spaulding, a longtime member of the Executive Council and a leader in John McCain's victorious 2000 New Hampshire primary campaign, lost his seat to a 71-year-old opponent who barely made any effort and who was vacationing in Belgium when the election returns came in. Dozens of longtime citizen-legislators, serving part time for $200 a term and rarely having to bother to campaign, found themselves voted out of office.

"The only successful Republicans were the ones who were not on the ballot in 2006," such as Sens. Judd Gregg and John Sununu, Rath said.

The fathers of these two senators were famous for steering the New Hampshire campaigns of Republicans who became president, but that was in the days when Republicans were dominant. Now, with Democrats resurgent and independents ever more influential, the kingmaker role may no longer be available to GOP operatives.

Republicans such as McCain, Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani may face a more hostile climate, in both New Hampshire and Iowa. And Democrats will be dealing with a constituency that, this year at least, was strongly antiwar and anti-Washington politician.

Lynch, who helped power the Democratic victory this year, has announced no favorite for the presidential nomination. He has stayed above the political battle at home, hoarding his political capital. If he chooses to endorse, it will carry more weight than any Democratic endorsement in a long time.

Dems Look To Big Sky (DENP)

By Karen E. Crummy

Denver Post, November 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098354

Helena, Mont. - In a state where voters backed a Republican candidate in nine of the past 10 presidential elections, Democrats suddenly find themselves in control of almost everything.

In the past two years, the party has taken control of the governor's office, the state Senate, and - depending on a Tuesday recount - has maintained a split in the state House. In the November general election, the party's U.S. Senate candidate also beat an entrenched Republican incumbent.

That makes Montana a political laboratory for national Democrats trying to determine what elements are needed for retaking the White House in 2008.

And when sorting through the reasons Democrats have taken hold in a conservative state, fingers frequently point first at Democratic Gov. Brian Schweitzer.

Midway through his first term, Schweitzer, a relative political newcomer, is a self-described "pickup-driving, God-fearing, gun-toting, red-meat- eating, take-responsibility-for-my- actions, invest-in-education kind of Democrat."

In a state where cattle outnumber people nearly 3-1, Schweitzer's prairie populist message, gift for storytelling and homespun charm have won him approval ratings upward of 70 percent.

His ability to suddenly shift from flattery and enticements to hardball tactics and steely negotiations have led to comparisons to former President Lyndon B. Johnson.

It has also led some Republicans to label him a bully, contending Schweitzer uses his popularity to threaten and intimidate freshman GOP lawmakers - or anyone else who stands in his way.

"He's a political gangster," said state Senate Minority Leader Bob Keenan.

He's got "the thing"

Love him or hate him, people appear to agree that Schweitzer has a political magnetism that can't be pinpointed, bottled or even adequately described but might need to be copied by Democrats seeking to win over independent-minded voters.

"He's that rare, high-energy individual that has 'the thing.' That Bill Clinton-Barack Obama thing," said Jerry Calvert, a political science professor at Montana State University.

He's a 6-foot-2-inch back- slapping, bear-hugging guy's guy who gave his wife a revolver for her birthday and takes his dog to the office - every day. He's also a calculating politician who chose a Republican for his running mate, and an expert on renewable resources, a master's degree holder and an Arabic speaker.

Two days with him reveal a man obsessed by the challenges his state faces today but intrigued enough about his own future and national politics to spend hours reading blogs or watching

Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer walks his border collie, Jag, to the governor s mansion along with Mary Lou Zimmerman in Helena, Mont. Schweitzer takes Jag to work every day. (Post special / Jon Ebelt) simulcasts of Don Imus, the New York radio talk host.

Most people at the State Capitol had just arrived for work Monday and were searching for a cup of coffee, as Schweitzer - an Energizer Bunny clad in Levis, brown cowboy boots and a blue bolo tie - hurries down the hall to his office, followed closely by Jag, his border collie.

He has a critical meeting with one of the state's tribal leaders in an hour.

"I want to find a solution, but I'm going to tell him that people already think I'm too much of an Indian-lover," Schweitzer says as he plunges into a small chair. "It's not going to hurt me."

It's this image of a plain- spoken, don't-push-me-around Democrat that helped sweep Schweitzer into the governor's office two years ago - four years after his first run for office, a failed attempt to win a U.S. Senate seat.

"He showed Montana voters that he was just like them," said David Sirota, who was a political strategist for Schweitzer's gubernatorial run. He emphasized fishing and hunting access on public lands and health care for small businesses, where 85 percent of Montanans work.

But what really makes the 52-year-old Schweitzer tick is energy independence and the jobs it can bring to Montana. The cattle rancher and mint farmer received a master's degree in soil science and spent seven years in Saudi Arabia developing crop irrigation systems.

"We have to be self-reliant. We can't keep relying on dictators," he said.

His Volkswagen Jetta runs on biodiesel; small windmills sit on his window sills, and tubular devices that among other things turn sunlight into hydrogen are scattered across his desk.

He whips out a lump of coal and four test tubes filled with canola, saffron and camelina from his briefcase and is ready to launch into a lecture on renewables when he is cut short by the arrival of the tribal leader.

Despite his reputation for good relations with the state's tribes, negotiations over a gambling contract this day aren't going so well.

DOJ_NMG_0098355

The tribal leader points a finger toward Schweitzer's face. The governor leans back in his chair and brushes one hand across the table.

"If we can't make a deal," he says, "I will go to radio, TV, I'll go to all the papers and tell them you rejected a good deal because you got greedy."

Two hours later, after meeting with his top aide, and exacting promises from people that they can deliver "a dozen or more Republicans" to get a deal done, Schweitzer hasn't found a solution.

But he hasn't made good on his threat either, preferring to keep talking. And now he needs to dab on his Mary Kay powder to tape a public service commercial about Indian education.

"Don't write that I'm a girlie- man," he instructs.

Before the day is out, he will have spent another few hours meeting with energy moguls from all across the country, finally inviting them to his residence to discuss ideas over cocktails.

After they leave, Schweitzer is sitting on a white, microsuede couch in the governor's mansion, actually a ranch-style home. He reaches into a blue plastic box and pulls out a .38 Smith & Wesson revolver - with laser sight. He gave it to his wife, Nancy, for her birthday a few days earlier. Is it really what she wanted?

"She didn't know it was what she wanted," he says, although he admits next year he might consider jewelry.

Drinking red wine before switching to whiskey, the father of three is flanked by his wife and 17-year-old daughter, Katrina. He also has two older sons, Khai and Ben.

Katrina is a typical teen, rolling her eyes at him when he mimics her by saying "whatever" and letting out a long "Daaaaadd" when she finds him geeky or embarrassing. She wants a new car, but so far, she isn't getting one.

Her cellphone plays "Under Pressure" by Queen and David Bowie when Schweitzer calls.

Playing the political game

It's only 9 a.m. Tuesday and Schweitzer has already been up for five hours reading the blogs, papers and jogging on the treadmill while watching Imus on MSNBC.

He's hurtling down the hall - again - toward his office, Jag trailing quickly after him.

"We're going to change the world!" he proclaims, waving a stack of papers revealing good news about Montana's capabilities for further energy development. This leads him another step close to what he calls "The big Kahuna": his plan to deliver Montana-produced electricity to Las Vegas and Los Angeles.

"Those that are bold ... are going to be rewarded six, eight, 10 years from now," he said.

Though he gives every appearance of governing from his soul, Schweitzer has a keen political side. He quickly reviews his latest poll numbers, a 70 percent job-approval rating - down 7 percent from before the election, he says, but still high.

He has spent months of political capital trying to help Democrats win, and although he campaigned successfully for now U.S. Sen.-elect Jon Tester, results in the statehouse were mixed. The 2004 election gave Democrats a 27-24 state Senate majority, and the House was split 50-50. But this year, Republicans were able to make gains, including picking up two Senate seats.

Democrats retained control of the Senate, primarily because a Republican lawmaker defected to their side. But Democrats are down one seat in the House and waiting for a recount in a tied race. If it stays a tie, Schweitzer gets to pick the winner, splitting the House down the middle.

After reviewing his poll numbers, Jag and Schweitzer go for a walk. (He auctions off the chance to walk with him for charity. Today earned $500 for National Public Radio.) He engages in a cleansing ritual called smudging with leaders of the Crow nation before discussing oil drilling on the reservation.

Meetings with executives from Westmoreland Coal follow, and Schweitzer ducks out about 45 minutes later to give a presentation on energy.

Later, he downplays talk that he might run for the U.S. Senate in two years - "don't hold your breath" - and says he finds the bloggers' trying to recruit him to run for president entertaining.

For now, his main concern is bringing jobs and infrastructure to Montana, and he has a warning for other governors.

"If you ever see me getting off a plane in your city, know that I'm there to steal jobs," he says.

The Gospel According To Jim Wallis (WP)

By David Paul Kuhn

Washington Post Magazine, November 26, 2006

JIM WALLIS IS PREACHING ABOUT A BIBLE TORN APART. Wallis tells the crowd at the Seattle Pacific University chapel that when he was in seminary, a fellow student took hold of an old Bible and cut out "every single reference to the poor."

DOJ_NMG_0098356

"And when we were done, that Bible was literally in shreds. It was falling apart in my hands. It was a Bible full of holes. I would take it out to preach and say, 'Brothers and sisters, this is our American Bible.'"

Wallis pauses. "It's like someone has stolen our faith. And when someone tries to hijack your faith, you know what? There comes a time when you have to take it back!"

For nearly two years, Wallis has traveled across the country attempting to do just that. And some would argue that those efforts have begun to bear fruit, as demonstrated by gains in the recent elections. But Wallis, America's leading progressive evangelical, contends that the issue is far larger than any one election, that the Christian conservative movement has remade Christ in its own image. "What's at stake here is not politics or social action," he insists, "but the very integrity of the word of God."

Wallis's book, God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It, spent 15 weeks on the New York Times bestseller list in 2005 and became the catalyst for his budding effort to revive progressive Christian politics. Throughout the book, Wallis argues that liberals have lost touch with the faith that defines much of American life. In the values debate, nearly all of which stems from differing perspectives of religion and moral absolutes, Democrats have traditionally been on the trailing end since the devout Jimmy Carter lost churchgoing voters to Ronald Reagan in 1980. Bill Clinton significantly narrowed the gap in 1992 by winning the Catholic vote, but even with his ability to speak comfortably about faith, by 1996, the gap widened again. Four years later, George W. Bush brought Catholic and Protestant regular churchgoers firmly into the Republican camp. Though the gap narrowed three weeks ago, cutting the GOP's advantage among regular churchgoers to 12 percentage points as concerns about the Iraq war rose to the fore, it's still uncertain whether those gains made up a trend or a onetime event.

It is not that America has become more religious. The Gallup Organization's polling demonstrates that as far back as Franklin D. Roosevelt, the number of Americans who said they attend church weekly -- religious Christians -- has remained roughly four in 10. But how religious Christians vote has changed. In 1960, seven in 10 Catholics identified themselves as Democratic or leaning Democratic. By 2004, that number declined to 44 percent. Between 1960 and 2004, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press reported that white evangelicals went from favoring Democrats by a 2-to-1 ratio to favoring Republicans by about the same ratio -- 78 percent supported President Bush in 2004. Overall, voters who attended church at least once a week supported Bush by a margin of 20 percentage points in 2004. Furthering the divide, religious Christians turn out in presidential elections at a rate of about 10 percentage points higher than those who attend church less than once a week. By August 2006, about one in four Americans told Pew pollsters that Democrats are "friendly toward religion," down 16 percentage points from July 2003, according to Pew's annual report on religion and politics.

Over the past three decades, exit polls demonstrate that religious Christians have tended to become increasingly conservative, while the base of the Democratic Party has become more secular. The outcome is a religion gap unparalleled in modern American presidential elections, one based on church attendance instead of church denomination.

"Here's the facts," Wallis tells the crowd at Seattle Pacific University, "every major social movement in our nation's history -- abolition of slavery, women's suffrage, child labor law reform and, of course, civil rights -- was fueled and driven in large part by religion. And I want to say to the left, the progressive side: Conceding the entire territory of religion and even values to a religious and political right is the biggest mistake the left has made in years, and they must never make that mistake again."

Do the recent gains mean the Democrats are on the way to solving the problem? Not by a long shot, says American Enterprise Institute congressional scholar Norm Orenstein.

The core part of that Republican base, the Christian conservatives, was not as "ginned up this time," Ornstein says. "But does that mean they will not be ginned up in two years? Of course not."

For Wallis, the narrowing of the gap in the midterm elections was encouraging, but he emphasizes that a religion gap decades in the making can easily expand again. Presidential elections are far more contests of two characters, rather than the national mood, he stresses. In 2008, "it will depend on the Democratic candidate," he says, and "whether the discussion of faith is authentic."

THE LAST DEMOCRAT TO WIN THE PRESIDENCY with more than half of the electorate was also the last Democrat to nearly split the religious Christian vote: Jimmy Carter. Carter has been a devout Baptist for the whole of his 82 years. He lives today in the same town in which he was born and has spent the bulk of his life in the Bible Belt. He remains the pride of Plains, a diminutive town in the deep south of Georgia. To this day, political analysts chalk his 1976 victory up to his Southern heritage.

But CBS News exit polling demonstrated that for six in 10 voters, "restoring trust in government" was the number one issue that led them to support their candidate, dwarfing by three times all other issues. Carter's ability to authentically speak to his faith may have allowed voters to find a pathway to trusting his character.

"I think the American people then wanted to believe that their president was guided by moral values that were permanent and unshakable and fairly clear, and, of course, these derive from religious faith, and I don't think it has to be Christianity," Carter says, pausing and looking outward to the damp blanket of leaves covering his lawn. "But I think that's a legitimate expectation on the part of the American."

DOJ_NMG_0098357

Increasingly, it became an expectation Democrats failed to meet. As the Democratic constituency became more culturally diverse in the 1960s and 1970s, a reluctance emerged to speak about religion in the public sphere. The party began a new emphasis on tolerance. A strict belief in the separation of church and state progressively became part of liberal culture. But the result, says John Green, the Pew Research Center's expert on religion and politics, was that an almost illiberal intolerance for religion emerged among some active Democrats.

"They offended some of these religious people that ought to be on their side," Green says. "Part of that is just a matter of respect." But after the 2004 presidential election illustrated once again that "moral values" were a primary motivator for a significant portion of the electorate, who went overwhelmingly Republican, prominent Democrats began to reconsider their reticence on matters of religion. They also began actively campaigning to dispel the notion that Democrats were antagonistic to people of faith.

"I have confidence that intelligent people: Joe Biden, Senator Bayh . . . and Ms. Clinton -- I think they are very carefully considering what happened in 2004 and how they can avoid the pitfalls of being branded as nonreligious and appealing to the moderate voters who were alienated before," Carter says. "I know if they are going to run for president, they are obsessed with this subject."

It is not the sincerity of prominent Democrats' faith that critics such as Carter question, but their ability to translate their religious moral center to the public. Today, about nine in 10 Americans "never doubt" the existence of God. Eight in 10 say prayer is an "important part" of their daily lives. Seven in 10 Americans believe presidents should have "strong religious beliefs," according to numerous Pew studies. But all polling suggests that most religious voters, especially white religious Christians, don't believe Democrats understand their intense faith, and therefore, the core of who they are. "It's a means of making a personal connection between you and all these millions of people you are trying to reach," says Laura Olson, a professor at Clemson University who specializes in religion and politics.

The Democratic Party has three choices in the next presidential campaign, Olson says. "One, you ignore [the religion gap]. I think they've tried that and it failed. Two, you stick to your guns. You say, okay, we're on the other side of the culture war here. We are pro-gay rights. We are pro-choice. That's a problem, too, and the left of the Democratic Party has clearly tried to do that, and that's what they believe, so they should do that. But that isn't going to fly on election night, when you are talking about the electoral college. So the third option, and the only one they are left with, is to try and redefine the debate in their own terms. You've got to take that term 'values,' that term 'morality,' and rethink what it means."

WALLIS ATTEMPTS TO STAY ABOVE THE PARTISAN FRAY, but has voted only for Democratic presidential candidates and asks congregation after congregation, "So how did Jesus become pro-rich, pro-war and only pro-American?"

"I am political. Sure, I am political," Wallis says. "But I try to be political without being partisan. I don't consult with or collaborate with Democrats on their strategy.

"There are policies right now that the Republicans are standing for -- and the administration is -- that I'm against," Wallis says, "and I want to see those policies reversed and turned around. But just Democrats' winning won't necessarily do that."

He is particularly incensed by Bush's tax cuts, for favoring the rich and ignoring the poor, as Wallis sees it. And although Wallis may strike a more conservative tone on family values and the need for personal responsibility -- he opposes legalized abortion, except when the life of the woman is in danger and in cases of rape and incest, but believes the issue should be left to state legislatures -- he is no Clintonian New Democrat. He is less sanguine about the use of U.S. military force, believing his Christianity compels exhaustive efforts for peace before using force. He broke with Democratic leadership over its support for the invasion of Afghanistan.

"They always tell me to offer the alternative to the religious right," Wallis says in Seattle, during his tour of conservative Christian colleges. "My job in life is not to be an alternative to Jerry Falwell."

More than a quarter-century ago, Falwell brought religion to the forefront of the contemporary American political debate. During the 1980 presidential election, under the banner of his newly formed Moral Majority, the conservative preacher rallied unprecedented numbers of religious Christians to the Republican cause. "When I hear a Howard Dean and Hillary [Clinton] and others talking about appealing to religious conservatives, they just have no understanding of what it is that motivates us," Falwell says. "They mistakenly think that we are Republicans. We're not. I could vote for any Democrat for president or Senate or congressman, as long as he or she was committed to the social issues properly, took a strong stand in the war on terrorism, and national defense. We'd be right there."

The self-described "godfather of what is called the religious right," Falwell is among Wallis's harshest critics. "I've never believed that Jim Wallis was an evangelical. I've asked him on talk shows if he believes the Bible is the infallible word of God -- well, that's the cornerstone of evangelical Christianity -- and he's never been willing to say publicly that he does. I've asked him the question: Do you believe Christ is the only way to heaven? And he's never been willing to say yes? All evangelicals will say 'yes' quickly to that question."

DOJ_NMG_0098358

Wallis, who doesn't accept that litmus test for evangelism, may not want to be a counter-Falwell, but increasingly, he is the most influential alternative.

In January 2005, Wallis wrote a memo on why the federal budget is a "moral document." Democratic Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) referenced the memo the following March when he spoke on the Senate floor. Reid recited the biblical story of the rich man who went to Hell for ignoring the starving beggar Lazarus at his door. Reid pledged that if Republicans cut health, education and job training programs, he would "turn this budget into a moral document."

"Jim Wallis, who is a friend of mine," Reid says, "has been a real good teacher for us . . . I think he's made us more socially conscious of the importance of religion." Reid says that when the religion gap was brought to his attention after the 2004 election, it was an awakening for him. "I think, my personal feeling is, we let the right wing take away the basis for religiosity," Reid continues. "It's to make life better for people, not have them vote one way or the other." But Reid says Democrats after 2004 could no longer ignore that their faith led many voters to the Republican camp. He contends that become more religious, Reid insists, but more open about their faith.

Democrats have changed accordingly. It is not that Democrats have

"What Jim Wallis has written, what he says every day, what I have written, is going to be at least partially effective," says Carter, whose recent book, Our Endangered Values: America's Moral Crisis, was also a bestseller. "I'm not trying to exalt myself. But I'm sure the two books that were written, had they been written five years ago, the [presidential] election may have turned out differently . . . There are values other than gay marriage, blocking gay marriage and blocking abortion, but we've, by almost default, we turned those issues that were looked upon as encapsulating all religious belief because we didn't emphasize the overwhelming portion of what, in my opinion, actually comprises the essence of religious belief."

THE SON OF CHURCHGOING EISENHOWER REPUBLICANS, Wallis was a youth group leader at his parents' church. "And then I began to have these questions, 14-year-old questions. I was living in Detroit, [in] a completely white world. I was listening to my city for the first time. I was reading newspapers now. I was paying attention to the news. I was hearing things. And, how come I didn't know anybody whose dad didn't have a job, or who didn't have a safe place to live, or who had any relatives in jail? Yet all that was happening in black Detroit, just a few blocks or miles away. How come we've never had a black preacher in church? How come we never had a black person in our church? I heard there were black churches, and who was this minister in the South named King? And I couldn't get answers to the questions."

After Wallis spent months trying to get his church to discuss segregation in Christian terms, the elders agreed to hold a discussion on racism. Wallis was selected to represent the black perspective.

"The first question was, 'Well, Jamie [his boyhood nickname], would you want Barbie to marry one?' That was my younger sister. That was the level of response."

Finally, he recalls, a church elder told him, "Christianity has nothing to do with racism. That's political, and our faith is personal."

"And," Wallis says, "I think that's the night I left [Christianity] in my head and my heart."

Race riots were occurring in cities across America by 1967. Wallis was 19. "All the white world I had grown up in was terribly afraid," he says. "And I was feeling connected to the people inside the barricade." As a student at Michigan State University, Wallis was becoming increasingly involved in the antiwar and civil rights movements. He became fascinated with Martin Luther King Jr. and was listening to Bob Dylan, reading Ho Chi Minh, Karl Marx, Che Guevara, "all the luminaries of the time. And I was not finally satisfied with them," because, as Wallis recalls, he came to believe that the leftist activist creeds did not speak to the spiritual. As Wallis was finishing college, he found that he could "never quite get rid of Jesus. He was always hanging around in my head and in my heart. So I decided to take one last look . . . I began to read the New Testament one last time. I got to the Sermon on the Mount . . . and I realized I had never heard a sermon on the Sermon on the Mount. Then I got to the 25th chapter of Matthew, and that became my conversion text, when Jesus said, 'I was hungry. I was thirsty. I was naked. I was sick. I was in prison. And you never came to me.' And the people say, 'Oh, Lord, when did we see you hungry, thirsty, or naked, or sick or imprisoned?' And he says, 'As you've done to the least of these, you've done to me.' The people who I'd met and were fighting with before were the very ones he was talking about in that passage. So I had to leave the church to find Jesus."

Wallis decided to go to the conservative Trinity Evangelical Divinity School in Deerfield, Ill. Within months, he found a group of students who believed as he did, and an early version of his movement, Sojourners, was born. It grew to become a national Christian organization based in Washington, and remains fundamentally charged, about three decades later, with lifting people out of poverty.

Yet for all the attention directed at Wallis, 58 now and married and the father of two sons, fundraising for his organization has not dramatically increased. When I tell Wallis that some of his conservative critics say he is a general without an army, he responds: "I think we do have an army. You don't sell 200,000 copies of a book if you don't have a constituency. We are not organized, institutionalized or mobilized the way the right is. They have been doing this for 30 years."

DOJ_NMG_0098359

BY THE 1970S, DEMOCRATS' DIVERSITY was a central component of their dilemma. They became "much more of a patchwork," as Clemson University's Olson puts it. Compared with the relative cultural homogeneity of the FDR coalition of labor, Catholics, ethnic whites and Southern whites, the modern Democratic Party began to focus on "a lot more little narrow constituencies under its big tent," such as the civil rights and feminist movements, which were like "little fiefdoms they had to make happy," Olson adds.

"When the Democrats became just the party of rights, they lost something, a moral appeal," Wallis contends. The Democratic patchwork frayed as some of its largest constituencies, particularly working-class whites, began to feel culturally estranged from the party. The breaking point was in 1972, when Republican Richard M. Nixon argued that a vote for Democrat George McGovern was a vote for "acid, amnesty and abortion." To many voters, McGovern embodied an emerging perception that liberals were outside the American mainstream.

Pivotal Supreme Court rulings only furthered the emerging divide. Between the presidency of John F. Kennedy and the failed bid of John F. Kerry, the court prohibited school prayer and ruled that pornography was legal and that obscenity was subject to contemporary community standards. To conservatives, this reeked of liberal relativism. By 1973, when the court ruled there was a constitutional right to abortion, religious Christians were ready to be mobilized by conservatives. But Carter was able to stem the tide of churchgoing voters from the Democratic Party.

"Carter -- because he was really one of them -- they thought, 'Well, he'll come in, and he'll be able to turn back the clock on some of these scary policy decisions that have been made,'" Olson says. "Like legalized abortion, the removal of prayer from public schools, stuff like that. But Carter couldn't hold on to them. The perception that Carter had weakened the country internationally was especially damaging," Olson adds. "Part of what fueled the emergence of the Christian right was anti-communism . . . [communism] being rightly perceived as godless was very threatening to people of faith."

By 1980, "Reagan is able to identify a constituency that is extremely ripe for mobilization, a constituency that is easy to track down," Olson continues. "The other piece of that is that even though he himself is an incredibly unlikely representative for this constituency because he's from Hollywood, he's divorced, he has not been religious his whole life like Carter, but instead, he's able to craft himself as a viable representative of this constituency just through symbolic appeals."

Reagan's call to get "government off our backs" resonated with religious Christians, many of whom by 1980 saw the federal government as furthering an overall secularization of society.

In 1980, the party platform included the "pro-life plank" for the first time. Reagan also advocated for the biblical story of creation to be taught in public schools as an alternative to evolution. And when it was still uncommon for presidential hopefuls to visit evangelicals, Reagan came and spoke at a convention of leading evangelical Christians in Dallas during the campaign, where he famously said, "Well, I know that you can't endorse me, but I only brought that up because I want you to know that I endorse you."

Reagan's appeal worked. In 1976, Carter won the white Baptist vote, 56 to 43 percent. In 1980, Reagan won it 56 to 34 percent, according to an ABC News-Harris survey at the time. In presidential elections, Democrats have not won religious Christians since. Richard Land, a longtime leader of the Southern Baptist Convention, says the sea change was deeper than any one issue. To Land, the debate was fundamentally over the worldview that social issues symbolize.

The core divide, Land says, is "whether you believe there are transcendent moral values or whether you don't, and believe most things are relative and situational." It was Land who sat with George W. Bush in Texas on the day of the governor's second inauguration in 1999, along with several other confidants, and recalls Bush saying, "I believe that God wants me to be president." That moment was consistent with a president who speaks in morally unambiguous terms. Bush's use of words such as "evildoers," Land adds, epitomized a belief that there are moral absolutes.

By 2004, Republicans so dominated the religious Christian vote that Bush, a practicing Methodist, won more Catholics than Kerry, who if elected, would have been the second Catholic president.

"What I criticize in John Kerry is I think he felt quite ill at ease within a deeply religious congregation or environment, and there is very little doubt that Howard Dean did, also," Carter says. It was Dean who famously stated that Job was his favorite book in the New Testament; in fact, it's in the Old Testament. Kerry did speak about morality and faith during the 2004 campaign but rarely talked about his own faith in personal terms that allowed voters to get a sense of his moral core, in stark comparison with his opponent.

JOHN KERRY IS A MAN WHO STILL BELIEVES he is fundamentally misunderstood by America. He squints his eyes in agitation when recalling how he lost the religious Christian vote to Bush. "I reread the Catholic bishops' guide after the election," Kerry says, referring to the 2004 Catholic voters' guide, in his Washington Senate office, "and you know, I suspect I get about a 95 percent on it. George Bush gets about a 5 percent. Yes, pro-life issues are central, and I understand its centrality to faith, but a lot of other things are, too. Like just and unjust war and poverty and children and our responsibility to the Earth and to each other and to future generations, and I think it's important to put those on the table." But Kerry rarely did during the 2004 election. He'll say, "During the campaign, I spoke about these choices in moral terms." But soon after, he admits, "To the degree there is a gap, it is because we have not been overt and aggressive enough about making clear what real faith is about."

DOJ_NMG_0098360

When I remind Kerry that, during the 2004 election, he told PBS News, "I don't wear my religion on my sleeve," he responds, "I think some people on the other side do. I'm not asserting who or what. But it became clear as the campaign went on from there that these issues required discussion." And, Kerry realizes, at that point it was too late.

For Democrats to continue bringing in more religious Christians, experts agree, a key component will be to find a way to "neutralize the abortion issue" by "advocating for the drastic reduction of abortion," as Wallis puts it. To lessen the weight of the abortion issue, one option currently discussed in Democratic circles is the "90-10" push to reduce the abortion rate 90 percent in 10 years. "We went too far on the abortion issue," Carter says of Democrats. "We became branded with abortion."

"It's more than just saying, 'Okay, we are going to reduce it,'" Kerry says. "I think some of our rhetoric -- I plead guilty for the Democratic Party -- I think some of our rhetoric -- mine included -- has been insensitive at times to that moral dilemma."

For Democrats to successfully close the religion gap, they will have to contend with opposition within their party, stresses John Green of the Pew Center. "The activist core of the Democratic Party is drawn increasingly from groups of people that are not religious," he says. Self-described secular Americans amount to about 15 percent of the electorate, and most are Democrats. "Some of them are hostile to religion, and some of them are indifferent to it. And that has made it very difficult for them to understand this very religious country in which they are trying to do politics."

Democrats have taken notice. Last year, then-House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi began a Democratic Faith Working Group to encourage Democrats to speak about issues in moral and religious terms.

"There are a lot of Democrats who are people of faith and haven't had permission to act like it, talk like it, behave like people of faith," Wallis says. "And when they start doing that, like Tim Kaine did in Virginia, my goodness, it works."

IN 2005, VIRGINIA'S TIM KAINE BECAME THE EXCEPTION that proved the rule. About half of all voters in Virginia are religious Christians. While Protestants make up seven in 10 voters in Virginia, Kaine, a devout Catholic, was able to rebuff attempts to paint him as too liberal by speaking about his stances in Catholic terms.

Since Kaine's election, Democrats have been looking to him for answers to cross over the religion gap. "They must talk as much or more about your motivations," Kaine suggests to Democrats. "If your motivation is a spiritual motivation, share that . . . Put that first, because that matters to people more than whether offshore drilling is a good idea or bad idea. . . . You don't share your faith to make somebody else feel like you; you share your faith to tell them who you are."

But Wallis insists that an openly religious Democratic candidate will win the presidency only when the party's liberal base becomes more centrist on issues such as abortion, more at ease with religion in the public sphere, and able to reconcile itself with the "failures of moral relativism."

"Can you win the majority of evangelicals to change sides? No, probably not," Wallis says. "But you know, the Republicans, they are not trying to win the black vote; they are trying to peel off a percentage of it in Ohio. So you try to peel off percentages of the evangelical vote." But to peel off percentages of the religious Christian vote, Wallis insists, "Democrats have got to run somebody who has a clue about religion, religious people, about poverty, about the environment, and will speak to those people in a moral language, able to talk sense about abortion. That candidate wins. That candidate wins tomorrow in America! Tomorrow!"

The Decade Of Buying Happily (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

"There was, too, a wonderful simplicity of desire. It was the last time that people would be thrilled to own a toaster or waffle iron." -- Bill Bryson

What Thanksgiving is to gluttony, the three days after it are to consumerism -- the main event. So, with Americans launching the Christmas season by storming the stores, let us recall when consumption had an exuberance remembered now only by those who experienced the 1950s.

Bill Bryson remembers. The author of 13 books (e.g., "A Walk in the Woods" and "A Short History of Nearly Everything"), Bryson's latest is "The Life and Times of the Thunderbolt Kid," a memoir of growing up in Des Moines in the '50s, when downtown department stores -- with white-gloved operators in the elevators and pneumatic tubes carrying money and receipts to and from cashiers -- served the pent-up demands of a nation making up for consumption missed during the Depression and World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0098361

In 1951, when the average American ate 50 percent more than the average European, Americans, Bryson says, controlled two-thirds of the world's productive capacity, owned 80 percent of the world's electrical goods, and produced more than 40 percent of its electricity, 60 percent of its oil and 66 percent of its steel. America's 5 percent of the world's population had more wealth than the other 95 percent, and Americans made almost all of what they consumed: 99.93 percent of new cars sold in this country in 1954 were U.S. brands.

By the end of the '50s, GM was a bigger economic entity than Belgium, and Los Angeles had more cars than did Asia -- cars for a gadget-smitten people, cars with Strato-Streak engines, Strato-Flight Hydra-Matic transmissions and Torsion-Aire suspensions. The 1958 Lincoln Continental was 19 feet long.

And before television arrived (in 1950, 40 percent of Americans had never seen a television program; by May 1953 Boston had more televisions than bathtubs) America made almost a million comic books a month.

Consider what was new or not invented then: ballpoint pens, contact lenses, credit cards, power steering, long-playing records, dishwashers, garbage disposals. And remember words now no longer heard: icebox, dime store, bobby socks, panty raid, canasta (a card game).

In 1951 a Tennessee youth was arrested on suspicion of narcotics possession. The brown powder was a new product -- instant coffee.

Fifties food was, Bryson reminds us, not exotic: In Iowa, at least, folks did not eat foreign food "except French toast," or bread that was not "white and at least 65 percent air," or "spices other than salt, pepper and maple syrup," or "any cheese that was not a vivid bright yellow and shiny enough to see your reflection in."

But unlike today, when everything edible, from milk to spinach, has its moment as a menace to health, in the '50s everything was good for you. Cigarettes? Healthful. Advertisements, often featuring doctors, said smoking soothed jangled nerves and sharpened minds.

"X-rays," Bryson remembers, "were so benign that shoe stores installed special machines that used them to measure foot sizes."

In Las Vegas, downwind from some atomic weapons tests, government technicians used Geiger counters to measure fallout: "People lined up to see how radioactive they were. It was all part of the fun. What a joy it was to be indestructible." But, Bryson dryly notes, people knew without a warning label "that bleach was not a refreshing drink."

White House security precautions were so lax that on April 3, 1956, a somewhat disoriented Michigan woman detached herself from a White House tour and wandered through the building for four hours, setting small fires. When found, she was taken to the kitchen and given a cup of tea. No charges were filed.

The '50s did have worries. When a contestant on a TV game show said his wife's astrological sign was Cancer, the cigarette company sponsoring the show had the segment refilmed and her sign changed to Aries. You could get 14 years in an Indiana prison for instigating anyone under age 21 to "commit masturbation." And to get a New York fishing license, you had to swear a loyalty oath.

Nothing has changed more for the worse since the '50s than childhood. The lives of children were, Bryson remembers, "unsupervised, unregulated and robustly" physical.

"Kids were always outdoors -- I knew kids who were pushed out the door at 8 in the morning and not allowed back in until 5 unless they were on fire or actively bleeding."

But as the twig is bent, so grows the tree: These children, formed by the '50s, grew up to be Olympic-class shoppers. They are indoors this Sunday, at malls.

The Education Of Robert Kennedy (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

Emilio Estevez's movie, "Bobby," introduces the martyrdom of Robert Kennedy to another generation of Americans, but it was Robert's reaction to his brother's death that is really most instructive to the young.

Robert Kennedy was dining at home on Nov. 22, 1963, when J. Edgar Hoover called. "I have news for you," Hoover began coldly. "The president's been shot." Kennedy turned away from his lunch companions, his hand to his mouth and his face twisted in pain.

In the ensuing months, he was devoured by grief. One of his biographers, Evan Thomas, writes: "He literally shrank, until he appeared wasted and gaunt. His clothes no longer fit, especially his brother's old clothes — an old blue topcoat, a tuxedo, a leather bomber jacket with the presidential seal — which he insisted on wearing and which hung on his narrowing frame."

But during March 1964, he visited Bunny Mellon's estate in Antigua, and spent the vacation in his room, reading a book Jackie Kennedy had given him, "The Greek Way," by Edith Hamilton.

DOJ_NMG_0098362

"The Greek Way" contains essays on the great figures of Athenian history and literature, and Kennedy found a worldview that helped him explain and recover from the tragedy that had befallen him. "When the world is storm-driven and the bad that happens and the worse that threatens are so urgent as to shut out everything else from view," Hamilton writes, "then we need to know all the strong fortresses of the spirit which men have built through the ages."

Classical scholars often scorn Hamilton because she wrote in a breathless "all the glory that was Greece" mode, but her book changed Robert Kennedy's life. He carried his beaten, underlined and annotated copy around with him for years, pulling it from his pocket, reading sections aloud to audiences in what Thomas calls "a flat, unrhythmic voice with a mournful edge."

Kennedy found in the Greeks a sensibility similar to his own — heroic and battle-scarred but also mystical. He shared the awful sense of foreboding that pervades the work of Aeschylus and Sophocles, and that distinctly Greek awareness of the invisible patterns that connect events to one another, how the arrogance men and women show at one moment will twist back and bring agony later on.

Hamilton is at her best describing the tragic sensibility, the strange mixture of doom and exaltation that marks Greek drama. It was based on the conviction that good grows out of bad, virtue out of hardship, and that wisdom is born in suffering. Kennedy memorized a passage from Aeschylus, which Hamilton quotes twice in her book:

"God, whose law it is that he who learns must suffer. And even in our sleep pain that cannot forget, falls drop by drop upon the heart, and in our own despite, against our will, comes wisdom to us by the awful grace of God."

Kennedy, recovering from his brother's murder, found in the ancient Greeks a civilization that was eager to look death in the face, but which seemed to draw strength from what it found there. The Greeks seemed more convinced of the dignity and significance of life the more they brooded on the pain and precariousness of it.

Kennedy underlined a passage of Hamilton's book in which she summarizes the rippled nature of Greek optimism: "Life for him was an adventure, perilous indeed, but men are not made for safe havens. The fullness of life is in the hazards of life. And, at the worst, there is that in us which can turn defeat into victory." If they were doctors of the spirit, the Greeks' specialty was to take grief and turn it into resolution.

The story of Kennedy's grief is the story of a man stepping out of his time and fetching from the past a sturdier ethic. He developed a bit of that quality, which greater leaders like Churchill possessed in abundance, of seeming to step from another age. Kennedy became a figure in the 1960s, but was never really of the '60s. He promoted many liberal policies but was never a member of a team since he drew strength from somewhere else.

And the lesson, of course, is about the need to step outside your own immediate experience into the past, to learn about the problems that never change, and bring back some of that inheritance. The leaders who founded the country were steeped in the classics, Kennedy found them in crisis, and today's students are lucky if they stumble on them by happenstance.

Cheney Meets Saudi King For Talks (NYT)

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 25 — Vice President Dick Cheney traveled to Riyadh, the Saudi capital, on Saturday to discuss regional security issues with King Abdullah.

Mr. Cheney was met in Riyadh by the king's brother, Crown Prince Sultan, and government ministers and leaders of the Saudi armed forces, the official Saudi Press Agency reported.

The meeting at the king's palace, which lasted for a few hours, ended at about 8:30 p.m. Saturday, a spokeswoman with the United States Embassy in Riyadh said.

The meeting touched on "the whole range of events and developments on the regional and international scenes," according to the Saudi Press Agency, particularly "the Palestinian issue and the situation in Iraq."

Mr. Cheney left the country shortly after the meeting to return to the United States.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, Megan McGinn, said the meeting lasted for two hours and covered a "wide range of issues."

Mr. Cheney's trip precedes a planned meeting between President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq in the Jordanian capital Amman in the coming week.

The high-level visits to the region come at a time when the administration is considering how to adjust its policies in Iraq, where deadly sectarian violence has been escalating.

Cheney, Saudi King Discuss Trouble Spots (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (AP) — Vice President Dick Cheney sought Saudi help on Saturday in dealing with Iraq's spiraling violence and other regional trouble spots where U.S. policy is on the line: Iran, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

DOJ_NMG_0098363

Cheney's visit with King Abdullah was brief, lasting only a few hours before he flew back to Washington, but it underlined the two allies' concerns over upheavals across the Middle East, which many Arabs blame on U.S. policies.

In a sign of the urgency of the U.S. concern, President Bush is scheduled to meet with Iraq's prime minister in the Jordanian capital Wednesday and Thursday to discuss security matters.

The unusual succession of visits by the two U.S. leaders was planned before outbursts of violence this week dramatically worsened the situation in two countries of key American interest — Iraq and Lebanon.

On Tuesday, an anti-Syrian Lebanese politician was gunned down in Beirut, highlighting the fragility of the U.S.-backed government and heightening tensions between that country's pro- and anti-Syrian forces.

Two days later in Iraq, suspected Sunni insurgents set off a series of car bombs that killed more than 200 people in a Shiite district of Baghdad, fueling an upsurge in the retaliatory sectarian slayings that threaten to tear the nation apart.

The meeting at Yamama Palace likely focused on both conflicts, as well as the Israeli-Palestinian front, which stands at a key crossroads amid attempts to form a new Palestinian government and get peace negotiations going.

The U.S. Embassy declined to comment on the discussions and Saudi officials were not available.

Before the meeting, a Saudi official said Cheney was expected to ask oil-rich Saudi Arabia to use its considerable influence with Iraq's Sunni Arab minority to promote reconciliation with Iraqi Shiites and Kurds. Sunni insurgents have staged some of the bloodiest attacks on U.S. troops and Shiites.

In return, Saudi Arabia wants the U.S. to help rein in Iraq's Shiite militias, which have been blamed for sectarian attacks that have killed thousands, said the official, who agreed to discuss the meeting only if not quoted by name because of the sensitivity of the talks.

On Lebanon, the Saudi official said the kingdom wants to ensure there are no cracks in support for the U.S.-backed government, which is opposed by groups allied with Syria and Iran. Saudi Arabia has strong links to the anti-Syrian bloc dominating Lebanon's Cabinet and parliament.

The official said Saudi Arabia hopes Washington will not snub any Palestinian government that emerges from talks between the militants of Hamas and the more moderate Fatah faction. The U.S. and other nations have shunned the current government led by Hamas, which has refused to recognize Israel and renounce violence against the Jewish state.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, is trying to work out a new unity government with Hamas, but Arabs hope the U.S. will be flexible with how much Hamas must moderate to allow a resumption of the peace process with U.S. ally Israel.

Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries on the Persian Gulf are also deeply concerned over the West's confrontation with Iran over that nation's suspect nuclear program.

Gulf countries worry about the possibility of a nuclear-armed Iran and its attempts to expand its influence in the Middle East. But they also fear the West's attempt to force Iran to rein in its program could bring Iranian reprisals.

Dick Cheney Holds Mideast Talks In Saudi Arabia (AFP)

By Suleiman Nimr

AFP, November 26, 2006

RIYADH - US Vice President Dick Cheney held talks with King Abdullah during a brief visit to Saudi Arabia in a new diplomatic thrust by Washington that will also see President George W. Bush meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The Saudi official SPA news agency said the discussions covered "the whole range of events and developments on the regional and international scenes."

The talks focused chiefly on "the Palestinian issue and the situation in Iraq," in addition to ways of boosting cooperation between the United States and the oil-rich Gulf kingdom, it said.

The meeting was attended by Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz and other top Saudi leaders, but no further details of the talks were immediately available. SPA said Cheney later left Saudi Arabia.

A Saudi official earlier said that Cheney's talks would focus on the situation in the Middle East, particularly violence-wracked Iraq.

US sources said Cheney was expected to ask Abdullah to use his influence to help foster reconciliation in Iraq, which is reeling from an explosion of tit-for-tat sectarian violence between the ruling majority Shiites and the Sunni Arab former elite.

The Riyadh talks were also expected to cover the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the situation in Lebanon, a diplomatic source in the Saudi capital said.

Cheney's visit to US ally Saudi Arabia came ahead of a November 29-30 meeting in Jordan between Bush and Maliki on Iraq.

More than 250 people were killed on Thursday in a series of car bombings in Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City in the bloodiest single attack since the US-led invasion of 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0098364

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is also due in the Middle East soon.

Cheney was expected to ask Abdullah to use his influence to help bridge the divides between Iraq's warring Sunni and Shiite factions, and also press for Riyadh to come through with its promised reconstruction aid.

Iraq's sectarian conflict, a surge in US casualties and the victory of opposition Democrats in Congressional elections on November 7 have piled pressure on Bush to change US policy, if not to begin withdrawing troops -- something he refuses to commit to.

On Monday Saudi Arabia warned against upsetting the "social balance" in Iraq and urged US-led forces to stop outside influences, in an apparent reference to the growing influence of Shiite Iran.

In a statement after its weekly meeting, the Saudi cabinet stressed the need to restore security in Iraq.

The Sunni-dominated kingdom also said that permanent members of the UN Security Council and Iraq's neighbors should "shoulder their responsibilities in backing Iraq's independence and territorial integrity."

Cheney, one of the architects of the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, is a vigorous defender of US policies in Iraq. He also served the current president's father George Bush as defense secretary in the 1991 Gulf War that ousted Iraq from Kuwait.

The current surge in violence in Iraq has added urgency to the trips by Cheney and Bush.

But on Friday the political group of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose base is in Sadr City, threatened to quit the national unity government if Maliki meets Bush.

Washington said the meeting will go ahead as planned.

An Iraqi diplomat in Riyadh meanwhile told AFP that Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari has put off a visit to Saudi Arabia slated for Sunday "due to developments of the situation in Iraq."

The diplomat, who requested anonymity, did not give a new date for the visit.

Iraq PM Struggling Ahead Of Bush Talks (AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Iraq's Shiite prime minister, struggling to prevent sectarian violence from sending Iraq into full-fledged civil war, is facing strong criticism from top Shiite and Sunni Arab leaders alike as he prepares for a summit with President Bush next week.

On Saturday, a prominent Sunni religious leader warned that Iraq's escalating sectarian violence will spread throughout the Middle East unless the international community withdraws support for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government.

"I call on the Arab states, the Arab League and the United Nations to stop this government and withdraw its support from it. Otherwise, the disaster will occur and the turmoil will happen in Iraq and other countries," said Sheik Harith al-Dhari, who heads the Association of Muslim Scholars.

Last week, Iraq's Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant against al-Dhari, saying he was wanted for inciting violence and terrorism.

On the other side of Iraq's sectarian divide, Shiite politicians loyal to the radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr have threatened to boycott parliament and the Cabinet if al-Maliki goes ahead with the planned summit in Jordan on Wednesday and Thursday. The political bloc, known as Sadrists, is a mainstay of support for al-Maliki.

The White House has said the meeting is still on.

Iran, the top U.S. rival in the region, had planned its own summit Saturday, inviting the presidents of Iraq and Syria in what was seen as a bid to assert its role as a powerbroker in Iraq. Syria did not respond, perhaps to avoid annoying the U.S., and Iraq's president said he could not get to Iran before Sunday at the earliest because Baghdad's airport was closed to commercial flights following a deadly attack Thursday in Sadr City.

Suspected Sunni insurgents killed 215 people in the Shiite slum with mortars and five car bombs in the deadliest single attack of the war. On Saturday, Sadrist lawmaker Qusai Abdul-Wahab blamed U.S. forces for the attack, saying they failed to provide security.

As Vice President Dick Cheney traveled to the neighboring Sunni country of Saudi Arabia on Saturday to seek help in calming Iraq, Iraq's sectarian violence shifted to Diyala province north of Baghdad, where gunmen broke into two Shiite homes and killed 21 men in front of their relatives, police said. U.S. and Iraqi forces also killed 58 insurgents during fighting in the same region.

In central Iraq, a suicide car bomber attacked a checkpoint near Fallujah, killing three Iraqi civilians and a U.S. service member, and wounding nine civilians and an American service member, the coalition said. The dead included two Iraqi children and an adult.

DOJ_NMG_0098365

A U.S. Marine also died from wounds sustained while fighting in Anbar province on Friday, the military said, raising to at least 2,873 the number of U.S. servicemen who have died since the war began in 2003. So far, 54 American service members have died this month in Iraq.

Six people were killed in other violence in Iraq on Saturday, and 19 bodies were found, police said.

Iraq's government has been unable to prevent revenge attacks by Shiite militias and Sunni Arab insurgents, despite the 24-hour curfew it imposed Thursday night on Baghdad's 6 million residents. After only scattered violence occurred in Baghdad on Saturday, the government announced it would allow residents to leave their homes Sunday but keep the ban on all vehicles for another day.

Meanwhile, The New York Times reported Sunday that Iraqi militant groups have raised between $70 million and $200 million a year from various illegal activities to fund the insurgency. The newspaper, which cites a classified U.S. government report obtained by the Times, said the money has come from oil smuggling, kidnapping, counterfeiting and other activities.

The report said terrorist and insurgent groups in Iraq may also have extra money with which to finance terrorist organizations outside Iraq.

In the latest violence in Diyala province, a hotbed of Iraq's Sunni-Arab insurgency, gunmen targeted homes of the al-Sawed Shiite tribe in the village of Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, according to a police officer who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect his own security, as officials often do in the volatile province.

The gunmen broke into the two houses as their large extended families slept, marched everyone outside, lined up the 21 men and shot them to death as the women and children watched, police said.

Police could not reach the remote village to collect the bodies and take them to a morgue until Saturday, police said, adding that they do not known whether the attack was motivated by sectarian hatred or a tribal dispute.

In other parts of Diyala, a largely rural area of farms and orchards, police killed 36 insurgents and wounded dozens of others in clashes Saturday, police said. U.S. and Iraqi forces also conducted several raids north of Baghdad, killing 22 insurgents and a civilian, and destroying a factory used to make roadside bombs, the military said.

Baghdad was quieter than it had been on Friday, when rampaging militiamen burned and blew up four mosques and torched several homes in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Hurriyah, witnesses and police said. Iraqi soldiers at a nearby army post failed to intervene in the assault by suspected members of the Shiite Mahdi Army militia or subsequent attacks that killed as many as 25 Sunnis, said police Capt. Jamil Hussein.

The U.S. military said Saturday that Iraqi soldiers securing Hurriyah found only one burned mosque and were unable to confirm residents' and police accounts that six Sunni Arabs were dragged from Friday prayers and burned to death.

On Friday, al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric, urged al-Dhari, the Sunni leader, to issue a religious edict condemning Sunni attacks on Shiites.

In an apparent response, Al-Dhari said during his news conference in Cairo, Egypt, that his Association of Muslim Scholars has repeatedly condemned the killing of Iraqi Muslims and attacks on their homes and mosques.

Al-Dhari, an outspoken critic of the government and the U.S. occupation, alleged that the Shiite-led government was using the 24-hour curfew as a way to carry out attacks against Sunnis, but he urged Iraqis not to be lured into more violence.

"Be patient and practice steadfastness and don't be lured into this sedition that aims to destroy" Iraq, he said.

In Baghdad, Ali al-Adib, a Shiite lawmaker close to al-Maliki, dismissed al-Dhari as a radical with few supporters. "If he doesn't want this elected national unity government what does he want, a return to dictatorship?" al-Adib said in an interview.

Associated Press writers Bassem Mroue and Qais Al-Bashir in Baghdad and Omar Sinan in Cairo, Egypt, contributed to this report.

A Matter Of Definition: What Makes A Civil War, And Who Declares It So? (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 25 — Is Iraq in a civil war?

Though the Bush administration continues to insist that it is not, a growing number of American and Iraqi scholars, leaders and policy analysts say the fighting in Iraq meets the standard definition of civil war.

The common scholarly definition has two main criteria. The first says that the warring groups must be from the same country and fighting for control of the political center, control over a separatist state or to force a major change in policy. The second says that at least 1,000 people must have been killed in total, with at least 100 from each side.

American professors who specialize in the study of civil wars say that most of their number are in agreement that Iraq's conflict is a civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0098366

"I think that at this time, and for some time now, the level of violence in Iraq meets the definition of civil war that any reasonable person would have," said James Fearon, a political scientist at Stanford.

While the term is broad enough to include many kinds of conflicts, one of the sides in a civil war is almost always a sovereign government. So some scholars now say civil war began when the Americans transferred sovereignty to an appointed Iraqi government in June 2004. That officially transformed the anti-American war into one of insurgent groups seeking to regain power for disenfranchised Sunni Arabs against an Iraqi government led by Prime Minister Ayad Allawi and increasingly dominated by Shiites.

Others say the civil war began this year, after the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra set off a chain of revenge killings that left hundreds dead over five days and has yet to end. Mr. Allawi proclaimed a month after that bombing that Iraq was mired in a civil war. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is," he said.

Many insurgencies and ethnic or sectarian wars are also civil wars. Vietnam and Lebanon are examples. Scholars say the Iraq civil war has elements of both an insurgency — one side is struggling to topple what it sees as an illegitimate national government — and a sectarian war — the besieged government is ruled by Shiites and opposed by Sunni Arabs.

In Iraq, sectarian purges and Sunni-Shiite revenge killings have become a hallmark of the fighting, but the cycles of violence are ignited by militia leaders who have political goals. The former Yugoslav president, Slobodan Milosovic, did this during the wars in the Balkans.

The civil strife in Iraq largely takes place in mixed Sunni-Shiite areas that include the cities of Baghdad, Mosul and Baquba. In Anbar Province, which is overwhelming Sunni Arab, much of the violence is aimed at American troops. Large swaths of Iraq have little violence, but those areas are relatively homogenous and have few people.

Governments and people embroiled in a civil war often do not want to label it as such. In Colombia, officials insisted for years that the rebels there were merely bandits.

Some Bush administration officials have argued that there is no obvious political vision on the part of the Sunni-led insurgent groups, so "civil war" does not apply.

In the United States, the debate over the term rages because many politicians, especially those who support the war, believe there would be domestic political implications to declaring it a civil war. They fear that an acknowledgment by the White House and its allies would be seen as an admission of a failure of President Bush's Iraq policy.

They also worry that the American people might not see a role for American troops in an Iraqi civil war and would more loudly demand a withdrawal.

But in fact, many scholars say the bloodshed here already puts Iraq in the top ranks of the civil wars of the last half-century. The carnage of recent days — beginning with bombings on Thursday in a Shiite district of Baghdad that killed more than 200 people — reinforces their assertion.

Mr. Fearon and a colleague at Stanford, David D. Laitin, say the deaths per year in Iraq, with at least 50,000 reportedly killed since March 2003, place this conflict on par with wars in Burundi and Bosnia.

Iraq's president and prime minister avoid using the term, but many Iraqis say extremists have thrust the country into civil war, even as moderates have struggled to pull back from the brink.

"You need to let the world know there's a civil war here in Iraq," said Adel Ibrahim, 44, a sheik in the Subiah tribe, which is mostly Shiite. "It's a crushing civil war. Mortars kill children in our neighborhoods. We're afraid to travel anywhere because we'll be killed in buses. We don't know who is our enemy and who is our friend."

The spiraling bloodshed here bolsters arguments that this is a civil war. A United Nations report released Wednesday said at least 3,709 Iraqis were killed in October, the highest of any month since the American-led invasion. More than 100,000 Iraqis a month are fleeing to Syria and Jordan.

"It's stunning; it should have been called a civil war a long time ago, but now I don't see how people can avoid calling it a civil war," said Nicholas Sambanis, a political scientist at Yale who co-edited "Understanding Civil War: Evidence and Analysis," published by the World Bank in 2005. "The level of violence is so extreme that it far surpasses most civil wars since 1945."

Among scholars, "there's a consensus," Mr. Sambanis said. Scholars in the United States generally agree that there have been at least 100 civil wars since 1945. At the smaller end of the scale is the war in Northern Ireland. Measured by total killed, the largest modern civil wars were in Angola, Afghanistan, Nigeria, China and Rwanda.

However, there are some dissenting historians on the definition of civil war, and whether it applies to Iraq. John Keegan, the British writer of war histories, finds only five clear-cut cases, starting with the English civil war of the 17th century through to the Lebanese war of the 20th century. His criteria are that the feuding groups must be vying for national authority, have leaders who publicly announce what they are fighting for and clash in set-piece battles while wearing uniforms, among other things. He argues in the December issue of Prospect magazine that Iraq is therefore not in civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0098367

On Friday, Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, insisted that the Iraq conflict was not civil war, noting that Iraq's top leaders had agreed with that assessment. Last month, Tony Snow, the chief spokesman for President Bush, acknowledged that there were many groups trying to undermine the government, but said that there was no civil war because "it's not clear that they are operating as a unified force. You don't have a clearly identifiable leader."

By contrast, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on Fox News in September that "a political solution is necessary to end the civil war in Iraq."

In 2003, at the start of the Sunni-led insurgency, Bush administration officials called the guerrillas "dead-enders" and insisted their only goal was to sow chaos. Now, American commanders acknowledge that political dominance is at the heart of this conflict.

In Congressional testimony this month, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples of the Defense Intelligence Agency characterized the situation as an "ongoing, violent struggle for power" and said the country was moving closer to a "significant breakdown of central authority."

Many Iraqis and Americans who have tracked the insurgency say it has been strongly shaped by former Baath Party members who want to keep Shiites from taking power. Even the newer jihadist groups have articulated political goals on Web sites — most notably to establish a Sunni-ruled Islamic caliphate.

"There was a whole regime that ruled this country for 35 years," said Mahmoud Othman, a senior Kurdish legislator. "Now they've gone underground. This is the main body of the resistance."

Scholars say it is crucial that policy makers and news media organizations recognize the Iraq conflict as a civil war.

"Why should we care how it is defined, if we all agree that the violence is unacceptable?" asked Mr. Laitin, the Stanford professor. "Here is my answer: There is a scientific community that studies civil wars, and understands their dynamics and how they, in general, end. This research is valuable to our nation's security."

Israel And Palestinians Agree To A Cease-Fire In The Gaza Strip (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 25 — Israeli and Palestinian leaders agreed late Saturday night to a cease-fire in the Gaza Strip that is to include the withdrawal of Israeli troops who have been battling Palestinian militants for the past five months.

The surprise announcement came as Israeli troops and Palestinian militants fought Saturday, much as they have almost every day in recent months. Two Palestinians were killed, including a Hamas militant who died in an Israeli airstrike in the evening, Palestinian security officials said.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, called Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and said that all Palestinian factions had agreed to stop violence in the Gaza Strip as of 6 a.m. Sunday, both sides said.

Mr. Olmert responded by saying that Israel would halt all its military operations in Gaza and withdraw all its forces from the territory, according to Mr. Olmert's office. Israeli officials said they did not expect the withdrawal to be completed by 6 a.m. "It's a full cease-fire, and the prime minister was happy to accept it," said an official in the prime minister's office, who was not authorized to be quoted by name.

The agreement is the most serious effort to end the fighting in Gaza. However, it is not clear whether it will take effect and hold.

The Palestinian Authority prime minister, Ismail Haniya, met in Gaza with several Palestinian factions involved in firing rockets into Israel, and they said they would abide by the cease-fire.

But some other factions, including Hamas militants, said they were not ready to accept a cease-fire until Israel halted attacks.

"We will not stop rocket firings as long as raids and assassinations continue" by Israel, Abu Ubaida, a spokesman for Hamas's armed wing, told [a news agency].

In the past, the Palestinian Authority has been unable or unwilling to control the numerous factions involved in the fighting with Israel.

In addition, only hours before the cease-fire was announced, Khaled Meshal, the Hamas political leader, who is in exile, said in Cairo that the Palestinians would launch a new uprising unless there was clear progress toward a Palestinian state along the 1967 borders.

"We give them six months," Mr. Meshal said of Israel. If there is no progress during this time, "the Palestinian people will close all the political ledgers and come out in a third uprising." The previous Palestinian uprisings, or intifadas, began in 1987 and in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0098368

The conflicting statements by the Palestinians reflected the deep divisions that have often led to street battles between Palestinian factions.

Israel and the Palestinians had not announced any formal cease-fire talks before the Saturday night statement released by Mr. Olmert's office, though there have been occasional contacts.

Israel withdrew its soldiers and settlers from the Gaza Strip last year. However, the Israeli forces returned at the end of June following the seizure of an Israeli soldier, who was taken into the territory.

Despite the cease-fire, there still is no agreement on releasing the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the official in Mr. Olmert's office said. The Palestinians have sought the release of a large number of Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Corporal Shalit.

More than 300 Palestinians, including militants and civilians, have been killed in Gaza since late June. Three Israelis soldiers have been killed in Gaza, and two Israeli civilians died from rockets that crashed into the southern town of Sderot, just outside Gaza's borders.

The cease-fire announcement does not cover the West Bank.

Tentative Deal Is Reached To Halt Fighting In Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 26 -- The Israeli government agreed late Saturday to cease military operations in the Gaza Strip in exchange for a pledge by Palestinian armed groups to stop firing rockets into southern Israel, a tentative deal that leaders on both sides said could end months of violence in and around the Palestinian enclave.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, outlined the terms of a possible cease-fire in a telephone call to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, according to Olmert's aides. The proposal called for an end to the frequent Palestinian rocket fire that has killed two Israelis this month, suicide bombings inside Gaza against Israeli soldiers and the digging of tunnels used for smuggling money and weapons into the strip from neighboring Egypt.

Olmert's aides said the prime minister pledged in return to cease military operations in Gaza -- more than 250 Palestinians, most of them gunmen, have been killed since late June -- effective 6 a.m. Sunday. Israeli forces would begin withdrawing soon after from northern Gaza, where they have been operating for several weeks, if terms of the truce hold. [The Israeli military said early Sunday that it had withdrawn all of its forces from Gaza.]

Israeli and Palestinian officials warned that the next few days would determine the durability of the cease-fire, which does not extend to the West Bank. Similar agreements have been announced since Israel withdrew its settlers and soldiers from Gaza 14 months ago, only to collapse within hours. [There were reports of at least one rocket falling inside Israel after the cease-fire took effect, without reports of injuries.]

"It holds the potential for stability and quiet for both sides," said Miri Eisin, an Olmert spokeswoman. "Israel in that sense is hopeful."

Abbas, who has been working to assemble a national unity government with the rival Hamas movement, told Olmert he received pledges to abide by the agreement from the armed groups at war with the Jewish state. His spokesman, Nabil Aburdeineh, outlined the deal to reporters in Gaza late Saturday.

Officials from the military wing of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement in control of the Palestinian Authority's ministries, suggested they would adhere to the terms only if Israel pulls back from Gaza. The radical Islamic Jihad said it would study the agreement before endorsing it.

"Hamas will remain with the Palestinians' interests," said Khalil Abu Leila, a Hamas political leader. "But if the Israelis violate this initial agreement, there will be no truce at all."

Two Israeli airstrikes earlier Saturday on cars in northern Gaza killed at least three Hamas gunmen and wounded several others, while at least one Palestinian rocket landed in the Israeli town of Sderot. No injuries were reported.

Eisin said Abbas and Olmert agreed to talk in the days ahead about how to extend the truce to the West Bank if it holds in Gaza.

"We'll wait and see what happens tomorrow," Eisin said.

Israel, Palestinians OK Gaza Cease-fire (AP)

By Amy Teibel And Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writers

AP, November 26, 2006

A truce meant to end five months of deadly Israeli-Palestinian clashes went into effect throughout the Gaza Strip early Sunday, significantly bolstering hopes of coaxing moribund peace talks back to life.

DOJ_NMG_0098369

The Israeli military said all troops were withdrawn from Gaza in the hours before the 6 a.m. cease-fire, announced late Saturday, took force. Dozens of tanks and armored vehicles were parked just over the border in a military staging ground in southern Israel early Sunday, and the streets of northern Gaza were empty.

The agreement was a coup for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas as he tries to form a more moderate government than the one currently led by Islamic Hamas radicals. Abbas, a moderate from the Fatah Party elected separately last year, hopes a new government lineup will persuade the West to end crushing economic sanctions imposed after Hamas took power in March.

The truce was meant to halt rocket fire and other militant attacks on Israel from Gaza, and a military offensive Israel launched in the coastal strip in June, less than a year after ending its 38-year occupation. About half an hour before it took effect, Hamas militants said they fired two rockets at southern Israel. One hit a house, but caused no injuries, the military said.

The two sides announced the accord after Abbas telephoned Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert late Saturday to tell him he had arrived at an agreement with Palestinian factions to stop rocket fire and all other violence from Gaza. Olmert reciprocated by pledging to stop all Israeli military operations in Gaza and withdraw all troops there, aides to both leaders said.

Abbas spokesman Nabil Abu Rdeneh said a truce reached in Egypt in February 2005 would be revived.

"There is a signed agreement between the president and Prime Minister (Ismail) Haniyeh and all the Palestinian factions to resort to the agreement of the factions in Cairo in 2005, including ceasing all the military activity from Gaza, starting from Sunday morning," Abu Rdeneh said from Gaza City. "The Israeli prime minister has agreed, and it is going to start tomorrow morning."

Abbas told Olmert that the factions had agreed to stop all violence from Gaza, including rocket fire and suicide bombings, starting at 6 a.m. Sunday, Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin said.

He "asked that, in response, Israel stop all military operations in the Gaza Strip and withdraw all her forces," and Olmert responded favorably, Eisin said.

Earlier in the day, militant factions denied reaching a cease-fire agreement. But after it was officially announced, they acknowledged the accord and said the denials were a product of power struggles among them.

Israeli forces originally entered Gaza in an effort to win the release of a soldier captured in a June 25 cross-border raid by Hamas-linked militants and still in captivity. But they soon widened their objectives to target militants who had intensified their rocket attacks on southern Israel after the September 2005 Gaza pullout.

The violence claimed the lives of more than 300 Palestinians and five Israelis. Most of the dead Palestinians were militants, but dozens of civilians died, too, including 19 members of an extended family killed earlier this month in an attack on their apartment compound.

Despite international criticism over Palestinian civilian deaths, Olmert pledged earlier this month to continue the offensive until Palestinian rocket attacks from Gaza significantly decreased. Instead, as the fighting swelled, rocket fire in November more than doubled from October, killing two civilians in a single week.

On Saturday, a rocket hit an unoccupied house in southern Israel, and blasts ripped apart two cars carrying militants in northern Gaza, killing at least one and wounding several passersby. One vehicle was struck by missiles fired from an Israeli aircraft, and the source of the other blast wasn't known.

Three other militants were killed in clashes with Israeli troops elsewhere, including two hit by Israeli fire near the main Gaza-Israel cargo crossing, Palestinian officials and Hamas said. The army said it had no information about fighting in the vicinity of the Karni passage.

The militants' capture of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the subsequent Israeli offensive cut short efforts by Olmert and Abbas to restart peace talks that broke down six years ago. A truce could help to create the momentum to get talks moving.

"We welcome the announcement and see this as a positive step forward," White House spokesman Alex Conant said Saturday evening in Washington. "We hope it leads to less violence for the Israeli and Palestinian people."

Although Israel has no ties with the Hamas government, which rejects the Jewish state's right to exist, it considers the separately elected Abbas an acceptable negotiating partner. He and Olmert agreed months ago to meet, but Abbas has been reluctant to set a date for talks without receiving assurances the meeting would yield real dividends for the Palestinians, like a release of Palestinian prisoners Israel holds.

Olmert has said no prisoners would be released to Hamas before Shalit is freed.

A cease-fire in Gaza is part of a broad package Abbas is trying to put together in the hope of persuading the West and Israel to resume the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars in funding cut off to pressure Hamas to recognize the Jewish state and renounce violence.

The centerpiece of that package would be the formation of a new government less inimical to Israel. Another major element is a prisoner swap.

DOJ_NMG_0098370

Hamas' supreme leader, Khaled Mashaal, arrived in Cairo this week to discuss both issues with Egytian mediators, but there was no word of a breakthrough.

On Saturday, Mashaal said his group was willing to give peace negotiations with Israel six months to reach an agreement for a Palestinian state in Gaza and the West Bank, but threatened a new armed uprising if the talks failed.

The double-edged comments were his strongest confirmation that the Islamic militant group would allow Abbas to try to negotiate with Israel. But it was also the first time he has set a deadline with an explicit threat of a new uprising.

Israel had no immediate comment on Mashaal's proposal.

AP correspondent Ibrahim Barzak reported from Gaza City, Gaza Strip.

Israelis, Palestinians Reinstate Cease-fire (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

The Jewish state pulls troops from Gaza. Peace talks between leaders could follow.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinians halted their hostilities in the Gaza Strip today, reinstating an often-broken cease-fire that could lead to the first talks between their leaders since June.

The accord, struck late Saturday during a telephone call from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, took effect at 6 a.m. Shortly afterward, Israel announced that it had pulled its troops out of the coastal territory during the night.

If the indefinite cease-fire holds, it will end five months of punishing Israeli military incursions into Gaza as well as the daily firing of rockets by Palestinian militants at cities and towns in Israel. It also could create momentum toward a resumption of peace talks that collapsed six years ago.

Hamas, one of several Palestinian parties to the pact, said it had fired its last three rockets into Israel half an hour before the cease-fire. One damaged a home in Sderot but caused no injuries, Israeli officials said.

An Israeli government spokeswoman, Miri Eisen, said the cease-fire accord included a halt to Palestinian suicide attacks in or from Gaza and a cessation of weapons smuggling into Gaza from Egypt.

Nabil abu Rudaineh, a spokesman for Abbas, said that all Palestinian armed factions had signed an agreement to "cease military activities from Gaza," restoring a truce reached in Egypt in February 2005.

Among the groups committed to the accord, he said, was Islamic Jihad, which had previously rejected any cease-fire with Israel, and Hamas, which governs the Palestinian Authority and has refused to recognize Israel.

The Bush administration, eager to revive talks between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, welcomed the announcement as "a positive step forward," White House spokesman Alex Conant said. "We hope it leads to less violence for the Israeli and Palestinian people."

The cease-fire was a major achievement for Abbas, who had been pressing Palestinian militant groups for months. He retained the presidency after his more moderate Fatah Party lost control of the government to Hamas in March, and has criticized Hamas' role in escalating the conflict with Israel.

Since summer, Abbas said last week, Palestinians in Gaza have been "victims of a barbaric Israeli offensive that has left more than 400 dead and 1,500 wounded, while thousands of homes have been destroyed."

But he added, "All that on the pretext of homemade rocket fire, and unfortunately we are giving them such a pretext."

Since Israel unilaterally withdrew its military outposts and settlers from the coastal territory in September 2005, at least 1,100 crude Kassam rockets have been fired from Gaza, killing two Israeli civilians, both in the last 12 days.

Israeli forces returned to Gaza in late June after militants with several Palestinian groups, including Hamas, captured Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit in a cross-border raid. The Israelis have made frequent and increasingly large incursions into Gaza since then, trying to halt the rocket attacks. Three Israeli soldiers have died in the fighting.

Rejecting international criticism of the offensive, which has left scores of Palestinian civilians dead, Olmert said this month that the Israeli offensive would continue until the rocket fire was significantly diminished.

In fighting Saturday, Israeli forces killed four Palestinian fighters and wounded at least six other people, including an unarmed 12-year-old boy.

The cease-fire accord came a day after Israel rejected an offer by Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to stop the rockets in return for a halt in Israeli military operations in the West Bank and Gaza.

"Abbas then came back with an offer of a full cease-fire, in exchange for our stopping in Gaza only, and Olmert agreed," said Eisen, the Israeli spokeswoman.

Israeli-Palestinian cease-fires break down frequently, and it appeared today that there was some uncertainty over the terms of this one.

DOJ_NMG_0098371

One party to the accord, the Popular Resistance Committees, said it still expected Israel to stop military operations in the West Bank as well. Asked whether such operations could provoke more rockets from Gaza, a spokesman for the group, Abu Abir, told the Israeli newspaper Haaretz that Israel must first pull out of Gaza.

"After that, we can talk about what we would view as a violation of the cease-fire," he said.

Israeli officials said they were worried that Hamas would use the cease-fire to smuggle more weapons through tunnels from Egypt. Eisen acknowledged that it would be difficult for Israel to monitor the border.

Khaled Meshaal, the Hamas political leader, underscored those concerns Saturday by threatening a major uprising against Israel. At the same time, he appeared to endorse an effort by Abbas to try to negotiate agreements with Israel to head off violence.

"We give them six months to open real political horizons," Meshaal said at a news conference in Cairo. Otherwise, he said, "Hamas will become stronger and the resistance will resume."

Olmert said this month that he was eager to meet with Abbas and willing to make unspecified concessions. The two men have met once as leaders — a stiff protocol session that took place in Jordan in June, two days before the capture of the Israeli soldier.

Any talks between them would inevitably focus on prisoners and the Palestinians' international isolation.

Israel wants the captive soldier returned before it releases hundreds of Palestinian prisoners from its jails, as Hamas has demanded.

Abbas wants Israel to stop withholding tax revenue and duties collected on behalf of the Palestinians.

Israel insists that the Palestinian government first must meet Western nations' conditions for ending the crippling economic sanctions imposed after Hamas came to power: that it recognize the Jewish state, renounce violence and honor previous Israeli-Arab agreements.

Hamas has rejected those demands and resisted Abbas' efforts to negotiate a replacement of the Hamas-led Cabinet with technocrats not affiliated with any political party.

Palestinians, Israel Agree To Gaza Cease-fire (CNN)

CNN.com, November 25, 2006

JERUSALEM (CNN) -- A total cease-fire in Gaza began at 6 a.m. local time Sunday (11 p.m. Saturday ET) after Israelis and Palestinian factions agreed on a proposal, authorities said Sunday.

All Palestinian factions have agreed to stop firing rockets into Israel under a cease-fire agreement, according to Nabil Abu Rdaina, a spokesman for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Meanwhile, the Israeli government has agreed to withdraw troops from Gaza and cease military operations, said Miri Eisin, government spokeswoman.

"We think that there's the possibility of hope here," she said. "What we hope is that the violence itself will stop, and we'll be able to see a little bit of peace and quiet in and around the Gaza Strip."

The agreement covers only Gaza, she said, and not the West Bank.

Just before the cease-fire took effect, militants fired three rockets into Israel, according to Israel Defense Forces. No one was injured, but a building was damaged.

Abbas called Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to offer the cease-fire.

In the United States, a White House spokesman called the cease-fire a "a positive step forward."

"We welcome the announcement," said spokesman Alex Conant. "We hope it leads to less violence for the Israeli and Palestinian people."

Rdaina said, "We hope that this will be a good start to stop all the activities and to withdraw from Gaza as well from the Israeli troops."

The firing of rockets into Israel has recently prompted Israeli airstrikes in Gaza. Three such airstrikes occurred Saturday and early Sunday.

In one of the recent strikes, two people were killed -- one a member of the Palestinian National Guard and the second a militant from the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigade, the military wing of Hamas, according to Palestinian security sources.

In another strike, a Palestinian militant was killed and three others wounded, one critically, when a minibus was targeted east of Gaza City, Palestinian sources said.

Hamas confirmed those in the bus were part of the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigade.

A third airstrike targeted a car near al-Azhar University in Gaza City, security sources said.

The Israel Defense Forces said it conducted an aerial attack on a Hamas terror cell in the Sajaiya neighborhood. It didn't provide casualty figures. The IDF said the cell was part of the group's weapons production division.

DOJ_NMG_0098372

Gaza Ceasefire Comes Into Force (BBC)

BBC.com, November 26, 2006

A ceasefire in the Gaza Strip has come into force, with the Palestinians halting rocket attacks into Israel.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas won a commitment from all militant groups to stop the attacks, while Israeli PM Ehud Olmert agreed to halt hostilities.

Israel said all its troops withdrew from Gaza before the ceasefire took effect, five months after its military re-entered the Strip.

BBC correspondents say the agreement is unexpected and a major development.

The United States has welcomed what a White House spokesman called "a positive step forward".

Earlier on Saturday, at least one Hamas activist was killed in an Israel air strike on Gaza.

Two cars were targeted, and four men were reported injured.

Hamas said that three other activists were killed in clashes with Israeli troops elsewhere in Gaza.

'Chance for stability'

The ceasefire came into effect at 0600 (0400GMT) on Sunday.

The BBC's Alan Johnston in Gaza says it seems Mr Abbas phoned his opposite number on Saturday evening to say he had agreement from all Palestinian factions that they would stop their rocket fire.

There is a signed agreement between Mr Abbas, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya and all the Palestinian factions, a spokesman said.

Mr Olmert is said to believe the ceasefire is a chance for stability

A spokeswoman for the Israeli prime minister, Miri Eisin, told the BBC that Mr Olmert had agreed that Israeli forces would not initiate any offensive action after that time.

But she said Mr Olmert had made it clear that it might take some time to pull all Israeli troops out of the Gaza Strip if the ceasefire held.

However, shortly after the ceasefire took effect, the Israeli army confirmed that all its troops had left.

Ms Eisin said Mr Olmert believed this was a chance to achieve stability and one that Israel could not miss.

The BBC's Simon Wilson in Jerusalem says that although there has been talk of a possible ceasefire in recent weeks, such a direct acknowledgement from the Israeli prime minister's office comes as a surprise.

Officials have indicated in the past that they do not believe Mr Abbas has the power to enforce a ceasefire among Palestinian groups, he says.

Ground offensives

Israel evacuated its settlements and military bases in Gaza last year after 38 years in the territory, but the military renewed ground operations after militants captured an Israeli soldier, Corporal Gilad Shalit, in a border raid in June.

One Hamas activist died in Saturday's air strike

Palestinian militant groups have been firing Qassam rockets into Israel on a daily basis. They have killed two Israeli civilians in the past 10 days.

Israel has launched frequent ground offensives into Gaza Strip to try to stop the militants who launch the rockets.

It has also shelled targets in Gaza heavily.

Since June, Israeli troops have killed more than 400 Palestinians in Gaza, roughly half of them civilians.

Three Israeli soldiers have died in operations. Cpl Shalit has not been found, and his fate is unknown.

Crisis In Lebanon Reaches New Threshold (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

BEIRUT, Nov. 25 -- Lebanon's fragile government, defying warnings from Hezbollah, on Saturday approved an international tribunal to try suspects in the 2005 assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, an enormously symbolic step for a country paralyzed by division and anticipation.

The decision by Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's cabinet, taken at night with a large military presence in downtown Beirut, set the stage for the country's month-long political crisis, which has so far escalated almost in slow motion, to enter a much less predictable period. In effect, the approval of the tribunal pits a coalition underpinning the Lebanese government, backed by the United States and France, against the radical Shiite movement Hezbollah and its allies, supported by Iran and Syria.

"This is not a provocation against anyone, nor will it be a provocation against anyone," Siniora said in a statement read after the cabinet meeting by the information minister. "On the contrary, it aims at protecting everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0098373

Hezbollah read the vote as a blunt challenge, denouncing the cabinet as illegitimate and renewing its threat to take to the streets to bring it down. The movement and its allies negotiated their response Saturday night, but several officials said protests would commence after the seven-day mourning period for Pierre Gemayel, the industry minister who was assassinated Tuesday on a busy suburban Beirut street.

"This is an unconstitutional and illegitimate meeting of an unconstitutional and illegitimate cabinet. Our reaction will become clear in the coming days," Hussein Hajj Hassan, a Hezbollah member of parliament, said in an interview. "It is going to include all kinds of activities, because they have taken things to an unacceptable place."

But, he added, "we're not in a hurry."

Lebanon's crisis, its most recent phase ignited last month when Hezbollah demanded a greater share of representation in the cabinet, is playing out at levels that extend far beyond the borders of the small Mediterranean country.

The coalition backing the government has said Hezbollah's decision to withdraw its ministers and allies from the cabinet on Nov. 11 was meant to block the convening of the international court to try the suspected killers of Hariri and opponents of Syria assassinated since last year. A U.N. investigation has suggested that Lebanese and Syrian intelligence services were behind Hariri's death, but has yet to conclude. Four Lebanese security chiefs have been in custody for 14 months. In a letter Friday to U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, Syria complained that it was not consulted about the court's creation and suggested that it would not cooperate.

Hezbollah has said the issue is not the court, but the government. Hezbollah insists the government is no longer legitimate without the participation of Shiite ministers, who represent Lebanon's single largest community in a political system founded on the notion of sectarian consensus.

Information Minister Ghazi Aridi said the two sides negotiated until minutes before the cabinet convened Saturday evening, to no avail. Hassan, the legislator, however, called the discussions "silly attempts and a stupid repetition of positions and unacceptable solutions."

Technically, the government decision still requires the approval of President Emile Lahoud, an ally of Syria who has said the decision was unconstitutional given the ministers' resignations. Without his approval, it would go to parliament, which can be convened only by the speaker, Nabih Berri, an ally of Hezbollah. Berri's aides say he has no plans as of now to do so.

In a country whose crises are almost always interlocked with regional and international relations, the fights over the court and the cabinet are overshadowed by the bigger struggles underway: Which of Lebanon's factions -- and, by default, its foreign patrons -- will exercise the greatest influence over the future?

Hezbollah's opponents -- a coalition of Sunni Muslims, Druze and Christians that takes its name from the mass protest on March 14, 2005, that helped force the end of a 29-year Syrian military presence here -- see Syria and, to a lesser extent, Iran as representing the greatest threats to Lebanese stability. Hezbollah, allied with an influential Christian politician, Michel Aoun, views the government as beholden to the United States and its interests.

"I am not very hopeful," said Amin Sherri, another Hezbollah parliament member, speaking after the vote. "Why? We have to see who's putting pressure on them. That side is the United States."

Punctuated by drama and interspersed with stretches of anticipation, the crisis has, until now, played out in almost expected ways. The vote Saturday was, in some ways, a formality. Even the killing of Gemayel, an anti-Syrian politician from a prominent Christian family, followed predictions by other politicians that assassinations were ahead. But the March 14 coalition turned Gemayel's funeral into a protest and show of force Thursday, mobilizing tens of thousands of its followers.

A counter show of force by Hezbollah appears inevitable -- Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah reiterated such a warning Friday -- although Sherri and Hassan said nothing was expected within the next 48 hours.

The prospect of sending the crisis into the streets has unsettled Beirut, a city whose diversity is often segregated and whose communal tension is as pronounced as at any time since Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war. With Christians divided between the government and Hezbollah, the confrontation has taken on a Sunni-Shiite dimension that is somewhat new to Lebanese politics. Its resolution will help determine which community, at the very least, wields an effective veto over political decisions.

"Internally speaking, Hezbollah cannot lose and doesn't want to lose. March 14 and the government cannot lose, and they don't want to lose," said Sarkis Naoum, a columnist for al-Nahar newspaper. "The loss for either side means this country will head in some direction that can be different. That's why I think both of them will take the confrontation to the end."

The crisis has paralyzed Lebanon, still reeling from last summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel. Following Gemayel's assassination, several Lebanese ministers took up residence in the government headquarters, known as the Serail, for protection.

Competing television stations -- the Sunni-owned Future channel and Hezbollah's al-Manar -- have waged a propaganda war of escalating invective. In one news bulletin, al-Manar called Walid Jumblatt, a Siniora ally and mercurial leader of the Druze community, a snake "spreading his venom." At Gemayel's funeral Thursday, protesters burned pictures of Aoun and shouted obscenities at Nasrallah. Hours later, scores of Shiite residents took to the streets in protest, temporarily blocking the airport road.

DOJ_NMG_0098374

Asked whether he saw a solution, Naoum said, "I don't think so.

"I don't know, I'm scared. I'm scared," he said. "They are so mobilized, the Sunnis and the Shiites, that once they go into the street, it's possible that no one can control them."

Lebanon Approves U.N. Tribunal To Investigate Hariri Assassination (MCT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy Newspapers, November 26, 2006

BEIRUT - On a busy West Beirut street corner, a black billboard featuring a photograph of Rafik Hariri counts off the number of days since the former prime minister's still-unsolved assassination sparked a popular uprising that forced Syrian troops out of Lebanon after decades of political domination.

"The truth," reads the billboard, which on Saturday was up to 650 days.

"For Lebanon's sake."

Nearly two years after the Cedar Revolution propelled pro-Western leaders into power and created a brief period of fragile national unity, attempts to find out the truth are threatening to create dangerous new political fissures.

On Saturday, Lebanon's cabinet set the stage for a political showdown by unanimously approving the establishment of a special United Nations tribunal with the power to try those involved in the assassination.

The vote throws the issue in the hands of the country's pro-Syria opposition leaders who consider the action an unconstitutional and provocative act.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, head of the nation's most powerful militia, is threatening to stage street protests until the government falls.

And Hezbollah allies in the government have vowed to quash the international investigation.

"This is not a provocation to any party," Information Minister Ghazi Aridi said after the cabinet vote, which was held as Lebanese soldiers fanned out across Beirut in an effort to contain any possible problems.

The dispute is about much more than finding out who killed Hariri. It is about the role of outside forces in Lebanese politics and whether the country's growing Shiite community should be given a greater role in the government.

Creation of the United Nations body still faces significant hurdles. It must be endorsed by President Emile Lahoud, a Hezbollah ally who considers the cabinet approval unconstitutional. And the tribunal must win approval from the Lebanese parliament, which is dominated by pro-Western lawmakers but headed by Hezbollah ally Nabih Berri, a prominent Shiite leader who could delay the vote.

Attempts by either Lahoud or Berri to derail the investigation could deepen the rifts and heighten tensions.

Hariri's political heirs see the tribunal as their best chance to prove widely held suspicions that Syria is behind the killing and an ongoing string of assassinations in Lebanon that have targeted a series of anti-Syrian figures. Syria has consistently denied playing any role in the political killings but views the tribunal as something of a kangaroo court.

As the Lebanese cabinet moved two weeks ago to give its initial approval to the tribunal, six Hezbollah allies in the Lebanese cabinet resigned in a bid to topple the government. Prime Minister Fuad Saniora refused to accept the resignations, and the cabinet endorsed the tribunal. Lahoud and Berri have deemed the cabinet actions unconstitutional.

Resolving the standoff peacefully was already a difficult challenge last week when gunmen killed Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel, a member of a prominent and controversial Christian political family.

The assassination deprived Saniora of an important ally and cast a pall over a nation still peppered with bullet-scarred buildings that serve as stark reminders of the country's 15-year civil war. Saniora's allies and Hariri's political heirs transformed Gemayel's funeral on Tuesday into a massive political rally that heightened the divisions. Demonstrators cursed Nasrallah, mocked Shiite religious traditions and denounced Syria, which many suspect is behind the string of assassinations.

Hours later, small groups of angry Shiite mobs briefly stormed through the streets looking for a confrontation until Nasrallah made an appeal for calm on Hezbollah's television station.

Leaders across the political spectrum have been trying to head off any clashes that could spark a new sectarian war. But many worry that such appeals will only go so far.

"You can't curb the street for a long time," said Moshen Saleh, a sociologist and Hezbollah ally at Lebanese University. "So the majority has to do something to show its good intentions."

In the Shiite neighborhoods around Beirut, residents on Saturday said they are prepared to push their demands.

"We are ready. We are ready. We are ready," said Aziz Najdi, a 36-year-old storeowner. "If it is winter, if we are under attack, if it is hot, we are ready to go at a moment's notice."

DOJ_NMG_0098375

Lebanon's Government Backs U.N. Tribunal (AP)

By Hussein Dakroub, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

The U.S.-backed government on Saturday approved an international tribunal for suspects in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, overriding the objections of Hezbollah amid a political crisis that threatens to spin Lebanon into violence.

Attempts to reach a last-minute compromise between the government and the pro-Syrian camp, led by Hezbollah, failed Saturday as the Cabinet moved forward with its meeting on the U.N-created court.

Lebanon's Syria-allied president denounced the vote as did Hezbollah officials, who warned that the Shiite Muslim militant group would go ahead with threatened mass street protests seeking to force the government from power.

The tribunal is key in the struggle between allies and opponents of Syria, which dominated its neighbor for nearly three decades until international pressure forced it to withdraw its troops last year. Anti-Syrian forces — mainly Christians and Sunni Muslims — dominate parliament and the Cabinet, but are facing growing resistance from the mainly Shiite pro-Syrian camp.

The political crisis became potentially explosive this week with the assassination of an anti-Syrian politician, raising worries of more violence that could tear apart the country apart long its fragile sectarian seams.

The anti-Syrian bloc brought out some 800,000 people for a rally at the funeral of the politician, Pierre Gemayel, on Thursday. Hezbollah has shown it can bring out similar numbers, and many people fear its threatened new demonstrations could start a spiral of street action.

Earlier Saturday, two key anti-Syrian Lebanese politicians met with Parliament Speaker Nabil Berri, an ally of Hezbollah and a Syria supporter, in an apparent attempt at a compromise.

U.S.-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora offered to put off the Cabinet vote for several days if six pro-Hezbollah ministers who quit the Cabinet earlier this month return.

But with Hezbollah demanding that the government be changed to give it and its allies more power, the reconciliation bid failed, and the Cabinet meeting approved a U.N. draft for the tribunal.

"Unfortunately, no agreement was reached because each side stuck to its position," Information Minister Ghazi Aridi said after the Cabinet meeting.

The Cabinet approval "puts the opposition before its options to confront the government. The time and the place will be decided," Sheik Hassan Ezzeddine, a senior Hezbollah official, said after the vote when asked if Hezbollah would carry out its threat to try to topple Saniora with mass demonstrations.

In the eyes of Hezbollah, the approval of the tribunal amounted to a rejection of its demands for more seats on the Cabinet, and Saniora's foes contend his administration is unconstitutional because it does not represent all of Lebanon's main communities.

"The government represents part of the Lebanese people, not all of them. Its decisions are void," Ezzeddine told Al-Arabiya television.

President Emile Lahoud also called the Cabinet's approval of the tribunal "null and void" for the same reason, according to a statement from his office.

Hezbollah legislator Hassan Fadlallah charged the tribunal vote would "deepen divisions in the country," and said the militant group would not take to the streets although he did not say when.

Saniora insisted the approval of the tribunal was not meant as a "provocation" against Hezbollah and its allies, according to a statement read by Aridi after the vote.

"It is in fact based on Lebanese unanimity on the creation of this tribunal and the Lebanese who are yearning to protect Lebanon, bolster its democratic freedoms and national security and bring it out of the cycle of killings and assassinations," the statement said.

Aridi underlined the government's "respect" for Hezbollah's opinion and would allow nonviolent protests led by the group, but added: "We will not give up our goals."

For opponents of Syria, the court is a major priority, and they hope it will uncover the truth behind the February 2005 assassination of Hariri in a bomb blast that killed 22 others, which they accuse Damascus of orchestrating. Syria has denied any role in the killing.

The court, which will sit outside Lebanon and have a majority of non-Lebanese judges, is to try four Lebanese generals — top pro-Syrian security chiefs under Lahoud, including his Presidential Guard commander, who have been under arrest for 14 months accused of involvement in Hariri's murder.

DOJ_NMG_0098376

The U.N. investigation into Hariri's death has also implicated Brig. Gen. Assaf Shawkat, Syria's military intelligence chief and the brother-in-law of Syrian President Bashar Assad. Shawkat is not in custody.

Hariri's death was the first in a string of attacks that killed five other prominent anti-Syrian figures — with Gemayel the most recent, in a bold daytime shooting Tuesday. Many Lebanese blame Syria for all the killings, which Damascus denies.

Since Gemayel's assassination, some ministers in Saniora's Cabinet have moved into the heavily guarded prime minister's building in downtown Beirut, fearing more slayings.

Needed: A Big Stick (WP)

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

ONE WAY TO understand the deteriorating situation in the Middle East is to contrast last week's assassination of Lebanese Christian leader Pierre Gemayel with the response to it. The assassination was a shockingly audacious attack on Lebanon's democratic forces and their U.S. and European allies. But those Western governments remain in a profound muddle about how to address Iran and Syria, which have been fomenting the destabilization of Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinian territories.

The killers of Mr. Gemayel have not been identified and may never be. But the attack fits snugly into a pattern of provocations across the region by Iran and Syria, which appear to believe that American reversals in Iraq have given them the opportunity to create what Syrian dictator Bashar al-Assad calls "a new Middle East" -- one in which their influence and radical ideology will predominate. They would make their client Hezbollah the power broker in Lebanon, restoring Syrian suzerainty. They would use Hamas to block any progress toward an Israeli-Palestinian settlement and perpetuate a continuing, if low-grade, war on Israel. And they would continue to bleed the United States by supplying insurgents in Iraq with arms and sanctuary. Iran meanwhile presses ahead with its barely disguised nuclear weapons program: President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad recently promised to increase the number of centrifuges enriching uranium from the current 328 to 60,000.

In response to this bold bid for regional hegemony, the United States has apparently resolved . . . to intensively negotiate with itself and its chief European allies about how it might "engage" Mr. Ahmadinejad and Mr. Assad. Should a U.S. ambassador return to Damascus, once the uproar over Mr. Gemayel dies down? Should the administration drop its demand that Iran obey a U.N. resolution ordering it to suspend enrichment before talks can begin? While the debate goes on, the Western effort to sanction Iran for its nuclear program is stalled and all but forgotten. No punitive action against Syria is even being discussed.

Those most focused on rescuing the Iraq mission -- such as the Baker-Hamilton study group -- are most interested in the engagement option. We, too, have supported including Iran and Syria in a regional diplomatic initiative to promote an Iraqi political accord. But it's vital to keep in mind that such an effort has a low probability of ending the bloodshed in the near future, even if all parties cooperate.

What's more, no attempt to reason with Mr. Assad and the Iranian mullahs will succeed unless they perceive that the United States and its allies wield sticks as well as carrots. As long as the Bush administration is unable to win U.N. Security Council approval for sanctions against Iran -- or impose them through an ad hoc coalition -- Tehran will have no incentive to make concessions. Mr. Assad will demand that the West concede him Lebanon and call off the murder investigations that would likely implicate him -- unless he worries that his failure to cooperate will result in fresh international sanctions against Syria.

Iran and Syria are ruthlessly waging war against Western interests in the Middle East. Offering to talk is only a small part of what it will take to stop them.

Realism, And Values, In Lebanon (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

The Baathists of Baghdad killed their opponents for all the usual reasons and a few original ones. They often slaughtered just to keep in practice, or for recreation, as shown on the videotapes they systematically made of their crimes. The Baathists of Damascus are more traditional. They murder adversaries only when necessary, after bribery, coercion or intimidation fail.

The sickening series of murders of Lebanese politicians and journalists opposed to Syrian control of their country is a new sign of desperation in Damascus that the United States and other nations must not misread or mishandle. This may well be President Bashar al-Assad's blood-soaked way of saying, "Let's make a deal." It is an offer that must be refused.

Those who complain that there is a lack of communication between the Bush administration and the Assad regime are not paying attention. By local rules, a well-timed murder such as the gunning down of Pierre Gemayel in Beirut last week is more effective in sending a message than a diplomatic demarche.

That does not absolve the Bush administration for foolishly allowing a secondary issue -- its refusal to have unconditional diplomatic contacts with Syria and Iran, to avoid "rewarding bad behavior" -- to obscure the growing international concern with those two nations. It is to say that the opening of communications channels with Damascus and Tehran must be handled with great care and clarity.

DOJ_NMG_0098377

Murder is still an important tool in Middle Eastern politics, as is often noted. Unfortunately, the use of mayhem and slaughter to advance dynastic or personal fortunes in the region has not been checked in the 21st century by either U.S. unilateralism in Iraq or the multilateral legalism of the United Nations in Lebanon and Syria. The two approaches need to be reviewed and perhaps merged.

The Bush administration struggles in Iraq to prevent failure from becoming defeat. Ambitions of promoting democracy abroad through regime change are rapidly being scaled back to the bedrock question of intervention, from Kosovo to Darfur: Can "we" stop "them" from killing each other? If the answer is no, that is defeat.

An immediate benefit of intervention in Iraq was the overthrow of the sadistic Baathist regime that murdered in cold blood dissidents of all stripes in the hundreds of thousands. But the breakdown of order under a mismanaged occupation triggered a mass privatization by ordinary citizens of the government's former monopoly on assassination and torture.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan has diligently and courageously pursued another course in dealing with Syria's systematic use of violence to regain control over Lebanon and the fortunes in smuggling drugs and arms that Syrian politicians and generals generate from their neighbor.

Citing the conditions created by the assassination of Rafiq al-Hariri, Lebanon's former prime minister, in February 2005 as a threat to international peace, Annan creatively pushed for an international criminal investigation and an international tribunal to try the case. Syrian officials are prime suspects in that crime and are widely believed to be behind the assassinations of at least four other advocates of Lebanese independence that followed Hariri's murder.

The killing of Gemayel, a member of the anti-Syrian coalition headed by Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, bears the hallmarks of a Syrian "initiative" to block the U.N. effort. And the murder came as Syria was reestablishing diplomatic relations with Iraq after 24 years of estrangement. This translation of Syrian actions quickly made its way through the Middle East: "You want help in Iraq? It will cost you Lebanon. For starters." That is realpolitik and real communication, Assad-style.

That is in any event the context in which any new U.S. move to talk to Syria and to Syria's ally, Iran, will be seen. Washington must avoid giving the impression that it is willing to allow Syria to regain hegemony over Lebanon in return for smoothing the U.S. path in Iraq.

The Bush administration should adopt a policy of making all substantive communications with Syria and Iran public as they are delivered, much as former secretary of state Jim Baker did when he dealt with Iraq's Tariq Aziz in Geneva in January 1991, on the threshold of Operation Desert Storm.

For one thing, such transparency would ensure that U.S. terms are delivered directly to those in charge without being distorted by filter or fear. And it would allow other nations to monitor for themselves Washington's intentions.

It is fashionable at the moment to decry black-and-white, evil-vs.-good visions of foreign policy and to maintain that only the expedient grays of "realism" can preserve world order. The debacle in Iraq has given the international promotion of democracy a bad name in some quarters.

But any "realistic" deal that undermines Lebanon's hard-won freedom from Syrian control and protects murderers in Damascus would quickly become a fool's bargain. This is a clear case, as the U.N. involvement to strengthen Lebanon's sovereignty over all its frontiers demonstrates, where doing the moral thing is also the realistic thing.

Lebanon On The Brink (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

THE ASSASSINATION OF Pierre Gemayel, an anti-Syrian member of Lebanon's Cabinet and the scion of one of that country's leading Christian clans, could lead to other casualties: the collapse of a pro-Western government in Beirut, a resurgence of noxious Syrian influence and the deflation of a trial balloon — only recently floated in Washington — for holding discussions with Syria and Iran about the future of Iraq. The worst-case scenario is another civil war.

It's easier to lament that potential chain reaction than avert it. But the White House should try to rally other nations — including Syria, which denies any complicity in Gemayel's death — around the fragile government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

The Bush administration has stopped just short of explicitly accusing Syria of ordering Gemayel's assassination. A State Department official called the killing "an act of intimidation," and President Bush said it demonstrated "the viciousness of those who are trying to destabilize that country." United Nations investigators were already looking into allegations that Syria was behind the 2005 murder of another anti-Syrian leader, former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. On Wednesday, Siniora asked that the U.N. probe be expanded to cover the latest crime.

DOJ_NMG_0098378

Supporters of democracy worldwide took heart when public outrage over Hariri's assassination produced the so-called Cedar Revolution, a peaceful rejection of outside meddling that led Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon. Allowing an assassin to reverse what remains from that revolution is unacceptable. The U.N. has insisted that Lebanon's neighbors respect its territorial integrity, and the cease-fire resolution that ended this summer's Israeli-Hezbollah conflict assumed that the government in Beirut would exercise a national monopoly on military force.

Compared to other nations in the region, Lebanon has democratic credentials that predate the Bush administration's campaign to transform the politics of the Middle East. The country operates under a constitutional tradition that balances political power precariously among the Christian, Muslim and Druze communities. But it has been obvious for at least 30 years that the political status quo gave disproportionate influence to the Christian minority, especially Maronite Catholics like the Gemayel family.

Not all the support for Hezbollah among Lebanon's Shiite Muslims is the result of Syrian subversion. Hezbollah has capitalized on longfestering discontent about the distribution of economic and political power. Hezbollah also provides Shiite communities with a network of social services and spearheaded rebuilding in southern Lebanon after Israel's attacks (though Hezbollah lost some points by provoking the invasion with its incursions into Israel).

The Lebanese political system is imperfect, to say the least. But it should not be overthrown by an assassin's bullet, whoever gave the orders. If Syria wants to bolster its claim of innocence in Gemayel's murder, it should discourage its allies in Lebanon — notably Hezbollah — from exploiting the murder. And any talk of the U.S. giving Syria a role in a regional peace process should be put on hold if Damascus had anything to do with the assassination, or uses it as an opportunity to ratchet up its influence in Lebanon.

Probe Traces Global Reach Of Counterfeiting Ring (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

TBILISI, Georgia -- The U.S. Secret Service and Georgian police are investigating an international counterfeiting operation that stretches from a separatist enclave in this former Soviet republic to Maryland, where fake $100 bills have been seized, according to senior officials and investigators here. The allegations are supported by American diplomats, U.S. court documents and a recent report to Congress.

From a printing press in South Ossetia, a sliver of land with no formally recognized government, more than $20 million in the fake bills has been transported to Israel and the United States, according to investigators. The counterfeit $100 notes have also surfaced in Georgia and Russia, officials said.

The fake notes have been passed at numerous businesses throughout the Baltimore area and have also surfaced in New York, Newark and Buffalo, according to court papers and the joint report to Congress by the Secret Service, the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve. The report, issued in September, also said the number of counterfeit notes produced in this region and passed in the United States has "increased dramatically" in recent years.

The presence in South Ossetia of an international counterfeiting ring capable of producing thousands of bills, according to investigators, is a stark example of how organized crime has flourished, sometimes through the neglect or alleged involvement of officials, in areas of the former Soviet Union whose territorial status remains unresolved 15 years after the fall of communism.

"Counterfeiting is not the only headache for us if you're talking about criminality in South Ossetia," Ekaterine Zguladze, Georgia's deputy interior minister, said in an interview. "You also have drug trafficking, weapons trafficking, robbery, kidnapping. And our opportunity to fight criminals in there is very limited."

A spokesman for the U.S. Secret Service, in an e-mail message, declined to discuss the case "due to the sensitivities of the ongoing investigations and political considerations." But the joint report to Congress said the Secret Service "is currently investigating a scheme with ties to suspects in Israel, Russia, and the Republic of Georgia to produce counterfeit U.S. currency. The U.S. Secret Service has reason to believe this family of counterfeit notes is being produced in the Caucasus region," as the mountainous area encompassing parts of southern Russia and Georgia is called.

U.S. diplomats confirmed that the location was South Ossetia.

The cash from the Caucasus, as with other lines of counterfeit dollars believed to be from the same source, was given its own code by the Secret Service: c-21558, according to the joint report to Congress.

"Since the c-21558 family's first detection in March 1999 the total counterfeit activity (passed and seized notes) has exceeded $23 million," according to the report. In 2005, the Secret Service detected $5.3 million from the Caucasus ring, up from $1.5 million in 2003, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0098379

That compares to the approximately $2.8 million in "supernotes" linked to North Korea that the agency says it confiscates, on average, each year. The production of supernotes, so called for their quality, has become a major diplomatic issue between the United States and the government of Kim Jong Il.

Georgian investigators said the fake bills from South Ossetia are made with special ink and paper and have watermarks, different serial numbers and other features that allow them to be easily passed off as real. "They are of very high quality," Konstantin Kemularia, secretary of Georgia's National Security Council, said in an interview.

The counterfeiting operation in the region has become another irritant in U.S. relations with Russia, which acts, in effect, as a protector for South Ossetia; Russian peacekeeping troops patrol the breakaway enclave, and most of its residents have been issued Russian passports.

"We have expressed our concerns on this subject to both the Russians and the South Ossetians," said a U.S. State Department official who did not have approval to speak on the record. "This problem is one of many that underscore the urgent need for resolution of the conflict in South Ossetia and the threat it poses to security and border control, among other consequences."

Russia's Interior Ministry, which is responsible for fighting counterfeiting, did not respond to requests for comment. Officials in South Ossetia, where Russian rubles are used for currency, bitterly contested any allegation that a counterfeiting ring existed on their territory.

"Counterfeit dollars? Well, if you are going to listen to Georgians, soon you will say that we have a nuclear bomb here," Mikhail Mindzayev, interior minister in the separatist government, said in a telephone interview. Mindzayev asserted that "we do not have any counterfeit dollars here, and we do not have any criminals."

After a short, bloody war in the early 1990s, South Ossetia broke away from Georgia and achieved de facto independence. Despite the presence of Russian troops, crime has flourished in the province, and in a report, the German Marshall Fund of the United States described South Ossetia and other breakaway enclaves in the Black Sea region as "breeding grounds for transnational organized crime."

On Oct. 27, 2004, its fingers reached Linthicum, Md. At the Hampton Inn near Baltimore-Washington International Airport, Hazki Hen, who had just flown to the United States from Israel, met with two men, one of whom was an undercover Secret Service agent. Hen expected to consummate a deal that had been negotiated over 19 tapped phone calls.

Hen agreed to exchange $230,000 in counterfeit $100 bills for $80,000 in genuine currency, according to a Secret Service affidavit filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore. Hen also planned to accept $220,000 as a down payment on the delivery of another $1.5 million in fake bills. The affidavit filed in Baltimore said that "Hen also displayed samples of paper used to produce counterfeit Euros and U.S. currency. The paper contained red and blue fibers similar to the fibers contained in genuine U.S. currency."

Just before the Secret Service moved in and arrested Hen, the three men discussed future deals involving between $25 million and $100 million in counterfeit U.S. currency, according to the affidavit.

Nine months later and more than 5,700 miles to the east, Nana Jabelashvili, a resident of Tbilisi, Georgia's capital, was stopped by police as she crossed a Georgian police checkpoint on the road between Gori and Tskhinvali, the capital of South Ossetia. Police found $350,300 in counterfeit bills in Jabelashvili's vehicle and later learned that she was a courier for a Georgian emigre who now lives in Israel, according to Levan Gurgenidze, head of the Georgian Interior Ministry's organized crime unit. The emigre fled Georgia the day after Jabelashvili's arrest, Gurgenidze said in an interview.

When Secret Service agents examined some of the bills seized from Jabelashvili, they found that they were linked to the same family of bills seized in the Hen case in Baltimore, according to a U.S. law enforcement source. Gurgenidze said the source of the bills was a counterfeiting operation run out of a building on Lenin Street in Tskhinvali.

In November 2005, federal prosecutors dropped charges against Hen, then 65, after he became seriously ill and the court agreed to allow him to return to Israel to die.

Jabelashvili was sentenced to 12 years in prison in Georgia in January of this year, officials here said.

Suspicions are growing, meanwhile, that some South Ossetian officials are not just ignoring counterfeiting but are involving themselves in it directly.

In January of this year, Eter Kachmazova, a senior bureaucrat in the South Ossetian Trade Ministry, held a series of meetings with a Georgian undercover officer posing as a Ukrainian businessman. The meetings, at a restaurant in Gori, which is about 30 minutes by car from Tskhinvali, and at the Sheraton Hotel in Tbilisi, were videotaped and recorded by the Georgians, who later broadcast excerpts on state television.

Kachmazova "said she could produce as many fake dollars as the buyers could handle, up to millions," Gurgenidze said. "The Ukrainian, our guy, said he wanted $1.5 million, and she agreed for $25 on every $100."

DOJ_NMG_0098380

On Jan. 31, Kachmazova agreed to supply the first $100,000, taking it across checkpoints in lots of $10,000 in case she was stopped and searched. After she arrived with the second bundle of $10,000, police arrested her. Kachmazova is being held at a pretrial detention center in Gori.

"They immediately relocated the press on Lenin Street after she was arrested," Gurgenidze said. "But they are still printing money in there."

Poisoned Russian Ex-Spy Said He Was Ordered To Hire Assassins (WP/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 25 -- An ex-KGB agent poisoned in London described in interviews before his death how he was ordered to hire assassins to neutralize potential rivals and whistle-blowers who threatened the Kremlin, according to excerpts published and broadcast Saturday.

Alexander Litvinenko, a fierce critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, died Thursday of heart failure after falling gravely ill from what doctors said was poisoning by polonium 210, a rare radioactive substance.

His highly contaminated body was released to a coroner by police late Saturday and Home Office pathologists were expected to begin an autopsy, but experts said investigators might never pinpoint the exact source of the polonium.

In a deathbed statement, 43-year-old Litvinenko accused Putin, whom he called "barbaric and ruthless," of ordering his poisoning. Putin has called the death a tragedy and denied involvement. His government has pledged to cooperate with the investigation.

Litvinenko also spoke to academics James Heartfield and Julia Svetlichnaja from the University of Westminster in three interviews that lasted a total of about six hours in April and May. The Daily Telegraph published a version of the interviews Saturday.

Litvinenko was recruited into the Soviet-era KGB and also worked for its successor, the Federal Security Service. After the fall of communism, he said, his directive was to recruit businessmen who could stimulate an economic boom and to hire assassins.

"So if somebody was the victim of a crime, like his daughter was raped, you would offer to let them take revenge on the perpetrator," Litvinenko said. "This was how we recruited killers."

In another deathbed conversation, Litvinenko alleged that a Russian Foreign Intelligence Service chief previously stationed in London had been assigned by Moscow to watch him, Britain's Sunday Times newspaper reported.

British detectives investigating his death launched an international hunt for witnesses Saturday and spooled through hours of security video from closed-circuit television footage for clues, police said.

Litvinenko had told police he believed he had been poisoned Nov. 1 while investigating the October slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another Putin critic.

Polonium 210 can be found in Russia, which has several nuclear research facilities and a major space program, but Kremlin intelligence agents would be unlikely to use it since the origin could be traced, said Vladimir Slivyak, a nuclear expert. He said the material was most likely acquired on the European black market.

In Moscow, the government newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta pointed suspicion at London's Russian exile community. It portrayed Litvinenko as a pawn who "drank his poison . . . when he betrayed those he worked for."

The newspaper speculated that Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky was involved, aiming to use the death to discredit Putin's government or settle a business dispute. A presenter on Russia's state-run Channel One television said there was "a theory Litvinenko poisoned himself."

After Poisoning, Britain Sees No Big Public Threat (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 25 — The British authorities said Saturday that they did not expect a major threat to public health after the disclosure that a former Russian K.G.B. officer and enemy of the Kremlin had been killed by radiation poisoning in London.

The Health Protection Agency, however, urged people who had been in the same places as the victim, Alexander V. Litvinenko, 43, to contact the authorities for urine tests.

Mr. Litvinenko died Thursday as a result of poisoning by a radioactive isotope called polonium 210, but the police have not established how it entered his body. His friends have accused President Vladimir V. Putin of responsibility, but Mr. Putin has strongly denied the assertion.

DOJ_NMG_0098381

The nature of the death evoked cold war spy thrillers as much as it kindled animosity between some Russian exiles and the Kremlin. And it left Britons pondering whether their capital had become a theater for a long-range conflict between them. British diplomats have generally sought to play down the incident, calling it a police matter.

On Saturday, the British government's crisis management committee, called Cobra for Cabinet Office Briefing Room A, met to debate the matter and the Health Protection Agency issued a new statement urging people who had gone to the sushi restaurant and hotel bar Mr. Litvinenko visited on Nov. 1 to contact Britain's National Health Service. The authorities said the number to call in Britain was 0845-4647.

"We expect that we are going to do tests, and we expect that they are going to be negative and we have no reason to think customers are at risk," the Health Protection Agency said in the statement.

The police said Mr. Litvinenko had visited the Itsu sushi bar in central London and the Pine Bar of the Mayfair Millennium Hotel on Nov. 1. They said on Friday that they had found radioactive traces at each location and at Mr. Litvinenko's home in north London.

"We want to reassure the public that the risk of having been exposed to this substance remains low," the Health Protection Agency statement said. "It can only represent a radiation hazard if it is taken into the body — by breathing it in, by taking it into the mouth, or if it gets into a wound."

The agency said it was also checking areas of two hospitals where Mr. Litvinenko had been treated.

In Russia, Mr. Litvinenko's death caused a different kind of sensation. "Abomination," the newspaper Komsomolskaya Pravda wrote Saturday. "That's what you think looking at the pandemonium created by the West" in reaction to Mr. Litvinenko's death.

The state newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta sought to shift the accusations to another target: one of Mr. Putin's fiercest critics, Boris A. Berezovsky, the self-exiled tycoon who was close to Mr. Litvinenko. The paper's assertions, without evidence, echoed others made by officials and news organizations all week.

Polonium That Killed Ex-spy Could Be From Russia, But Hard To Pin Blame (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

MOSCOW (AP) — The polonium-210 that doctors believe killed Kremlin critic and former spy Alexander Litvinenko could have come from Russia, but it will be difficult for investigators to pinpoint blame for the death even if the origin of the radioactive substance is determined, nuclear experts said Saturday.

Litvinenko blamed President Vladimir Putin in a statement signed days before his death in a London hospital Thursday, and bitter Kremlin foe Boris Berezovsky, an associate who spent time by Litvinenko's bedside, has said he suspected Russia's intelligence services were behind the alleged killing.

Polonium-210 is usually made artificially in a nuclear reactor or particle accelerator, and would likely come from a country with a significant nuclear program. With several nuclear research facilities, Russia fits the bill — and it also has a major space program, another sector in which the element has been used.

"There are many laboratories in Russia where it could be produced," said Vladimir Slivyak, a nuclear expert and co-chairman of the Russian environmental group Ekozashchita, or Ecodefense.

Alexander Pikayev, a senior analyst with the Moscow-based Institute for Global Economy and International Relations, said polonium isotope would be "much easier" to acquire than weapons-grade plutonium or highly enriched uranium because it is not considered weapons-grade.

